HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CLXXV.—DECEMBER, 1864.—VOL. XXX.

RESIGNED.

NEVER again on the shoulder
To see our knightly bars;
Never again on the shoulder
To see our lordly leaves;
Never again to follow
The flag of the Stripes and Stars;
Never again to dream the dream
That martial music weaves.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1864, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

VOL. XXX.—No. 175.—A

Never again call "Comrade"
To the men who were comrades for years;
Never to hear the bugles,
Thrilling, and sweet, and solemn;
Never again call "Brother"
To the men we think of with tears;
Never again to ride or march
In the dust of the marching column.

Never again be a sharer
In the chilly hour of the strife
When, at dawn, the skirmish-rifles
In opening chorus rattle;
Never to feel our manhood
Kindle up into ruddy life
'Mid the hell of scenes and noises
In the hot hours of the battle.

Crippled, forlorn and useless,
The glory of life grown dim,
Brooding alone o'er the memory
Of the bright, glad days gone by;
Nursing a bitter fancy,
And nursing a shattered limb:
Oh, comrades, resigning is harder—
We know it is easy to die!

Never again on the jacket
To see our knightly bars;
Never again on the jacket
To see our lordly leaves;
Never again to follow
The flag of the Stripes and Stars;
Never again to dream the dream
That young ambition weaves!

HEROIC DEEDS OF HEROIC MEN.

BY JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

AMBROSE E. BURNSIDE.

I.—A MILITARY ADVENTURE.

Putting to Sea.—Entering the Inlet.—Conquest of Roanoke Island.—The Slaves.—Destruction of the Rebel Fleet.—Extending the Conquest.—Expedition to the Neuse.—Decisive Battle.—Anecdotes.—Capture of Newbern.—Secret Expedition.—Bivouac.—Battle of Kingston.—Daily Marchings.—Battle at Whitehall.—Heroism of Butler.—Successful Raid.—Battle of Goldsborough.—Success of the Expedition.—The Return.

ON the 11th of January, 1862, a vast fleet of gun-boats and transports was assembled at Hampton Roads, Old Point Comfort, for a secret expedition. Spectators on the shore counted one hundred and twenty-five boats of all sizes and patterns. There were formidable vessels of war, powerfully armed and nobly manned. There were ferry-boats extemporized into gun-boats, and peaceful merchantmen frowning with artillery. There was one queer stern-wheeled craft, which went puffing about among the fleet, attracting much attention. It had come from the shoal waters of the Kennebec River. The sailors called it "the wheel-barrow." Its draught was so light that they insisted it could run wherever there was a heavy dew. Sixteen thousand men—infantry, artillery, and cavalry—were embarked in this fleet, under the chieftainship of General Burnside. The troops were divided into three brigades, under Generals Foster, Reno, and Parke; all experienced officers of the regular army. Commodore Goldsborough, a veteran of fifty years' service, commanded the fleet.

It was a bright, mild winter's day. Just after the sun had gone down and the stars had come out, those on the shore observed an unusual commotion in the fleet. Lights were flashing and tugboats moving rapidly in all directions, and it was evident that every ship was getting up its steam. Just at midnight some signal rockets pierced the sky from the flag-ship, and almost instantly every paddle-wheel was in motion, and the majestic squadron swept down the bay. It was a brilliant night, serene, cloudless; with the moon near the full. It was very manifest to all on board that hard work was to be done by both fleet and army; but when, where, how, none but a few of the highest officers could tell, and they were silent. At noon the next day, Sunday, January 12, the fleet was entirely out of sight of land, enveloped in fog, steaming rapidly down the southern coast.

At length the fog lifted, and the leading ships caught sight of the shores of Hatteras, and, followed by the whole squadron, turned toward the Inlet. It was a gorgeous afternoon of autumnal beauty. The scene was magnificent. Thousands of men were clustered on the decks and in the rigging of the ships, gazing with admiration upon the golden sunset, and the forest-crowned shore fringed with its long line of snow-white beach, upon which the billows of the wide Atlantic dashed almost mast-head high, and with thunder roar.

It was too late to enter the Inlet. The next morning was cold and wintry. Clouds were gathering; the ocean looked black; and angry billows with foaming crests pursued each other. It was difficult to cross the bar in a storm, as smooth water was very necessary for the passage. Yet it was not safe for a fleet to attempt to ride out a Hatteras gale on that open sea. About seventy of the ships succeeded in safely getting within the Inlet. One of the transports, laden with horses, struck the bar, plunging her keel into the sand, and remained immovable. The waves dashed over the ship, hurling the horses into the sea, where they all perished. The seamen lashed themselves to the rigging, and there, without food or sleep; and drenched to the skin, remained for forty-eight hours until the storm abated. Every endeavor which was made to send them assistance was fruitless. Two heroic men, Colonel Allen and Dr. Wellar, perished in the attempt. During the continuance of the gale nearly every vessel was injured, both those within and those without the Inlet. Many were badly shattered, and four entirely wrecked; the crews generally escaping.

A calm succeeded this fearful storm; yet it was two weeks before the fleet, crippled and dispersed, was collected and refitted at a safe anchorage in Pamlico Sound.

A comparatively small strait separates the two majestic Sounds called Pamlico and Albemarle. In the centre of this strait you find Roanoke Island, twelve miles long and three broad. As the channel on either side is narrow and tortuous, the island effectually commands the passage between the two Sounds. Here the rebels were in force with batteries, intrenchments, and gunboats. Wednesday morning, the 6th of February, dawned cold, and wet, and gloomy. Groping through the fog our fleet approached the island, and, anchoring for the night, prepared for a conflict in the morning. The morning came. As the clouds broke, and the rays of the sun struggling through the rifts gave promise of a brilliant day, Nelson's famous order was run to the mast-head of the flag-ship, "America expects every man to do his duty!"

The gun-boats immediately commenced throwing 9-inch shot and shell into the woods near the beach. Under protection of this fire a large number of troops were landed. The intrenchments were bombarded, the batteries were stormed, and the patriot troops swept the island from south to north in uninterrupted victory. Before five o'clock in the afternoon of the 8th Roanoke Island was rescued from the hands of traitors, and the star-spangled banner floated over all its captured ramparts. General Foster led the men in their impetuous attacks upon the redoubts, and inspired them with his own enthusiasm and intrepidity. The gallant Colonel Russell, of the Connecticut Tenth—a man who knew not the sense of fear—was struck by a bullet which pierced his heart, and he fell dead without a groan. As the men were assailing one of the most formidable redoubts their ammunition failed them. Just then Major Kimball of the Hawkins's Zouaves came up, and offered to charge the redoubt. "You are the very man," said

ROANOKE ISLAND, NEWBERN, AND THE SOUNDS.

General Foster, "and this is the very moment. Zouaves, storm the battery!" There was an instantaneous rush, and with their ringing battle-cry, Zou, Zou, Zou! they ran across the intervening space, clambered the ramparts, and burst through the embrasures. The rebels fled in the utmost panic, not even stopping to spike their guns or to carry off their wounded.

General John G. Foster, with his brigade, followed in the track of the Zouaves and pursued the retreating rebels at the double quick. For nearly six miles the exciting chase was continued. General Reno took another path to cut off the rebel retreat, and on the way came across a body of eight hundred of the foe who were compelled to throw down their arms. The rebels were now thoroughly vanquished. A flag of truce was sent to General Foster, asking what terms of capitulation he would accept. "Unconditional surrender," was the reply. It was impossible to dispute the terms, and before five o'clock in the afternoon the Stars and Stripes were floating over every battery on the island. Six forts, two thousand five hundred prisoners, forty-two heavy guns, with a large quantity of smaller arms and ammunition, fell into the hands of the victors. The patriots lost but forty killed and two hundred wounded. Among the prisoners taken there were about two hundred slaves, all men in the prime of life, whom the rebels had brought upon the island to work upon the intrenchments. As the white prisoners were paroled, these slaves were called together and informed that they might remain upon the island as freemen, or return with their masters to the main land. Nearly every man chose to return with his master. This extraordinary decision led some one to exclaim in bewilderment, "What does this mean? We thought you all wanted to be free." An honest, earnest black man stepped forward, and, taking off his hat, said,

"We'se wives and chillern in slavery. We can't leave them. Bress de Lord, de day ob jubilee is come. We'se all to be free now. We must go back and get our wives and chillern."

No comment can add to the pathos of this incident.

The next day was the Sabbath. The rebel gun-boats had escaped up the Sound to Elizabeth City. The patriot gun-boats pursued them; with full head of steam they rushed by the fort, under whose guns the rebel boats had sought protection, and in a conflict of fifteen minutes destroyed the whole rebel fleet, killing or capturing nearly every man of the crew. From all the region around the slaves flocked by hundreds to the national boats, entreating to be taken "to de Norf." This was impossible. Their grief was touching as they saw their hopes blighted, and that the long-prayed-for hour of deliverance had not yet come.

After a few unimportant excursions in this vicinity, every where indignantly striking down the flag of treason, General Burnside reassembled his fleet at Hatteras Inlet for a more important movement than he had yet attempted.

On the night of the 12th of March the fleet was again in motion. They steamed down Pamlico Sound about fifty miles, and entering the spacious River Neuse, anchored upon its western bank within about sixteen miles of the city of Newbern. This city, of about five thousand inhabitants, one of the finest in the State, is situated at the confluence of the Neuse and Trent. It is important as a military post, being connected with Goldsborough and Raleigh on the west, and Beaufort on the south. The rebels had strongly fortified it, employing thousands of slaves in throwing up intrenchments. A line of water-batteries, with heavy guns, from every commanding point swept the river. Six miles from the city there was a long line of earth-works extending from the river to the swamps and tangled woods, effectually barring approach to any ordinary force or courage. From that point to the city the whole expanse was filled with redoubts, batteries, rifle-pits, treacherous torpedoes, and all the other appliances of honorable and dishonorable war.

Early in the morning of March 13 the patriot troops, five thousand in number, landed at Slocum's Creek, about a dozen miles below New-bern. The water was shallow. The overladen boats sank deep and could not approach near the shore. The landing seemed much like a frolic. With jokes and shouts and peals of laughter the men leaped overboard, up to the middle in water, and waded to the shore. Their path up toward Newbern led over an extended plain, marshy from recent rains, and covered with a dense growth of gloomy pines, draped with hoary Spanish moss. The heavy gun-carriages sank deep in the mire, and a cold March wind swept over the drenched and shivering ranks, subduing the mirth of the most buoyant.

THE LANDING.

The Massachusetts Twenty-fourth led the march. The Connecticut Eleventh brought up the rear. The line of march in compact mass filled the forest road for two and a half miles. The gun-boats followed cautiously along the channel of the stream, throwing shells into the woods in advance of the head of our column. Night came dismal with clouds, darkness, mud, and rain. The wearied soldiers threw themselves upon the sodden leaves of the flooded plain for their cheerless bivouac. On Friday morning, the 14th of March, the patriot troops were again early in motion, and soon approached the long line of earth-works running from the river to the swamp, strongly protected by rifle-pits and batteries on either flank. The woods in front of the intrenchments had been felled for a distance of a quarter of a mile, that the assailants might be exposed to an unerring fire. Behind these intrenchments the rebels were comparatively safe. Neither bullet nor ball could easily harm them. It would seem madness to an ordinary observer to send men with bare bosoms to face the line of fire bursting from those breast-works. But our heroic troops accomplished the apparent impossibility. Forming in line of battle in the edge of the woods, a mile in extent, they opened a vigorous fire of musketry and artillery which they must have been conscious could accomplish little, save to distract attention by making a noise. Nearly every ball and bullet went plump and harmless into the breast-work of earth rising six feet high before them.

At length when the field of battle was covered with smoke, and the frenzy of conflict inflamed all minds, Colonel Clark, at the head of the Massachusetts Twenty-first, rushed across the open plain, through the deadly storm of lead, and entering on the full run one of the embrasures seized the gun. The rebels fled, astonished at such audacity. Instantly two rebel regiments came charging upon them, and the heroic little band were compelled to retire.

But the next moment Colonel Rodman, with the Fourth Rhode Island, charged upon a battery of five guns. At the double quick they ran upon these death-dealing muzzles, pouring in a volley of bullets as they ran. The desperate adventure was a success. They seized the guns, and with the precision of veterans in compact mass, with bristling bayonets, bore down along the rebel line within the intrenchments. The Eighth and Eleventh Connecticut, and Fifth Rhode Island rushed instantly to their support. The rebels fled precipitately, and the Stars and Stripes were proudly unfurled over one portion of their ramparts.

Animated by this sight the patriot troops, who were struggling through the tangled morass at the southern extremity of the enemy's line, made a grand charge upon that flank. Aided as they were by their comrades, who were already within the ramparts, they speedily smote down all opposition, and the rebels tumultuously fled. With exultation and rapture, which none can comprehend but those who have passed through such scenes, the patriot troops clambered the ramparts, discharging their muskets at the retiring foe, disappearing in the distance, and greeting the glorious old banner of the Union with enthusiastic huzzas. It was a splendid victory. Every regiment behaved heroically. The Fifty-first New York attracted especial applause. There is not a man of that regiment who will not look back with pride upon the battle of Newbern so long as he shall live. The rebel army was disorganized and panic-stricken. It was important that they should have no time to recover from their consternation.

There are many interesting incidents of this battle worthy of record. Lieutenant Fearing, of General Burnside's staff, was sitting upon his horse when a 32-pound shot passed under the horse's belly between his legs. The Lieutenant, apparently unconscious of his own danger, fondly patted his horse in commendation of the animal's quiet bravery.

When the first battery was captured Colonel Clark, of the Twenty-first Massachusetts, had mounted one of the rebel guns, and was waving his colors, when two rebel regiments advanced upon him and his handful of men. The patriots leaped the parapet and fled. Captain J. D. Frazer, who had been wounded in his right arm, carrying his sword in his left hand, tumbled and fell into the ditch. He was seized and dragged back by the rebels over the parapet. A guard of three men was placed over him. A few moments after, when the Fourth Rhode Island made a charge, he drew a concealed revolver and captured all three of his guards.

One of the noblest young men of our nation—a hero, a patriot, and a Christian, Adjutant Frazer A. Stearns, son of President Stearns, of Amherst (Massachusetts) College—fell in this battle. Young Stearns had already borne himself bravely at Roanoke Island. Here, in the thickest of the fight, a bullet pierced his breast, and he dropped dead.

General Burnside, aware of the value of time, scarcely remained upon the battle-field long enough to bury the dead. The whole army was immediately put in motion for Newbern, which was about six miles distant. The gun-boats continued to follow along the river, capturing the water-batteries with scarcely a shadow of opposition. Early in the afternoon the troops reached the eastern bank of the Trent opposite the city. The magnificent bridge, seven hundred and fifty yards in length, constructed both for railroad and carriages, across which the rebels had retreated, was in flames. A number of turpentine factories also were rolling up their billows of fire and smoke, which enfolded the city in a black canopy sublimely gloomy. Several transports had followed the gun-boats up the stream, and in a few hours our whole army of five thousand men were ferried across the Trent, and were in undisputed possession of Newbern. The fires were extinguished, a strong provost-guard established, every liquor cask in the city staved, and by midnight quietude and peace reigned throughout the conquered city.

The fruits of this victory were six forts, thirty-four heavy guns, six steamboats, and public property to the amount of two millions of dollars. The rebel troops at the battle-ground were almost entirely protected by their ramparts, and our bullets did them little harm; and, on the other hand, they did not dare to expose themselves by taking aim, but loading under cover raised their guns over their heads and fired almost at random, thus throwing many of their bullets away.

As the rebels were retreating the slaves along the route, who had been taught to believe their masters omnipotent, could hardly credit their senses, and were quite unable to repress their joy and exultation. As one of the slave-holding rebels, breathless with terror, spurred his horse by his own door, not venturing to stop, an aged slave stood by the side of his cabin gazing in unutterable astonishment upon the flight and fright of his master. Just as he disappeared in the woods a shell from one of the gun-boats, with its unearthly scream, careering high above the tree-tops, followed the path of the fugitive. The gray-headed old man, clapping his hands, rushed into his cabin shouting,

"Wife, wife, massa is running, and the wrath of God is after him!"

The next day was the Sabbath. By order of General Burnside all the churches were thrown open, the army chaplains officiated, and thanks were returned to God for the signal victory he had granted the patriot arms.

Several months passed away, during which the Union troops fortified themselves at Newbern, and extended their conquest to several important places in the vicinity. On Tuesday, the 9th of December, 1862, a division of the little army received orders to put three days' rations in their haversacks, and prepare for an immediate march; but where they were not informed; neither was it supposed to be any of their business to inquire. Blind, unquestioning obedience is the law of the army. The rising of the sun on Thursday, the 11th, found these troops vigorously on the move from Newbern directly west, toward Goldsborough, along what is called the Trent Road—a road running a few miles west of the River Trent, and almost parallel with it. The force consisted of four brigades, composed of nineteen regiments. The line of march was formed by two hundred cavalry in advance; then followed the several regiments of cavalry, infantry, and artillery, while the rear was composed of one hundred and fifty baggage wagons. The entire line, in easy marching order, extended about five miles, filling the whole road.

It was a splendid wintry morning, mild and serene. As the vast array was beheld from an eminence moving along the winding road, with the fluttering of innumerable banners, and the gleam of burnished arms, the sight inspired the most phlegmatic with enthusiasm. The army numbered in all thirteen hundred infantry, eleven hundred cavalry, with fifty-one pieces of artillery. The troops that day marched eighteen miles over a heavy, sandy road, with occasional sloughs to wade, and, as night approached, they prepared for their encampment in a large plain of about three hundred acres, which they found opened in the forest.

As the twilight faded away hundreds of camp-fires, brilliant with the blaze of the resinous pine, lighted up the scene with wondrous beauty. The soldiers drank their hot coffee from their tin cups, ate their frugal supper of hard bread, and the camp resounded with jokes and laughter as most of them threw themselves down for a shelterless bivouac, with the sand for a mattress, and a knapsack for a pillow. Wearied with the long day's march the reign of silence soon commenced. Many of the officers were provided with rubber blankets, which they spread upon the ground. Over that a woolen blanket was spread. And then, three cuddling together, with their feet to the fire, and with their united three blankets and three over-coats spread over them, enjoyed more luxurious slumber than is usually found in ceiled chambers and on beds of down.

At five o'clock the next morning, Friday, the 12th, the drum-beat—the reveille—roused all from their slumbers. It was a bitter cold winter's morning—so cold that the water in the canteens of the soldiers was found frozen. The icy ground seemed solid as a rock. The fires, from piles of pitch-pine, were immediately brightly blazing, the ever-welcome coffee was boiling, and after their breakfast of hard bread the soldiers were again upon the move. Marching rapidly along a level country covered with pine forests, and where few dwellings were found, at noon they reached a road turning nearly at right angles to the north. This road led directly to Kingston, one of the most important towns in North Carolina, situated on the northern bank of the Neuse, about forty miles above Newbern. The soldiers by this time had supposed that Kingston was their destination. But much to their surprise, they found that they were not guided upon that road, but leaving it on the right, pressed directly forward in a westerly course. The soldiers subsequently ascertained, that which the officers already knew, that half-way between this crossing and the town of Kingston there was a stream called Southwest Creek, where the rebels, in anticipation of an attack, had erected formidable intrenchments.

General Foster, one of our most bold and efficient officers, sagaciously sent forward a small force of cavalry to deceive the rebels by the feint of an attack upon their elaborate works at the creek. At the same time the main body pressed vigorously forward on the road toward Goldsborough, and with the setting sun sought their second night's bivouac, having effected a march of nearly twenty miles. The wearied soldiers, after a hurried meal, again threw themselves on the frozen ground and slept soundly. Scarcely had the morning dawned ere the beat of the drum aroused the slumbering host. They replenished their waning fires, in haste prepared their breakfast of fragrant coffee with hard bread, and at six o'clock the tramp of armed men and the rumbling of carriage-wheels again resounded through the solitudes of the forest. All day long they continued their march, until about the middle of the afternoon, when, having passed several miles beyond Kingston, they came to another cross-road, which at a very sharp angle led back, in a northeasterly direction, toward that city.

The head of the long column turned sharply round and entered this road. By it they could cross the Southwest Creek at a point farther up the stream by a bridge which was feebly defended. The rebels, however, fearing this movement, and yet not daring to vacate their intrenchments on the main road, had sent forward a small force and burned the bridge. They had also placed two 12-pounders on an eminence on the north side of the creek, to prevent the reconstruction of the bridge or the floating of pontoons. Here the Union troops were brought to a stand. While the advance of the column waited for the artillery and the wagons to come up, pioneers were sent forward, under strong protection of artillery and musketry, to attempt to rebuild the bridge.

The creek was here but a few rods wide, with somewhat precipitous and densely-wooded shores. The road from that point to Kingston, a distance of about fourteen miles, ran all the way through an almost unbroken forest. A few pieces of Union artillery were sent ahead, to engage the attention of the rebel battery, while the Ninth New Jersey regiment secretly forded the stream above and below, and rushed upon the hostile cannon from either flank so impetuously and unexpectedly that guns, horses, and men were all taken, almost before there was any consciousness of danger.

It was Saturday night—the third day of the expedition. Again the troops bivouacked in the open air, but all night long working parties of engineers and pioneers were busy rebuilding the bridge. Before the dawn of Sunday it was completed, and at five o'clock the troops were again upon the march. As before, a body of cavalry led the advance along the narrow road, with pine forests on either side. They frequently encountered the pickets of the enemy, and in slight skirmishes easily dispersed them. The cavalry was followed by a strong body of artillery, who shelled the woods wherever there was any suspicion that the foe might be lurking.

It will be remembered that the line of the army, filling the whole capacity of the road, occupied an extent of about five miles. At nine o'clock in the morning those in the rear of this long column heard the roar of artillery among the advance, shot answering shot. It announced that the enemy had been found, and it sent an electric thrill through the eager host. Every man pressed forward. The whole army soon found themselves in a clearing of the woods of about twenty acres, on the right-hand side of the road. There was here opportunity for the army to deploy and make ready for action. The enemy were so effectually concealed in the woods that not a man could be seen; and their batteries, commandingly posted under the protection of an apparently impassable swamp, were constantly pitching their shells over the tree-tops into the midst of our advancing troops. Six Parrot guns were brought forward by the patriots and placed in position to return the fire. It was a blind battle of invisible foes; but the two hostile parties had discovered each other's position, and bloody scenes were at hand.

of the road, to charge the rebel batteries on their right flank. The Ninth New York plunged into the woods on the right of the road, to advance upon the batteries under shelter of the thicket between the road and the swamp. The Forty-fifth Massachusetts rushed boldly into the swamp itself, and toiling onward through a tangled network of roots and stumps, and up to their knees in mire, sought to traverse it, that they might attack the batteries on their left flank. The swamp was densely covered with huge old trees, whose gnarled roots were twisted in all possible contortions beneath the ooze and slime of the bog. But a few moments elapsed before the whole forest was alive with the rattle of musketry, for the heads of each of these divisions had met the foe. Our troops, keeping up a constant fire, steadily advanced, driving the rebels before them—who were fighting, Indian-fashion, behind stumps and trees.

At length the Forty-fifth Massachusetts, who had penetrated the swamp, forced their way through it, and ascended a little knoll beyond covered with shrub oaks. But they had hardly formed in line before a shower of bullets came rattling in among them, a rebel battery having got their precise range. The Tenth Connecticut and One Hundred and Third Pennsylvania came up at the same moment, having followed through the swamp. The rebel guns opened upon their left flank, raking their position. The fire of these guns was so concentrated and powerful that it cut a perfect path, two rods wide, for some distance through the forest. No flesh and blood could stand such a storm. The Union troops threw themselves on their faces and hugged the ground as their only protection. They could not move in any direction without the utmost peril.

While in this terrible situation they heard the well-known cheer of their comrades announcing triumph on the left. The Ninety-sixth and Ninety-second New York had come up, flanked and successfully charged the rebel battery. At that shout the Tenth Connecticut, Forty-fifth Massachusetts, and One Hundred and Third Pennsylvania sprang to their feet, and rushed to join their comrades in the charge. The rebels waited not for the impetuous onslaught, but abandoning every thing, fled pell-mell for the bridge which crossed the Neuse, opposite Kingston, which was not far distant. The retreat of five hundred and fifty of the foe was cut off, and they were taken prisoners. The Union artillery came rushing up along the road, shelling the fugitives in their flight. The rebels, in their consternation, had no chance to destroy the bridge, and the patriot troops, following closely upon their heels, crossed the river and took possession of Kingston. The brunt of this battle—and it was truly a heroic fight—was met by the Forty-fifth Massachusetts, Tenth Connecticut, and One Hundred and Third Pennsylvania, essentially aided by the Ninety-sixth and Ninety-second New York. Five Union regiments drove six thousand rebels from their intrenchments.

The rebel prisoners stated that they considered their position quite impregnable, for they had not supposed it possible for any advance to be made through the swamp. They had consequently massed their forces to block up the passage of the road. The first intimation they had of the position of the regiments who had dashed through the swamp was from the storm of bullets which swept their ranks. There was an old church near the range of the hostile batteries which was thoroughly riddled with shot. As our troops occupied the ground vacated by their foes they found sixteen dead bodies in the church. The prisoners confessed that they carried off as many dead bodies as they could, and had thrown them into the river to conceal their loss.

Most of the prisoners were South Carolinians. They were ferocious in their hate, declaring that they would fight forever. They said they had received orders from General Evans that morning to give no quarter. They had not entertained the idea that they could be beaten. Many of them were as ignorant as savages, having not the slightest conception of the cause of the war. They had been told that the Northern people had invaded the South from the brutal desire to rob them of their property and to cut their throats. "What for you uns," said they, in their barbaric dialect, "come down here to fight we uns? We uns don't want to fight you uns." One might as well attempt to explain one of the problems of Laplace to a New Zealand savage as to give one of these ignorant, debased, South Carolinian mean whites an idea of the questions involved in this civil war.

The North Carolinians generally appeared much less morally and intellectually degraded. Almost to a man they expressed regret at the existence of the war, and said they had no heart in it. They asserted that their State had been carried out of the Union by the vote of the Legislature against the vote and sentiment of the people. They were mostly conscripts, and were quite willing to be taken prisoners. They complained bitterly of the harsh treatment they had received from their own officers, and said their only food had consisted of Indian corn and bacon. Unshorn, uncombed, and unwashed, they presented an appearance of filth and savagery which scarcely any group of Digger Indians ever equaled. Many of them were very bitter against Jeff Davis, and told terrible tales of the despotism which reigned in secessiondom.

Our troops found that the rigor of rebel conscription had stripped the country of every man capable of bearing arms. Many of the prisoners said that they had been dragged away from their families without any process of law, and without an hour's delay. The general aspect of the region through which the army passed testified to the truth of these statements. Wide fields remained uncultivated, and in not a few cases ripened crops were left to perish unharvested. Vast barns and granaries were left entirely empty. On the most extensive plantations but few signs of life were visible. A few aged negroes, too old to run away and too valueless to be removed, were loitering about, bewildered by the sudden and inexplicable change. Now and then a few women were found who had been left behind. They did not exhibit the ferocity which had been generally displayed by female rebels; they were generally anxious for the war to end on any terms, asserting that they were living under a reign of terror, and that they had more to fear from the rebel than from the Union troops.

The retreating rebels had stripped the houses of most of their movable furniture and of all eatables. In the little dilapidated city of Kingston desolation and starvation reigned. The women and children who alone remained all looked care-worn and hungry. Many of the poorer class came rambling through the Union camp, begging bread of the soldiers, and eagerly picking up the fragments which our surfeited troops had thrown away. The women, accustomed only to the brutal aspect and bearing of the Southern soldiers, expressed much surprise at the gentlemanly appearance and demeanor of the Northern troops. But three white men were found left in Kingston, and they were Union men who had hidden themselves from rebel rule. All the rest had been carried off, either voluntarily or involuntarily, by the rebels.

The battle of Kingston was fought on Sunday. These were strange scenes for our Puritan boys, who had been trained in the Sabbath-schools and churches of the North. The victorious Union troops passed over the bridge into Kingston, and encamped in a large field on the north side of the village, built their fires, boiled their coffee, and sat down to review the labors of the day. The Massachusetts Forty-fifth lost 18 killed, and had 50 wounded. Large numbers had bullet-holes through their hats and part of their clothing. The Tenth Connecticut met with a still more severe loss, as did also the One Hundred and Third Pennsylvania and the Ninety-sixth New York. The rebels lost, in addition to the prisoners we have mentioned, eleven pieces of artillery, a large quantity of small-arms and ammunition, and an immense dépôt of provisions, which they set on fire to prevent it from falling into the Union hands. The battle in the swamp lasted four hours. A young soldier of the Massachusetts Forty-fifth, who had never before been under fire, thus graphically describes his sensations in a letter to his friends:

"When we first filed into the woods I would have given all I was worth to have been once more safely at home. But after the first shot was fired I could not restrain myself. I had no thought of any personal danger. The balls would whistle and hum all over our heads, and every now and then a shell would explode and cover us with mud, and too often with blood. But it seemed to me as though something told me not to fear. I said one little short prayer for myself, thought of each one of you, imagined I heard the sweet church bells of Framingham, and shut my eyes for an instant and saw you all. It could have been but an instant, and then I thought of nothing but pushing the rebels out of the swamp. As we drove the rebels before us I can not describe the exultation we felt that we had helped win a victory for the Stars and the Stripes. But the sad times were at night, when we missed from the camp-fires the faces of those whom we had learned to love, or when we went back to the woods to bury the dead or to save the wounded."

Among the many who fell at the battle of Kingston meriting especial honor we have space to mention but one—Lieutenant William Perkins. His case illustrates that of many others of our noblest young men who left all the endearments of home to peril life in defense of our country. This young man was the second one from his native town, New London, Connecticut, to volunteer. His older brother was the first. With honor he passed through the disaster at Bull Run. At Roanoke Island he was the second man to jump upon the shore. Captain Leggett, of Company H, Tenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, to which company young Perkins belonged, was the first.

VOL. XXX.—No. 175.—B

In the heroic and brilliant battle at Roanoke the company lost 23 out of 56 men. Young Perkins, for his chivalric bravery, was soon promoted to the First Lieutenantancy in Company A, Tenth Connecticut Volunteers. At the battle of Kingston all the enthusiasm of his soul was called into requisition. While his regiment was in full pursuit of the rebels, retreating by the bridge across the Neuse, Lieutenant Perkins pressing eagerly on, reckless of all danger, had just exclaimed to a comrade, "Isn't this glorious?" when he was struck by a Minié ball and fell dead. The chaplain of the regiment, the Rev. Mr. Stone, of Boston, in a letter to his bereaved father, wrote:

"Your son was a universal favorite in the regiment. We all loved him for his manly qualities, his generous heart, his kindness of manner, and his winning ways. We were proud of his soldierly bearing and of his courageous deportment."

His letters to his friends showed the conscientiousness with which he had entered upon this strife for civil and religious liberty, and his deep sense of dependence upon God. Such were the victims who, by hundreds and by thousands, were immolated by the demon of slavery upon her blood-stained altars. Earth may be searched in vain for a crime more enormous than that which plunged our once peaceful and happy land into all the horrors of civil war to perpetuate and extend the outrage of human bondage.

Early the next morning—Monday the 15th—the army recommenced its march. Filing rapidly again back across the bridge they pressed along a road which skirted the southern banks of the Neuse, toward Whitehall, which was directly west upon the river, at the distance of about 20 miles. It required nearly five hours—from daylight until 11 o'clock—for the whole army to defile across the narrow bridge. They then, to prevent pursuit and the harassment of their rear, smeared the bridge over with tar and set it on fire. The structure, of wood, 20 rods long and 40 feet above the water, was speedily enveloped in rushing billows of flame, and disappeared in smoke and ashes. Such a long line of troops, with its ponderous artillery and heavily-laden wagons, necessarily moves slow. But by vigorously pushing forward they traveled seventeen miles that day, and again bivouacked by the road-side, about three miles from Whitehall. The weary soldiers did not need beds of down to enable them to sleep soundly that night.

Tuesday, 16th, at 5 o'clock in the morning the troops were again upon the march. They had been in motion scarcely an hour when the roar of battle was again heard at the head of the column. The cavalry and one battery were in the advance. As they were approaching the little village of Whitehall, which is on the south bank of the stream, they found that the enemy had stationed themselves on the opposite side of the river, having destroyed the bridge, and were strongly posted, with ten guns in battery on the opposite bank. The guns were protected by long lines of rifle-pits. A brief but spirited conflict here ensued. As soon as our advance-guard appeared in sight the rebels opened upon them from their batteries on the opposite side of the river. When the Forty-fifth Massachusetts, which in that day's march led the main body of the army, came within reach of the rebel fire, six batteries, containing 36 guns, were immediately brought into position, and opened a deadly fire upon the guns of the rebels, 10 in number, upon the opposite side of the river. These guns, on both sides, were loaded and fired with such rapidity that it is said that there were, in all, more than a hundred discharges each minute. It is seldom, in battle, that so large a number of guns are so closely concentrated.

The field of action was mostly a level plain, with a few slight undulations. It was necessary to place the Union infantry in positions to protect their batteries from sudden charges by the foe. The Massachusetts Forty-fifth found itself stationed exactly in the range between one of our batteries and the guns of the rebels. The balls and shells from both parties went directly over their heads, so near that were the men to stand erect every head would soon be swept away. As they lay flat upon the ground they could feel the motion of every ball, and the windage would often take away their breath.

Occasionally a shell would explode near them, covering them with dirt. It was a very awkward position to occupy, and General Foster soon changed it. To attain a new position there was a Virginia rail fence to be crossed. As one of the men put his hand on a top rail to spring over a shell struck the rail from beneath him, plunged him headlong but unharmed into a ditch, and knocked down and severely wounded with a splinter another man. Almost at the same moment another shell fell and exploded in their ranks, wounding four men. In the midst of such a fire as this, strange to say, many of the Forty-fifth Massachusetts fell soundly asleep. They were so utterly exhausted by the march of two days, the battle in the swamp, and the sleeplessness of the intervening night in standing guard, that even the deafening roar of battle and the greatest peril of wounds and death could not keep them awake.

The conflict at Whitehall lasted about an hour and a half, one brigade only of the Union troops being called into action. It was found on almost all occasions that our artillery practice was far superior to that of the rebels. Not unfrequently the Union batteries would take position in an open field and silence a rebel battery carefully intrenched, of the same number of guns. While this artillery battle was raging the main body of the army moved rapidly along the road, at a little distance from the river, to gain the stream at a point which the rebel guns did not command. While thus moving a shell fell into the ranks of the Forty-fourth Massachusetts, instantly killing four men. The patriot batteries at length silenced the rebel cannon, and our troops, advancing to the river, destroyed two gun-boats which the rebels were building there. The village of Whitehall, which stood between the hostile batteries, was literally knocked to pieces. The dense woods which fringed the opposite bank of the stream were mown down by our deadly fire as the scythe mows the grass. For a quarter of a mile back from the river, and for half a mile up and down the banks, scarcely a tree was left standing.

One principal object in visiting Whitehall was to destroy the two gun-boats of which we have spoken as being there upon the stocks. As the enemy were in force upon the opposite bank our troops could not in a body cross. It was now night. The boats must be destroyed, and the army must be speedily again on its way to accomplish an enterprise still more important. Two thousand barrels of turpentine were seized, piled in an immense heap on the river's bank, and set on fire. Such a bonfire mortal eyes have seldom seen. Vast sheets of billowy flame flashed their forked tongues to the clouds. The whole region for miles around was lighted up. Every movement of the enemy was revealed, and their positions were mercilessly shelled. Still there were no means of reaching the boats but to call for volunteers to swim the stream and apply the torch. A private named Butler came forward, plunged into the wintry wave, and pushed boldly for the opposite shore. Every gun was brought into action throwing grape and canister to distract the foe.

Butler ran up the bank to the flaming bridge, seized a brand, and was making for the boats, when several rebels rushed from their sheltered hiding-places and endeavored to seize him. Quick as thought he turned, plunged again into the river, and through a shower of bullets returned safely to his comrades. The batteries were then brought to bear upon the boats, and with solid shot and shell they were nearly demolished, though the flames, could the torch have been applied, would more effectually have done the work.

The shell is a terrible and remorseless engine of destruction. Nothing can be imagined more demoniac than the yell with which they swoop through the air. It is heard the moment the shell leaves the gun, and with the larger size, now often used, is so shrill and piercing that even if a quarter of a mile distant it seems directly upon you. Many of these massive bolts are hurled with such velocity that if they pass within ten feet of one's head they produce a vacuum which takes away the breath; and as it whirs by the scream grows fainter and fainter till it expires in a thundering explosion. The noise which these shells make is indescribable. There is nothing with which to compare it. It can only be imagined by those by whom it has been heard.

Having dispersed the rebels at Whitehall, our victorious little army, under their vigorous leader General Foster, without crossing the river, and with scarcely an hour's delay, pressed forward toward the west, still ascending the banks of the Neuse. Night overtook them twelve miles beyond Whitehall. Here they found their sixth encampment. Scarcely had the dawn of Wednesday morning the 17th appeared ere the troops were again in motion. A party of cavalry had been sent in advance by a cross road on Monday to a place called Mount Olive, twenty miles south of Goldsborough, to destroy as much as possible of the railroad there and a long trestle railroad bridge. This enterprise the intrepid cavalry had successfully accomplished. They now returned to the main body, having ridden seventy miles in twenty-four hours.

The great object of this whole military expedition was to destroy the railroad running south from Goldsborough, which was the principal line of northern communication for the rebels. Like most villages in a slave-holding country Goldsborough is an insignificant hamlet, not important enough even to be noticed in a general Gazetteer. It is but little more than a railroad station, where the Wilmington and Weldon road crosses the Atlantic and North Carolina track. There was a costly high-bridge an eighth of a mile long, which here crossed the river, which had been a long time in process of construction. It was an important object of the expedition to destroy this bridge. The rebels, fully appreciating its importance, made a vigorous stand for its defense. But General Foster on this expedition as much out-generaled the rebel officers in strategy and tactics as his soldiers out-fought the rebel rank and file in the open field. At 11 o'clock, Wednesday morning, our soldiers were within five miles of the bridge. The rebels were found there in force, and the battle was renewed. A few miles below the railroad viaduct there was a small stream called Sleepy Creek, where there was a common road bridge across the Neuse. A portion of the army was sent down to this bridge to make a feint, with as much noise as possible, of crossing at that point.

The rebels, deceived by the supposition that it was our main object to seize the railroad junction at Goldsborough, had assembled a large force at this bridge, superior to our own, to guard the passage. General Foster adroitly compelled them to divide their force between this upper and lower point, and kept the river between him and the foe to prevent being overwhelmed by any sudden assault. To prevent the Union troops from crossing the river the rebels made their first stand at Kingston. Here, as we have mentioned, the rebels drove them back and destroyed the bridge. They next made a stand at Whitehall, destroying the bridge themselves. Here the patriots silenced their batteries and destroyed two of their gun-boats. The rebels then drew back their forces to the vicinity of Goldsborough, and established themselves at the two bridges of which we have spoken, five miles apart. While a part of our troops followed down Sleepy Creek to the bridge the main body moved on to the railroad bridge, the object of the expedition.

General Foster had no wish to cross either of these bridges. He was well aware that there was a sufficient force of rebels on the other side, gathered from Wilmington, Weldon, Raleigh, and even Virginia, to overwhelm the force at his disposal. The assault commenced at both bridges at the same time. From 11 o'clock in the morning until 3 o'clock in the afternoon there was the continuous roar of battle. The rebels had taken position on the south side of the railroad bridge. They were, however, soon driven in confusion from their position and across the bridge, and the bridge was utterly destroyed. The flames consumed its frame, and its buttresses were demolished by shot and shell.

The great object of the expedition having been thus effectually accomplished, the army immediately commenced its return. The rebels now began to comprehend the true posture of affairs. They had assembled in such force as vastly to outnumber the patriots. But there was a wide and rapid river, with all the bridges destroyed, flowing between them. In this emergency the rebels went back, ascending the river about five miles, and crossed in the vicinity of Waynesborough. Then marching down the southern bank of the stream, they vigorously set out in pursuit of our leisurely retiring columns. They overtook the patriot rear-guard in the vicinity of Sleepy Creek. As the rebels came on in solid mass the patriot batteries, in good position, remained quiet until they were within three hundred yards, and then, with double-shotted guns, they poured in so tremendous a volley that no mortal strength or valor could breast it. Three times the rebel ranks were broken by the awful carnage, and three times they rallied anew to the onset. Finally they broke beyond recovery, and fled in wildest confusion back among the forests and the hills. Some prisoners who were taken said that they lost in this terrific storm of war, which lasted but a few moments, eight hundred men. It was a very bold attempt of infantry to storm batteries up to the muzzles of their guns.

The patriots now retired unmolested, and encamped Wednesday night on the same spot where they had encamped the night before. The next morning, at 4 o'clock, they were again upon the march, and thus they tramped along, singing songs of victory, until 6 o'clock Saturday night, when they encamped about six miles from Newbern. The Sabbath morning sun rose cloudless over the North Carolina pines. The day was mild and beautiful, as though nature had no voice or feature in harmony with the discord of war. The patriot troops resumed their march with waving banners and pealing bugles, and thus rejoicingly re-entered the camp from which they had marched but ten days before. They marched into their encampment to the dear old tune of "Home, Sweet Home." The distance these iron men had traveled, over often the worst of roads, and through a series of battles, was about two hundred miles.

BATTLE OF KINGSTON.

HARVEST MEMORIES.

WHEN the noontide sun of autumn floods the corn-fields' hazy gold, Fond memory paints a picture from the harvest days of old:
 A maiden crowned with poppies—a whisper in her ear—
 An answering glance half-startled—the reapers' voices near.

When athwart the tawny stubbles the violet shadows fall
 Of the witch-elms in the hedge-rows, a vision I recall:
 Her auburn hair sun-gloried—sweet eyes brimful of tears—
 Two hands fast locked together, a pledge for coming years.

When the yellow moon is rising over yon dark copse of fir,
 And the harvest songs are silent, and there's not a sound astir,
 Half in moonlight, half in shadow, through the hazels as of yore,
 She seems to come and meet me, who will tryst me nevermore!

A TOUR THROUGH ARIZONA.

[Third Paper]

THE FINE ARTS IN ARIZONA.

I MUST here interrupt my narrative for a moment to say a word about the sketches which accompany these papers.

Sketching in Arizona is, to a man of mercurial temperament, rather a ticklish pursuit. I shall not readily forget my experience of the cañons and thickets, and the queer feeling produced by the slightest sound that fell upon my ears as I hurriedly committed the outlines to paper. It has been my fortune to furnish the world with sketches of Madagascar, Zanzibar, Palestine, the Continent of Europe, Iceland, and some few other points, many of which were achieved under circumstances of peculiar difficulty; but I never before traveled through a country in which I was compelled to pursue the fine arts with a revolver strapped around my body, a double-barreled shot-gun lying across my knees, and half a dozen soldiers armed with Sharpe's carbines keeping guard in the distance.

Even with all the safeguards of pistols and soldiers I am free to admit that on occasions of this kind I frequently looked behind to see how the country appeared in its rear aspect. An artist with an arrow in his back may be a very picturesque object to contemplate at one's leisure; but I would rather draw him on paper than sit for the portrait myself. All the way up from Fort Yuma I was beset by these difficulties; and if any man of genius and enterprise thinks he could do better under the circumstances he is welcome to try. This much premised, I resume my story.

At Sacatone we had a grand pow-wow with the Pimo chiefs. Antonio Azul and his interpreter, Francisco, had apprised the nation of the munificent presents that we had for distribution. Great was the sensation throughout the Pimeria. Scarcely had the sun risen above the scraggy brush of the desert when the dusky chiefs, head-men, and people, came pouring in. They came from the river-bottom, from the villages, from the weeds, from the grass, and possibly from the holes in the ground. On horse-back and on foot they came; by twos and by threes, and by sixes and by dozens. Paint and red blankets, beads and brass buttons, shone with resplendent brilliancy around our encampment. By noon it presented a busy scene of savage enjoyment. The Pimo belles were in their glory. Plump and good-natured; their pretty eyes fringed around with black paint; their teeth shining in pearly whiteness; their bosoms bare; their forms of almost Grecian symmetry and delicacy. Poston, with his enthusiastic appreciation of beauty, would have lost his balance completely had I not warned him of the dangers that surrounded him; so that when severely pressed by a bevy of Pimo maidens for beads, calicoes, and the like, he usually closed both his eyes and handed out the presents at random. In this way I observed that he frequently gave a sash, or shawl, or string of beads to some stalwart buck, and a shovel or pickaxe to some tender maid. When the looking-glasses and tin jewelry were distributed, never was there such a sensation in Pimeria; and as for the fancy calicoes, the excitement produced by the sight of them can not but descend to the Pimo posterity, and the name of Mr. Commissioner Dole be blessed unto the last generation of these good people. I have no doubt many of them will name their children Dole. I conscientiously believe that historians in future ages will find the name of Dole common among the Pimos. My friend Poston made a speech to Antonio Azul that, in point of terseness and eloquence has never, I venture to assert, been surpassed in this region of country.

Availing ourselves of the friendly professions made by the chiefs and people, we signified that two pumpkins for our journey across the desert would be a most acceptable return for the laborious services we had rendered the great cause of civilization; whereupon over a dozen pumpkins were immediately dragged forth from the loose and somewhat discolored drapery that hung around the squaws. We gracefully thanked them and proceeded to pick up our vegetables. "Dos reals," said the Indians. We gave them two bits. "Quatro reals," they observed. We offered them four bits. They gravely wrapped up their pumpkins. We offered a dollar for two. They coolly demanded two dollars. We indignantly showed them the way out of camp. Antonio and Francisco had long since disappeared before the impending storm. Not so their followers, who, in this case, were no followers at all. Firmly as rocks of adamant they sat gossiping upon the ground, regardless of our displeasure. Some of them considered it in the light of a friendly invitation to supper, and hung about the fire snuffing the odorous fumes of the pots and frying-pans. Toward the shades of evening the pumpkin-vendors had sufficiently warmed their backs and were about to depart. Our cook, Dr. Berry, was in favor of seizing a choice pair of pumpkins as a military necessity, but that proposition was overruled as beneath the dignity of our official position. Have them, however, we must. They were indispensable to our health. I left it all to Poston, whom I knew to possess a high order of genius for trade. He traded for two hours; he was calm and violent by turns; he reasoned and raved alternately. I fell asleep. When I awoke triumph sat perched upon his brow. The Indians were gone. Success had crowned his efforts. Two pumpkins, the spoils of victory, lay at his feet. "What did they cost?" was my natural inquiry. He looked a little confused, but quickly rallied, and replied, "Oh, not much—for this country! Let me see—five, ten, eighteen, twenty-two. Only about TWENTY-TWO dollars in trade."

It was gratifying at all events to know that the Pimos were rapidly becoming a civilized people. Under these circumstances we thought it advisable to pursue our journey without further waste of time.

Traveling all day from Sacatone we reached the Blue-Water Wells early in the evening, where we camped till dark. A few hours of night-travel brought us to the Pecacho, a little beyond which we made a dry camp till morning. The country between the Gila River and Tucson is a hard, gravelly desert, partially covered with a scrubby growth of mesquit and cactus, and at this season destitute of water except at two or three points, where the wells dug by the Overland Mail Company still remain. In former years emigrant parties suffered much in crossing this inhospitable desert. At certain seasons of the year some pools of water near the Pecacho afford relief to the trains, and enable the emigrants to reach the Gila; but these are a very uncertain dependence.

The Pecacho lies forty-five miles from the Gila, and is about the same distance from Tucson. It presents a prominent and picturesque landmark from both points, and is seen at a great distance from the Papagoria. The name is Spanish, and signifies "point," or "peak." Some travelers have discovered in this curious formation of rocks some resemblance to an axe-head. There are many Pecachos throughout Arizona. I have been unable to see in any of them the most remote resemblance to an axe-head. Generally they consist of two sharp-pointed rocks, one of a triangular and the other of a rectangular shape, growing out of the top of some isolated mountain, and serve to indicate the routes across the desert, which would otherwise be difficult to find.

I had no idea before my visit to Arizona that there existed within the territorial limits of the United States a city more remarkable in many respects than Jericho—the walls of which were blown down by horns; for, in this case, the walls were chiefly built up by horns—a city realizing, to some extent, my impressions of what Sodom and Gomorrah must have been before they were destroyed by the vengeance of the Lord. It is gratifying to find that travel in many lands has not yet fatally impaired my capacity for receiving new sensations. Virginia City came near it; but it was reserved for the city of Tucson to prove that the world is not yet exhausted of its wonders.

A journey across the Ninety-mile desert prepares the jaded and dust-covered traveler to enjoy all the luxuries of civilization which an ardent imagination may lead him to expect in the metropolis of Arizona. Passing the Point of the Mountain, eighteen miles below, he is refreshed during the remainder of the way by scraggy thickets of mesquit, bunches of sage and grease-wood, beds of sand and thorny cactus; from which he emerges to find himself on the verge of the most wonderful scatteration of human habitations his eye ever beheld—a city of mud-boxes, dingy and dilapidated, cracked and baked into a composite of dust and filth; littered about with broken corrals, sheds, bake-ovens, carcasses of dead animals, and broken pottery; barren of verdure, parched, naked, and grimly desolate in the glare of a southern sun. Adobe walls without whitewash inside or out, hard earth-floors, baked and dried Mexicans, sore-backed burros, coyote dogs, and terra-cotta children; soldiers, teamsters, and honest miners lounging about the mescal shops, soaked with the fiery poison; a noisy band of Sonoran buffoons, dressed in theatrical costume, cutting their antics in the public places to the most diabolical din of fiddles and guitars ever heard; a long train of Government wagons preparing to start for Fort Yuma or the Rio Grande—these are what the traveler sees, and a great many things more, but in vain he looks for a hotel or lodging-house. The best accommodations he can possibly expect are the dried mud walls of some unoccupied outhouse, with a mud floor for his bed; his own food to eat, and his own cook to prepare it; and lucky is he to possess such luxuries as these. I heard of a blacksmith, named Burke, who invited a friend to stop a while with him at Tucson. Both parties drank whisky all day for occupation and pleasure. When bedtime came, Burke said, "Let's go home and turn in." He led the way up to the Plaza, and began to hand off his clothes. "What are you doing?" inquired his guest. "Going to bed," said Burke—"this is where I gen'rally sleep." And they both turned in on the Plaza, which if hard was at least well-aired and roomy. The stranger started for the Rio Grande the next day.

For various reasons Tucson has long enjoyed an extensive reputation. Before the acquisition of Arizona by the United States the Mexicans had a military post at this place, with a small command for the protection of the missions and adjoining grain fields against the Apaches. It then numbered some four or five hundred souls. Since 1854 it has been the principal town in the Territory, and has been occupied successively by the Federal and rebel troops.

As the centre of trade with the neighboring

State of Sonora, and lying on the high-road from the Rio Grande to Fort Yuma, it became during the few years preceding the "break-up" quite a place of resort for traders, speculators, gamblers, horse-thieves, murderers, and vagrant politicians. Men who were no longer permitted to live in California found the climate of Tucson congenial to their health. If the world were searched over I suppose there could not be found so degraded a set of villains as then formed the principal society of Tucson. Every man went armed to the teeth, and street-fights and bloody affrays were of daily occurrence. Since the coming of the California Volunteers, two years ago, the state of things in this delightful metropolis has materially changed. The citizens who are permitted to live here at all still live very much in the Greaser style—the tenantable houses having been taken away from them for the use of the officers and soldiers who are protecting their property from the Apaches. But then, they have claims for rent, which they can probably sell for something when any body comes along disposed to deal in that sort of paper. Formerly they were troubled a good deal about the care of their cattle and sheep: now they have no trouble at all; the cattle and sheep have fallen into the hands of Apaches, who have become unusually bold in their depredations; and the pigs which formerly roamed unmolested about the streets during the day, and were deemed secure in the back-yards of nights, have become a military necessity. Eggs are scarce, because the hens that used to lay them cackle no more in the hen form. Drunkenness has been effectually prohibited by a written order limiting the sale of spirituous liquors to three specific establishments, the owners of which pay a license for hospital purposes, the fund whereof goes to the benefit of the sick and disabled, who have fallen a sacrifice to their zeal in the pursuit of hostile Indians. Gambling is also much discountenanced; and nobody gambles when he is out of money, or can't borrow any from other sources. The public regulations are excellent. Volunteer soldiers are stationed all over the town—at the mescal-shops, the monte-tables, and houses of ill-fame—for the preservation of public order, or go there of their own accord for that purpose, which amounts to the same thing. Public property is eminently secure. The Commissary's store-house is secured by a padlock on the door and a guard in front with a musket on his shoulder; so that nobody can go in at any time of the day or night and steal one hundred pounds of coffee and one hundred pounds of sugar, deposited there by private parties for safe-keeping, without killing the guard and breaking open the padlock, or cutting a hole through the adobe wall. If such a thing did occur it would be considered a reflection upon the entire post, and the loss would at once be reimbursed either from public or private sources. Otherwise people would naturally think very strange of such an occurrence.

Although there are two companies of able-bodied men well-armed and equipped at Tucson, and although the Apaches range within three miles of the place, there is no apprehension felt for the public safety. Citizens in small parties of five or six go out whenever occasion requires, and afford aid and comfort to unfortunate travelers who happen to be waylaid in pursuit of their legitimate business; and the Papago Indians also do good service by following up and killing the hostile savages who infest the country. It is confidently believed, therefore, that as long as the troops are kept within the precincts of the ancient Pueblo of Tucson, they will not be molested by any enemy of a more deadly character than mesquite, against which the regulations provide a remedy, and if they don't the physician of the post is prepared to do so free of compensation for eighteen months. Neither can the pangs of starvation assail this important strong-hold, unless the climate should unfit them for the heavy labor of lifting the food to their mouths; for, unlike the poor wretches of miners and traders who are prowling around the country in search of a living, the troops here stationed receive their regular salary and rations, and the Government liberally provides them with clothing, medicines, and all they require, and vast numbers of wagons and mules to haul the same from distant points. Besides, there are private traders always ready to furnish them with food from Sonora at a reduction upon the present cost to Government; and even if none of these sources could be relied upon, there are abundant tracts of rich arable lands lying within a few miles, upon which it would be mere pastime for the men to raise fifty or sixty bushels of wheat or corn to the acre at an extra compensation of fifty cents per day—convenient places where the Papagoes would be willing to protect them from the Apaches for the trifling consideration of a few strings of beads or yards of manta. I say, therefore, there is no reason to apprehend that the command at Tucson will ever be reduced to the humiliating necessity of depending upon the Pimo Indians who live on the Gila River for wheat upon which to feed their mules, to the exclusion of miners, traders, and other human beings engaged in developing the resources of the country, whose appetites may crave the same sort of sustenance, and who, under the ordinary rules of trade, may come in competition with them, or offer more to the Indians for the products of their labor. Such a degradation could never befall California Volunteers. Far rather would they go to work and raise wheat for their mules, or let the mules die, than squabble over a miserable pittance of wheat raised by the industry of a degenerate race, whom they are expected to elevate by their example to the standard of civilization; nor would they undertake to evade the imputation that would rest upon them for such an act by placing it on the ground of military necessity, when such necessity, if it existed at all, could only have arisen from negligence, incompetency, or dishonesty in their own departments, and which, at all events, would be a very dangerous plea to establish in a Territory remote from the seat of rebellion, and under the acknowledged protection of civil law. By proclamation of the Governor, and by orders of the commanding officer of the department, declaring that martial law no longer prevailed, and that the military should afford all the aid in their power in carrying the civil law into effect, such a mortifying state of things is expressly provided against.

News reached us at this place of the massacre by the Apaches of two gentlemen well known to the members of our party—Mr. J. B. Mills, Superintendent of the Patagonia Mines, and Mr. Edwin Stevens, who had just come down by the way of Guyamas to take his place; also of an attack by the same band of Indians upon Mr. S. F. Butterworth, President of the Arizona Mining Company. The statements were conflicting, and there were still some members of Mr. Butterworth's party for whose safety great anxiety was felt. As our route lay in part through the same region of country in which these startling events had taken place, we made immediate application for an escort from the detachment who had accompanied us from Fort Yuma, in the hope of being enabled to render some assistance to our friends.

From which it will at once be seen that Tucson has greatly improved within the past two years, and offers at the present time rare attractions for visitors from all parts of the world, including artists, who can always find in it subjects worthy of their genius. The views of life, the varied attitudes of humanity that I, a mere sketcher, found in the purlieus of the town as well as in public places, will be valuable to posterity; but, as Dr. Johnson said when looking from an eminence over the road that led out of Scotland into England, it was the finest view he had seen in the country, so I must be permitted to say the best view of Tucson is the rear view on the road to Fort Yuma.

A sojourn of two or three days quite satisfied us with the metropolis of Arizona. It is a very delightful place for persons of elegant leisure; but as we belonged to the class who are compelled to labor for a living, there was no excuse for our staying beyond the time necessary to complete arrangements for our tour through the silver regions of the south.

On the 19th of January we set forth on our journey with an escort of thirty men belonging to Company G, California Volunteers, under command of Lieutenant Arnold. I may here be allowed to say that a better set of men I never traveled with. They were good-humored, obliging, and sober, and not one of them stole a pig or a chicken during the entire trip.

Nine miles from Tucson we came to the fine old mission of San Xavier del Bac, built by the Jesuits in 1668. This is one of the most beautiful and picturesque edifices of the kind to be found on the North American continent. I was surprised to see such a splendid monument of civilization in the wilds of Arizona. The front is richly ornamented with fanciful decorations in masonry; a lofty bell-tower rises at each corner, one of which is capped by a dome; the other still remains in an unfinished condition. Over the main chapel in the rear is also a large dome; and the walls are surmounted by massive cornices and ornaments appropriately designed. The material is principally brick, made, no doubt, on the spot. The style of architecture is Saracenic. The entire edifice is perfect in the harmony of its proportions. In every point of view the eye is satisfied. Mr. Mowry well observes, in his pamphlet on Arizona, that, "incredible as it may seem, the church of San Xavier, with its elaborate façade, its dome and spires, would to-day be an ornament to the architecture of New York."

A village of Papago Indians, numbering some two or three hundred souls, partially surrounds the mission. There are also a few Mexicans living among the Indians; but they are regarded with distrust, and complaint is made that they have intruded themselves against the wish of the tribe. Mr. Poston, upon investigation of the matter, ordered the Mexicans to leave.

As far back as our knowledge of the Papagoes extends they have been a peaceable, industrious, and friendly race. They live here, as they lived two centuries ago, by cultivating the low grounds in the vicinity, which they make wonderfully productive by a system of irrigation. Wheat, corn, pumpkins, and pomegranates are the principal articles of subsistence raised by these Indians; and they seem to enjoy an abundance of every thing necessary for health and comfort. They profess the Catholic faith, and are apparently sincere converts. The Jesuit missionaries taught them those simple forms which they retain to this day, though of late years they have been utterly neglected. The women sing in the church with a degree of sweetness and harmony that quite surprised me. At the time of our visit two padres from Santa Clara, California, who had come as far as Tucson with the command, had just taken up their quarters in the mission. From my acquaintance with them on the road, I judge them to be very sincere and estimable as well as intelligent men. We furnished them with a Pimo grammar, published by Mr. Buckingham Smith, late American Secretary of Legation to Spain; and they are now studying that language with a view of holding more advantageous intercourse with the Papagoes, who are originally a branch of the Pimos, and speak the same language. The reverend fathers entertained us during our sojourn with an enthusiastic account of their plans for the restoration of the mission and the instruction and advancement of the Indian tribes, with whom they were destined to be associated for some years to come.

Subject as the Papagoes are to frequent encroachments from the Apaches, they are compelled to keep their cattle closely watched. At present they possess scarcely sufficient stock for the ordinary purposes of agriculture. Not more than five or six months ago a small band of Apaches made a foray within a mile of the village, and carried away with them at a single swoop most of the stock then grazing in the pastures. Though naturally disposed to peaceful pursuits, the Papagoes are not deficient in courage. On one occasion, when the principal chiefs and braves were away gathering patayah in the desert, the old men and boys of the tribe kept at bay, and finally beat off, a band of over two hundred Apaches who made a descent upon the village. Frequently they pursue their hereditary enemies to the mountains, and in almost every engagement inflict upon them a severe chastisement.

Leaving San Xavier, we followed the course of the Santa Cruz Valley for two days, making only one camp at Rhodes's Ranch. I had supposed, previous to our entrance into this region, that Arizona was nearly a continuous desert, as indeed it is from Fort Yuma to Tucson; but nothing can be a greater mistake than to form a general opinion of the country from a journey up the Gila. The valley of the Santa Cruz is one of the richest and most beautiful grazing and agricultural regions I have ever seen. Occasionally the river sinks, but even at these points the grass is abundant and luxuriant. We traveled, league after league, through waving fields of grass, from two to four feet high, and this at a season when cattle were dying of starvation all over the middle and southern parts of California. Mesquit and cotton-wood are abundant, and there is no lack of water most of the way to Santa Cruz.

Three years ago this beautiful valley was well settled by an enterprising set of frontiersmen as far up as the Calabasas Ranch, fifteen miles beyond Tubac. At the breaking out of the rebellion, when the Overland Stage Line was withdrawn, the whole Territory, as stated in a previous paper, went to ruin with a rapidity almost unparalleled. The Apaches supposing they had created a panic among the whites, became more bold and vigorous in their forays than ever. Ranch after ranch was desolated by fire, robbery, and murder. No white man's life was secure beyond Tucson; and even there the few inhabitants lived in a state of terror.

I saw on the road between San Xavier and Tubac, a distance of forty miles, almost as many graves of the white men murdered by the Apaches within the past few years. Literally the road-side was marked with the burial-places of these unfortunate settlers. There is not now a single living soul to enliven the solitude. All is silent and death-like; yet strangely calm and beautiful in its desolation. Here were fields with torn-down fences; houses burned or racked to pieces by violence, the walls cast about in heaps over the once-pleasant homes; every where ruin, grim and ghastly with associations of sudden death. I have rarely traveled through a country more richly favored, yet more depressing in its associations with the past. Day and night the common subject of conversation was murder; and wherever our attention was attracted by the beauty of the scenery or the richness of the soil a stone-covered grave marked the fore-ground.

The history of Bill Rhodes, at whose ranch we camped, was an example. In the full tide of success this daring frontiersman returned to his house one evening, and found his comrades murdered and himself surrounded by a large band of Apaches. By some means he managed to break through their lines; but his horse being jaded it soon became apparent that escape was impossible. Just as the pursuing Indians were upon him he flung himself into a willow thicket and there made battle. A circle was formed around him by the blood-stained and yelling devils, who numbered at least thirty; but he was too cool a man to be intimidated by their infernal demonstrations. For three hours he kept them at bay with his revolver; although they poured into the thicket an almost continuous volley of rifle-shots and arrows. A ball struck him in the left arm, near the elbow, and nearly disabled him from loss of blood. He buried the wounded part in the sand and continued the fight till the Indians, exasperated at his stubborn resistance, rushed up in a body, determined to put an end to him at once. He had but two shots left. With one of these he killed the first Indian that approached, when the rest whirled about and stood off. They then addressed him in Spanish, calling him by name, and telling him he was a brave man, and if he would come out they would spare his life. "No," said he, "d—n you! I'll kill the last one of you before you shall take me!" He had given such good evidence of his ability in that way that they held a parley and concluded he was about right; so they retired and left him master of the field. Bill Rhodes's Apache fight is now one of the standard incidents in the history of Arizona.

On reaching the old Pueblo of Tubac we found that we were the only inhabitants. There was not a living soul to be seen as we approached. The old Plaza was knee-deep with weeds and grass. All around were adobe houses, with the roofs fallen in and the walls crumbling to ruin. Door and windows were all gone, having been carried away by the Mexicans three years ago. Old pieces of machinery belonging to the neighboring mines lay scattered about the main building, formerly the head-quarters of the Arizona Mining Company. Many of these are still valuable. At the time of the abandonment of the country in 1861, the Arizona Company had upward of $60,000 worth of machinery stored in the building attached to the old tower, every pound of which was hauled in wagons at great expense from Lavacca in Texas, a distance of twelve hundred miles. Two boilers, weighing 6000 pounds each, were hauled in the same way, one of which was taken to the Patagonia Mining Company. The other, at the time of our journey, lay on the Sonora road a little beyond the Calabasas. Some Mexicans were hauling it away when they were attacked by a band of Apaches, who killed two of the party, took the teams, burned the wagon, and left the boiler on the road-side, where it lay when we passed.

Tubac was first settled by the Americans in 1856, when my friend Poston, the Arizona pioneer and late superintending agent of the silver mines in this vicinity, established it as his head-quarters. It lies on a pleasant slope in one of the most beautiful parts of the valley of the Santa Cruz, within twelve miles of the Santa Rita silver mines, and about twenty-two from the Heintzelman or Cerro Colorado, two of the richest mining districts within the limits of the Territory. Under the direction of Mr. Poston, Tubac was soon partially rebuilt. Good houses and store-rooms were erected, old buildings were repaired; a farm was fenced in and put under cultivation; a fine garden was started and irrigated by acequias in the Mexican style; and it may literally be said "the wilderness blossomed as the rose." In 1858, '59, and '60, during which the mines were in progress of development, Tubac might well be regarded as the head-quarters of civilization in the Territory. Men of refinement and education connected with the mines were here occasionally assembled, and even the fair sex was well represented. The gardens afforded a pleasant place of retreat in summer, with their shady groves of acacias and peach-trees; and deep pools in the river, overhung by willows, were cleared out and made into bathing-places, in which all who pleased might refresh themselves with a luxurious bath. Poston used to sit in the water, like the Englishman in Hyperion, and read the newspapers, by which means he kept his temper cool amidst the various disturbing influences that surrounded him.

Tubac is now a city of ruins—ruin and desolation wherever the eye rests. Yet I can not but believe that the spirit of American enterprise will revisit this delightful region, and re-establish, on a more permanent footing, all that has been lost, and as much more as its enterprising American founder conceived in his most sanguine anticipations. The mines are proverbially rich; and rich mines will sooner or later secure the necessary protection for working them. A view of the Plaza, and especially the old tower upon which, amidst the cheers of our escort, we planted the glorious flag of our Union, will convey some idea of the general character of the town.

As a matter of historical interest, characteristic of the vicissitudes suffered by these border towns of Arizona, a few incidents connected with the depopulation of Tubac will not be deemed out of place. In 1840, according to Valesquez, the post was garrisoned by thirty men, and the town contained a population of four hundred. After the boundary-line was established and the Mexican troops were withdrawn, the entire population retired to Santa Cruz, Imuriz, Magdalena, and other points within the Sonora line. Subsequently, when it became the head-quarters of the Arizona Mining Company, it contained a mixed population of four or five hundred, consisting of Americans, Germans, Mexican peons, and Indians. When the Federal troops were withdrawn to the Rio Grande Tubac was again partially abandoned, only twenty-five or thirty souls remaining. At this period (1861) the Apaches came down from the mountains in large force, and surrounded the town with a view of plundering it; but the few Americans left made a bold defense, and kept them at bay for several days, although it is estimated they numbered over two hundred. The beleaguered residents, finding they would ultimately be overwhelmed or starved out, sent an express to Tucson during the night, stating their condition and asking for assistance. A brave and generous American, Mr. Grant Ourey, got up a party of twenty-five men, and by rapid and skillful movements came suddenly upon the Apaches, whom they attacked with such spirit that the whole band fled in a panic to the Santa Rita mountains. At the time of Mr. Ourey's arrival a party of seventy-five Mexicans, who had heard that the Government of the United States was broken up, came in from Sonora with the same purpose of plunder which the Apaches had just attempted to carry into effect. Seeing the preparations for defense they fell back upon Tuma-cacari, three miles distant, where an old American lived, whom even the Apaches had spared, killed him in cold blood, robbed the place of all it contained worth carrying away, and retired to Sonora. Thus harassed on both sides by Apaches and Mexicans, and without hope of future protection, the inhabitants of Tubac for the last time abandoned the town; and thus it has remained ever since, a melancholy spectacle of ruin and desolation.

We were exceedingly anxious to discover some trace of our American friends who had recently suffered such a disastrous attack from the Indians—especially of Messrs. Kustel, Janin, and Higgins, who had crossed over from the Patagonia mines, and of whose safety we had no intelligence. There was abundant reason to suppose they had fallen into the hands of the same band of Apaches who had killed Mr. Mills and Mr. Stevens and robbed Mr. Butterworth. Our vaquero discovered fresh traces of a wagon on the Santa Rita road, which somewhat reassured us of their safety; but we were not yet satisfied. It was deemed advisable under the circumstances to send the vaquero with a detachment of five men over to the Santa Rita hacienda, with instructions to make a careful examination of the premises, and join us the next day at Calabasas. As an instance of the wonderful sagacity of the Mexicans in determining the number and movements of parties entirely unknown to them, from signs which to us would be quite unintelligible, the vaquero reported next day that he had found traces of our American friends. He stated the number exactly; gave many curious particulars in regard to their movements, and said we had missed them by eight days. Nor was there any mere conjecture about this information. It was all demonstrated by the closest reasoning upon isolated and trifling yet incontrovertible signs; and what is most remarkable, his statement was subsequently corroborated by the facts in every particular.

We killed several deer in the vicinity of Tubac, which contributed materially to our scanty stock of provisions. Wild turkeys were also abundant, but our hunters failed to get a shot at them, although their tracks were to be seen within a stone's-throw of the Plaza.

Leaving a written notice upon the wall of the old fort, informing all persons who might pass this way of our arrival and departure, we proceeded without loss of time on our journey.

Three miles beyond Tubac we made a halt to visit the old mission of San Jose de Tumacacari, another of those interesting relics of Jesuit enterprise which abound in this country. The mission lies a little to the right of the road, and is pleasantly situated on a slope, within a few hundred yards of the Santa Cruz River. A luxuriant growth of cotton-wood, mesquit, and shrubbery of various kinds, fringes the bed of the river and forms a delightful shade from the heat of the sun, which even in midwinter has something of a summer glow about it. Like San Xavier and other missions built by the Jesuits, Tumacacari is admirably situated for agricultural purposes. The remains of acequias show that the surrounding valley-lands must have been at one time in a high state of cultivation. Broken fences, ruined outbuildings, bake-houses, corrals, etc., afford ample evidence that the old Jesuits were not deficient in industry. The mission itself is in a tolerable state of preservation, though by no means so perfect as San Xavier del Bac. The dome, bell-towers, and adjacent outhouses, are considerably defaced by the lapse of time, or more probably by the Vandalism of renegade Americans. A strong adobe corral adjoining the back part of the main edifice, with a massive gateway and with loop-holes for purposes of defense, show the insecurity under which the worthy fathers carried on their agricultural pursuits. Valesquez writes in strong terms of the richness and beauty of this part of the valley. I spent some hours making sketches of the ruins, and succeeded, I flatter myself, in getting some tolerably good views, one of which was given in the first of these papers.

Proceeding on our journey, we reached at an early hour in the afternoon the fine old ranch of the Calabasas or "pumpkins." This splendid tract of country belongs, I believe, to Señor Gandara, formerly Governor of Sonora. As an instance of the vicissitudes of life in Sonora, I may mention that we met Señor Gandara just before crossing the Colorado Desert, making his way into California, with a few broken-down retainers, mounted on mules and burros. All he possessed in the world was a rickety ambulance, his animals, and a few pounds of corn. He was a sad spectacle of a used-up Governor; was old and poor, and had no hope in the future save to die at peace away from the country that gave him birth. The "Calabasas" will never profit him more. An ex-Governor is an outlaw in Sonora. And yet this ranch is one of the finest in the country. It consists of rich bottom lands and rolling hills, extending six leagues up and down the Santa Cruz River by one league in width, embracing excellent pasturage and rich arable lands on both sides. Situated as it is at the junction of the two main roads from Sonora, the Santa Cruz and Magdalena, it might be made a very valuable piece of property in the hands of some enterprising American. A ready market for its productions could always be had at the neighboring silver mines and also at Tucson. At present, however, and until there is military protection in the country, it is utterly worthless, owing to the incursions of the Apaches.

For the past two or three years a stout-hearted frontiersman by the name of Pennington lived at this place, with a family ranging from ten to a dozen daughters, and raised fine crops of corn, besides furnishing the troops at Tucson with a large amount of hay.

"Old Pennington," as he is familiarly called, is one of those strange characters not unfrequently to be met with in the wilds of Arizona. During the whole time of the abandonment of the country by the Americans he occupied with his family a small cabin three miles above the Calabasas, surrounded by roving bands of hostile Indians. He stubbornly refused to leave the country—said he had as much right to it as the infernal Indians, and would live there in spite of all the devils out of the lower regions. His cattle were stolen, his corrals burned down, his fields devastated; yet he bravely stood it out to the last. When hard pressed for food he was compelled to go out in the hills after deer, which he packed in on his back, always at the risk of his life. At times he was several days absent; and I am told his daughters frequently had to stand guard with guns in their hands to keep off the Indians who besieged the premises. One of them, a Mrs. Paige, was on one occasion traveling with her husband, when the Indians attacked the party, killed all the men, beat her on the head with a club, and cast her over a precipice, where they left her for dead. Maimed and bleeding, she crept away during the night, and for sixteen days endured the most dreadful tortures of hunger and thirst, subsisting on roots and berries, and suffering indescribable agony from her wounds. When rescued by a party of whites, she was nothing more than a living skeleton. She now lives with her father, and is an active, hearty woman. Three months ago the family moved down to the neighborhood of Tucson, where I had the pleasure of an introduction to the eccentric "Old Pennington." He is a man of excellent sense, strange as it may seem. Large and tall, with a fine face and athletic frame, he presents as good a specimen of the American frontiersman as I have ever seen. The history of his residence in the midst of the Apaches, with his family of buxom daughters, would fill a volume.

While camped at the Calabasas, some of us slept in the old building, as the nights were rather cool. The escort remained by the bank of the river, which is the best place for pasturage. Calabasas presents something the appearance of a Mexican military post, which I believe it was in former years. The houses are built of stone and adobe, and are still in a good state of preservation, except some of the roofs and a portion of the tower. Major Stem had his head-quarters here in 1856-'57. It was occupied for nearly a year by the First Regiment of Dragoons under his command. It was also temporarily occupied by Colonel Ewell, now of the rebel service. A characteristic anecdote of Ewell was related to me during the evening. He wished to procure a supply of water from a spring in one of the neighboring hills, and went out one day with four or five of his men to survey the ground. Having no apprehension of an enemy in such close proximity to his command he had omitted to take any arms with him, and his men were only provided with axes and spades. About half a mile from the house they were suddenly surprised by a band of Apaches, who commenced shooting at them with their arrows from every bush. The men started to run for the fort, so that they might obtain their arms and make something of a decent fight. "Halt!" shouted Ewell, in stentorian tones, while the arrows fell around him in a perfect shower. "Halt, boys! let us retreat in good order!" And as the story goes, he formed his men in line, and deliberately marched down the hill to an imaginary quick-step, stopping every now and then as the arrows pricked their skins or pierced their clothing to deliver a broadside of imprecations at the cowardly devils who had taken such a dirty advantage of them. It was said of old Ewell that he could swear the scalp off an Apache any time; and one can readily imagine that he did some tall swearing on this occasion.

During the night we were visited by a detachment of the common enemy, evidently on a tour of observation. Next morning their tracks were visible in the road near the river, showing how they had come down and where they halted to inspect the camp, as also their return. Their purpose evidently was to steal our horses; but they must have seen the sentinels and concluded it would not be a safe investment of time or labor. Had the command been less vigilant we would doubtless have made the remainder of our tour on foot, as many a command has already done in this country. Pleasant prospect, is it not? where one stands an even chance of being shot with a rifle-ball or an arrow as he sleeps, and does not know when he wakes up but he may have to cross deserts and mountains on foot before he reaches any point inhabited by white people. But I suppose in these war times, when men are slain every day by thousands, such incidents must appear very tame and commonplace. A few years ago I would have regarded my tour through Arizona as something of an achievement. Now I write the details with a humiliating consciousness that they are scarcely worthy of record, except as pictures of everyday life in a country but little known.

As the main object of our journey down in this direction was to ascertain the fate of our American friends who had been waylaid, we posted up notices advising them of our movements in case they should pass along the same road; and determined after some consultation to proceed to Magdalena, Sonora, so as to intercept them in case they had started to return by the way of Guyainas. A few miles beyond Calabasas we encountered a party of Mexicans and Yaqui Indians, on their way up to the placers on the Colorado River, from whom we learned that Mr. Butterworth and his party had passed through Magdalena eight days before. The Mexicans said they met them on the road between Magdalena and Hermosillo, and that they were in an ambulance with a white cover to it, and were traveling "muy racio," with their rifles in their hands. The cover to the ambulance, and some other details, showing the manner in which the Apaches had cut away the leather, identified our friends, and we were satisfied it would be impossible for us to overtake them. It was necessary, however, that we should continue our journey to Magdalena in order to procure a fresh supply of provisions, as we were nearly out, and there was but little prospect of procuring any thing at Santa Cruz.

This day's journey through the valley of Nogales, or the "walnut-trees," was one of the most pleasant of our trip. Every mile we traveled the country improved in beauty and fertility. Grass up to our horses' shoulders covered the valley, and the hills were clothed with luxuriant groves of oak. Much of the country reminded me of the coast range in California.

We stopped a while at the boundary-line to examine the monument erected by Colonel Emory in 1855. Very little of it now remains save an unshapely pile of stones. Wandering bands of Sonorians, in their hatred of every thing American, had doubtless mutilated it as an expression of national antipathy. These people say they never consented to the sale of any portion of Sonora, and still regard Arizona as legitimately a part of their territory.

I could not help regretting, as I looked beyond the boundary of our territorial possessions, that we had not secured, by purchase or negotiation, a line sufficiently far south to afford us a port on the Gulf of California. Without such a port Arizona will always be difficult of access. Major Fergusson, in his report of a reconnaissance from Port Lobos to Tucson, via Caborca and Arivaca, demonstrates clearly the vast importance of this strip of territory, not only to Arizona but to Mesilla and a large portion of New Mexico. He shows also the urgent desire of the people of the South to secure it, together with Arizona, and the advantages it would give them as a port for their Pacific commerce, in the event of a permanent division of the Union. General Carleton, in transmitting this report to Washington, urges the importance of securing this strip of territory from Mexico before it becomes a possession of France. I do not believe our Government, in the multiplicity of its present labors, is quite aware of the importance of the proposed purchase. It would give to Arizona and its rich mineral regions an easy and direct communication with the Pacific Ocean. It would encourage the settlement of the country, by affording facilities for the transportation of mining and agricultural implements and supplies of all kinds, which can now be had only at enormous expense. It would open a route for a railway to the ocean from the valley of the Mesilla. The country is for the most part nearly a level plain, and a very small expenditure of money would make one of the finest wagon-roads in the world from La Libertad to Tucson. The total distance, as measured by Major Fergusson, is 211 miles. It is to be hoped our Government will take this matter into consideration at as early a period as practicable.

WRECKS.

I WALKED one day alone upon the shore,
Watching the pale clouds in the sultry sky,
And out at sea the ships which drifted by,
Hearing, as in a dream, the waves' dull roar.

The slanting sun shone white along the sand,
Strewn with green sea-weed and with crimson shells
Out of the ocean's dim, mysterious cells,
Jeweling all the broad skirts of the land.

The salt sea-breeze blew inland toward the west;
The sea-gulls darted past me in their flight;
The blue waves flashed with phosphorescent light,
Heaving and swaying in their wild unrest.

Landward they rolled to smite the gray old rocks,
The bald old rocks, which stood with shoulders bare,
All scarred and seamed, under the sun's broad glare,
And feet immersed, waiting the wild waves' shocks.

Along the shore were skeletons of wrecks,
Fair ships that once had sailed the purple seas,
Laden with spices and with fragrant teas;
And smiling passengers had paced their decks.

VOL. XXX.—No. 175.—C

I looked across the seething harbor bar,
And heard in fancy women weep and wail,
I saw sad faces that with fright were pale,
And struggling forms which clung to mast and spar.

"Alas!" I thought, "poor souls, with land so near,
After long days upon the pathless deep,
At last beneath the ocean's waves to sleep,
Away from home and those whom they held dear."

I walked the city's crowded streets once more,
And past me rolled the tide of human-kind,
And there I saw sad wrecks which called to mind
My lonely wanderings by the wild sea-shore.

How fair they seemed when sailing forth from land;
What precious freight in golden hopes they bore;
What fond eyes watched them from the fading shore;
The winds which filled their sails how soft and bland!

But soon the storm loomed black within the sky,
And mast and rudder, spar and shining sail
Were torn and shattered in the furious gale;
And thus upon Life's sea they pass us by!

PORTION OF BABBAGE'S DIFFERENCE ENGINE.

RECREATIONS OF A PHILOSOPHER.

"CHARLES BABBAGE, Esq., M.A.," as he calls himself, is known to scientific men as the author of the Calculating Machine, one of the most complicated and ingenious contrivances of human invention for lightening the burdens of the memory and the intellect. He is better known to readers of English newspapers as the persistent opponent of street music, and persecutor of organ-grinders and their monkeys. Like some other philosophers Mr. Babbage has a high opinion of his own merits, and a poor opinion of most of his contemporary lovers of wisdom. Nevertheless, he is not above amusing the world as well as instructing it; and in a recently published volume he takes the public into his confidence, and tells it some pleasant stories concerning the pursuits and mishaps of a philosopher in this nineteenth century.

He begins by telling us that he has had frequent requests from printers for his life, and on various terms; some offering to pay him for the autobiographic volume, others willing to be paid for printing it, and yet others ready to print without pay to either the philosophic author and subject or to themselves. One ingenious publisher made him a distinct offer to print what and as much as he chose for tenpence a line. It does not appear that his offer was accepted.

Mr. Babbage is in doubt about his origin and remote ancestry. He flattered himself, indeed, that he was descended from Tubal-Cain, who was, like himself, an ingenious worker in iron; but the reminder of a friend that Tubal-Cain also invented the organ put to naught this hypothesis—for Mr. Babbage will allow no kinship with the patron of the organ-grinding craft.

He tells us that in his childhood he was noted for a passion to examine the inside of his toys, which commonly resulted in their destruction. Being sent to boarding-school at the age of five, he was troubled with doubts as to the existence of a devil, and, to solve these, made an attempt to raise the devil by the orthodox and well-known way of saying the Lord's Prayer backward. He previously questioned his fellow-scholars closely as to the different shapes in which the Prince of Darkness was known to have presented himself, and learned that he had appeared as a rabbit, an owl, a black cat very frequently, a raven, and a man with cloven foot—the last commonly. His experiment, made in a garret, was unsuccessful, and therefore unsatisfactory; and still in doubt upon this point of faith, he determined to decide it by an appeal to chance. If he found a certain door open he would believe the Bible; if not, he would disbelieve. Unfortunately Mr. Babbage does not remember the result.

Later, at another school, he had a curious trial of pertinacity with Frederic Marryatt, afterward sea-captain and novelist. Young Babbage and some other boys undertook secretly to rise every morning at three, and silently slip to the school-room, there to study till half past five. Marryatt wanted to join this singular company, but was denied. He placed his bed across the edge of the door, in order to be wakened by Babbage when he went out, but this was softly removed; he tied twine to the door and to his foot, but this was cut; he fastened a chain to the door, but his antagonist, after a defeat for a single night, procured a pair of pliers and unbent one of the links; then Marryatt made all fast with a stout chain and padlock, too strong for the other's efforts and instruments, and thereupon Babbage "changed his base," to use a term sadly familiar to us Americans; he tied a string to the chain, and when Marryatt fell asleep gave it a pull; up jumped the latter, but found no one near the door. His opponent repeated this trick several times during the night, and succeeded in annoying Marryatt, but not in getting out. At last a compromise was effected; the future novelist became a member of the three o'clock club, but turned it into a frolic and banished study.

While at Cambridge the embryo philosopher undertook to write a grammar and dictionary for a universal language, but gave it up. In his studies of mathematics he found the system of notation of Leibnitz far better than the system in use at Cambridge, and held private meetings to encourage the substitution of d's for dots. The society he thus formed undertook to print an essay, for which Mr. Babbage cleverly proposed a title, which at the same time hit off some of the theological disputes then raging. He suggested that the essay should be called, "The Principles of pure D-ism, in opposition to the Dot-age of the University."

Among the university clubs at that time was a "Ghost Club," which saw no ghosts; and another called the "Extractors," which had the following rules:

1st. Every member shall communicate his address to the Secretary once in six months.

2d. If this communication is delayed beyond twelve months, it shall be taken for granted that his relatives had shut him up as insane.

3d. Every effort, legal and illegal, shall be made to get him out of the mad-house. Hence the name of the club—The Extractors.

4th. Every candidate for admission as a member shall produce six certificates—three that he is sane, and three others that he is insane.

We come now to the great work of Mr. Babbage, that has employed him for over forty years, and which still engages his attention—The Calculating or Difference Engine. The idea of contriving a machine which should perform the drudgery of mathematical and arithmetical calculations first occurred to him in 1812, at Cambridge. In 1822 he completed his first machine. In 1823 he began a large one for the British Government, a representation of the finished portion of which is shown on the previous page. This prints its results, so that all errors, even those of the compositor or type-setter, are avoided.

What, then, is a Calculating or Difference Machine? the reader asks. Perhaps a brief history of Mr. Babbage's invention will convey to the general reader the clearest and most interesting notion of this wonderful conglomeration of wheels, which does the drudgery of a hundred first-rate mathematicians without tiring, and without a possibility of error.

Mr. Babbage relates that he was one day sitting in the rooms of the Analytical Society at Cambridge, with his head leaned forward upon the table, musing; a friend who entered asked, "What are you dreaming about?" to which the philosopher replied, "I am thinking that all these tables of logarithms might be calculated by machinery." Now the calculating machine, the fruit of this thought, does—being moved by the turning of a crank—calculate tables of logarithms, and other tables necessary to the labors of all devoted to the higher branches of mathemetics. Feed it with figures, set it properly, and it will turn out the required results with un-failing accuracy and with great speed; and not only that—it prints these results on a prepared surface, from which stereotype casts can be and are taken for the use of the printer. But it does more even than this; for it actually performs the wonderful feat of correcting any error of the attendants whose duty it is to feed this intelligent creature with the crude figures which it is to work up. If he inserts the wrong numbers it rejects them, for it will not calculate an impossible or absurd problem.

Mr. Babbage tells us that he did not think it useful to construct a machine which should execute only the mere isolated operations of arithmetic. Such a machine would be too limited in its powers. But “the method of differences supplied a general principle by which all tables might be computed, through limited intervals, by one uniform process;” and this method required the use of mechanism for addition only. The “method of differences” may be briefly explained to consist in forming tables of results, by means of successive additions of the constant term of difference. Thus, suppose it were required to be known what is the value of any number of pounds of meat, from 1 to 100, at five cents per pound; the shortest way for a school-boy would be to multiply the pounds by five, and set down the result. But the mathematician tells him that by this process, which secures each time an independent result, there is no possibility of checking error in the completed table except by revising separately each of its hundred parts; whereas, if the table had been formed by successive additions of five, the constant difference, an examination of the last term would have at once proved the correctness of the whole table. “But that is so slow!” Therefore, said Mr. Babbage, let us perform these additions by machinery.

Now, to take a more intricate example, let any boy who reads this lay down five marbles separately in a row. Then let him place two marbles under each one but the first; and next three more under each group, beginning with the third; and again four more under each, beginning with the fourth; and so on, commencing always one group later, and adding one marble more each time. He would have such an arrangement as this:

Now he could with a little trouble count the marbles in each group; but suppose he should desire to know how many marbles would be contained, not in the seventh of such an ascending series, which he has, but in the thirtieth, say, how is he to discover this? If he will analyze his groups he will see that they are composed by additions made after a certain steady and regular scale. Thus his table will stand:

Number of the Group.	Number of Marbles in each Group.	Difference between the number of Marbles in each Group and that in the next.
2	3	2	1
3	6	3	1
4	10	4	1
5	15	5	1
7	28	7

Now this table can be calculated, like that concerning butcher’s meat, in two ways—by mere addition, or by a method deducible from the elements shown in the table, by which each result would be obtained independently. Thus, if you desire the number of marbles or units in the fifth group,

Take the number of the group.....	5
Add 1 to this.....	6
Multiply these.....	30
Divide by 2.....	15

and you have the number of marbles in the fifth group.

If, now, the boy asks, “What is the use of such tables?” Mr. Babbage replies that they are of great use—the very Table about which we have been reasoning possesses a special name—it is called a Table of Triangular Numbers. Almost every general collection of Tables hitherto published contains portions of it of more or less extent. Above a century ago a volume in small quarto, containing the first 20,000 triangular numbers, was published at the Hague by E. De Joncourt, A.M., and Professor of Philosophy. I can not resist quoting the author’s enthusiastic expression of the happiness he enjoyed in composing his celebrated work:

“The Trigonals here to be found, and nowhere else, are exactly elaborate. Let the candid reader make the best of these numbers, and feel (if possible) in perusing my work the pleasure I had in composing it. That sweet joy may arise from such contemplations can not be denied. Numbers and lines have many charms unseen by vulgar eyes, and only discovered to the unwearied and respectful sons of Art. In features the serpentine line (who starts not at the name) produces beauty and love; and in numbers high powers and humble roots give soft delight. Lo! the raptured arithmetician! Easily satisfied, he asks no Brussels lace, nor a coach and six. To calculate contents his liveliest desires, and obedient numbers are within his reach.”

It may now be stated that mathematicians have discovered that all the tables most important for practical purposes, such as those relating to Astronomy and Navigation, can, although they may not possess any constant differences, still be calculated in detached portions by that method. Hence the importance of having machinery to calculate by differences, which, if well made, can not err; and which, if carelessly set, presents in the last term it calculates the power of verification of every antecedent term.

We find, then, in the first place, that the calculating machine or Difference Engine of Mr. Babbage performs its useful labor so far by the process of addition. Now he remarks that if it requires a certain number of seconds for a man to add numbers, as of course it would take him five times as long to calculate a sum having five places of figures, as

$$\begin{array}{r} 45321 \\ 32456 \\ \hline 77777 \end{array}$$

But by properly-arranged machinery these five separate processes could be carried on simultaneously; and it would make no difference in the time required if there were a dozen places instead of five. So much is gained, then, in point of speed.

But suppose there is "one to carry?" Suppose you wanted to add

How are you going to teach the machine to remember? And not only to remember what and where to "carry," but to make it perform this office. Mr. Babbage says:

"The mechanical means I employed to make these carriages bear some slight analogy to the operation of the faculty of memory. A toothed wheel had the ten digits marked upon its edge; between the nine and the zero a projecting tooth was placed. Whenever any wheel, in receiving addition, passed from nine to zero, the projecting tooth pushed over a certain lever. Thus, as soon as the nine seconds of time required for addition were ended, every carriage which had become due was indicated by the altered position of its lever. An arm now went round, which was so contrived that the act of replacing that lever caused the carriage which its position indicated to be made to the next figure above. But this figure might be a nine, in which case, in passing to zero, it would put over its lever, and so on. By placing the arms spirally round an axis these successive carriages were accomplished.

"Multitudes of contrivances were designed, and almost endless drawings made, for the purpose of economizing the time and simplifying the mechanism of carriage. In that portion of the Difference Engine in the Exhibition of 1862 the time of carriage has been reduced to about one-fourth part of what was at first required.

"At last having exhausted, during years of labor, the principle of successive carriages, it occurred to me that it might be possible to teach mechanism to accomplish another mental process, namely—to foresee. This idea occurred to me in October, 1834. It cost me much thought, but the principle was arrived at in a short time. As soon as that was attained, the next step was to teach the mechanism which could foresee to act upon that foresight. This was not so difficult: certain mechanical means were soon devised which, although very far from simple, were yet sufficient to demonstrate the possibility of constructing such machinery. The process of simplifying this form of carriage occupied me, at intervals, during a long series of years."

If now the reader will turn to the engraving of Mr. Babbage's machine he will notice three columns, each containing six wheels, each wheel having upon its face the ten digits. The lower wheel represents units, the next tens, and so on, the last of course standing in each column for tens of thousands. On the right hand column the table to be calculated by the machine is expressed. It will of course receive or express any number up to 99999. The second column is the first difference column, a title which will be comprehended by reference to the marble problem. The third column is the second difference column; by these two are expressed and calculated the differences.

Now, Mr. Babbage tells us:

"The mechanism is so contrived that whatever may be the numbers placed respectively on the figure-wheels of each of the three columns, the following succession of operations will take place as long as the handle is moved:

"1st. Whatever number is found upon the column of first differences will be added to the number found upon the table column.

"2d. The same first difference remaining upon its own column, the number found upon the column of second differences will be added to that first difference.

"It appears, therefore, that with this small portion of the engine any table may be computed by the method of differences, provided neither the table itself, nor its first and second differences, exceed five places of figures.

"If the whole engine had been completed it would have had six orders of differences, each of twenty places of figures, while the three first columns would each have had half a dozen additional figures."

Our philosopher adds: "On two occasions I have been asked, 'Pray, Mr. Babbage, if you put into the machine wrong figures, will the right answers come out?' I am not able rightly to apprehend the kind of confusion of ideas that could provoke such a question. I did, however, explain the following property, which might in some measure approach toward an answer to it. It is possible to construct the Analytical Engine in such a manner that after the question is once communicated to the engine it may be stopped at any turn of the handle, and set on again as often as may be desired. At each stoppage every figure-wheel throughout the engine which is capable of being moved without breaking may be moved on to any other digit. Yet after each of these apparent falsifications the engine will be found to make the next calculation with perfect truth. The explanation is very simple, and the property itself useless."

Mr. Babbage is now engaged upon the construction of an "Analytical Engine"—a larger calculating machine, of the most various and general powers. For this he has so perfected the system of carrying tens in addition that he has reduced the actual time required for the addition of two numbers of any number of digits to nine units of time for the addition and one for the carriage. By its help the following astounding results are attained in the simpler operations of arithmetic:

Sixty additions or subtractions may be completed and printed in one minute.

One multiplication of two numbers, each of fifty figures, in one minute.

One division of a number having one hundred places of figures by another of fifty in one minute.

We have already mentioned that the machine calls for a table of numbers when it needs it in the process of a calculation, and refuses to accept the wrong table at the hands of the attendant. There is here an apparent choice of means, a power to distinguish between right and wrong which seems almost human. But not quite, as the following curious incident will demonstrate. Mr. Babbage amused himself by examining into the plan upon which an automaton might be constructed to play a game of skill, such as chess. He satisfied himself that any such game might be played by an automaton. Having got so far, he thought of constructing an automaton who should play at the boys' and girls' game of tit-tat-to. He found it easy to calculate all the possible combinations of this simple game; and he sketched the means by which his machine-man should be properly guided. He readily provided beforehand by calculation for every possible move, because each followed necessarily another—except in the case where, of two possible moves, neither was actually preferable, but each was equally inductive to winning the game. "In this case no reason existed within the machine to direct its choice," and unless some provision were made the machine would attempt to make two contradictory motions!

In connection with the Calculating Machine, Mr. Babbage has an interesting reminiscence of the Duke of Wellington: "One morning the Duke called in Dorset Street with the late Countess of Wilton, to whom he wished me to show the Difference Engine. Its home was at that period in my drawing-room. We sat round it while I explained its mode of action and made it calculate some small table of numbers. When I had concluded my explanation, Lady Wilton, addressing me, said, 'Now, Mr. Babbage, can you tell me what was your greatest difficulty in contriving this machine?' I had never previously asked myself that question; but I knew the nature of it well. It arose not from the difficulty of contriving mechanism to execute each individual movement, for I had contrived very many different modes of executing each; but it really arose from the almost innumerable combinations among all these contrivances—a number so vast that no human mind could examine them all. It instantly occurred to me that a similar difficulty must present itself to a general commanding a vast army when about to engage in a conflict with another army of equal or of greater amount. I therefore thought it must have been felt by the Duke of Wellington, and I determined to make a kind of psychological experiment upon him. Carefully abstaining from any military term, I commenced my explanation to Lady Wilton. I soon perceived by his countenance that the Duke was already in imagination again in Spain. I then went on boldly with the explanation of my own mechanical difficulty; and when I had concluded the Duke turned to Lady Wilton and said, 'I know that difficulty well.'"

At a dinner party the characters of the French marshals became the subject of conversation. The Duke, being appealed to, pointed out freely their various qualities, and assigned to each his peculiar excellence. One question, the most highly interesting of all, naturally presented itself. One of the party, addressing the Duke, said: "Well, Sir, how was it that, with such various great qualities, you whipped them all, one after another?"

The Duke was evidently taken by surprise. He paused for a moment or two, and then said: "Well, I don't know exactly how it was; but I think that if any unexpected circumstance occurred in the midst of a battle, which deranged its whole plan, I could perhaps organize another plan more quickly than most of them."

The poet Rogers was another friend of our philosopher. Once, at a large dinner party, Mr. Rogers was speaking of an inconvenience arising from the custom, then commencing, of having windows formed of one large sheet of plate-glass. He said that a short time ago he sat at dinner with his back to one of these single panes of plate-glass: it appeared to him that the window was wide open, and such was the force of imagination that he actually caught cold! Mr. Babbage neatly capped this story by an experience of his own. Being in the country, and without a night-cap, he feared to catch cold, and it occurred to him to tie a string over his head under his chin. This device satisfied his imagination or habit, and he slept as comfortably as though his head had been enveloped in the customary night-cap.

He knew, also, Vidocq, the celebrated French thief-taker, who, it seems, had a remarkable power of altering his height, which must have been the envy of many of his victims. He could make himself, by some curious contortion of his body, appear to be about an inch and a half shorter than he really was. He found this faculty very useful as a disguise. Mr. Babbage records that Vidocq was not at all an adept in picking locks.

The recreations of a philosopher naturally partake of his general cast of mind. Thus we are not surprised to read that Mr. Babbage nearly drowned himself in trying a contrivance of his own for walking on the water; that he suffered himself to be baked in an oven; that he is an adept in picking locks; and that he delights in the abstruse art of deciphering, which is practiced occasionally in these days by the staff officers of some of our generals when an enemy's dispatch in cipher falls into their hands. While on this last subject he mentions an amusement called squaring words, which we recommend as a pretty winter-evening game for the parlor or the country fireside. It is thus practiced: Let the given word to be squared be Dean. It is to be written horizontally and also vertically, thus:

And it is required to fill up the blanks with such letters that each vertical column shall be the same as its corresponding horizontal column, thus:

n e s t

Nor are we surprised that when this philosopher has a nuisance to contend with he makes a systematic statement of his annoyance. It is well known that Mr. Babbage has been for some years waging war with the itinerant street musicians who abound in London. He gives the following curious list of what he calls the "instruments of torture permitted by the Government to be in daily and nightly use in the streets of London:" Organs, brass bands, fiddles, harps, harpsichords, hurdy-gurdies, flageolets, drums, bagpipes, accordions, half-penny whistles, tom-toms, trumpets, and the human voice in various forms. The performers he classifies too:

Musicians.	Instruments.
Italians . . . . .	Organs.
Germans . . . . .	Brass bands.
Natives of India . . . . .	Tom-toms.
English . . . . .	Brass bands, fiddles, etc.
The lowest class of clubs . . . . .	Bands with double drum.

He asserts that during the last twelve years one-fourth of his working power has been destroyed by these street nuisances. This is our philosopher's pet grievance.

DEAR MOTHER.

I LOCKED my hand in hers, and said,
"Let me go with her through this dark;
For all the good and ill of life
Has touched us with the self-same mark.
Some bitter pains I comprehend,
But not the absence of her love,
Whose deep, unfailing tenderness
Would any lighter friend reprove."

I called her—but the mother-look
Was blotted out in Death's eclipse;
And, vaguely desolate, I shrank
Before those altering eyes and lips.

O God! since ever I could speak
My voice had fallen on faithful ears;
'Twas "Mother!" in my triumph hour,
And "Mother!" in my time of tears.

I saw her going from my grasp
Beyond the boundaries of Time—
Beyond the life her soul had made Through love and suffering sublime.
I could not shield, nor share, nor save;
She drifted deathward all alone:
Her heart insensate to my pain,
Her ear unheeding of my moan.

Yet mother-love, rare mother-love,
Responsive in the throes of death,
The soul triumphant over clay,
Was victor of her latest breath.
Sudden into her darkened eyes
Flashed Love and Memory at the last;
And then the spirit's radiance set,
And the dear face was overcast.

Only the shell which held the seed;
Only the casket of the gem;
But all the bitterness for us,
And all the victory for them!
For us, the deep, slow-closing wound;
For us, the haunting pain of years;
The dull, vague, aching sense of loss
Alternate with our passionate tears.

Not yet the creed of Faith can fill
This bitter want, these empty arms:
It will not soothe me now to know
That she is locked from life's alarms;
For when I see this pale, strange face,
So like, yet so unlike her own,
I only feel that she is gone,
And I must learn to live alone.

I know this is not mother now;
And yet I cling about this clay,
And watch to see that look break out
Which met me but the other day.
So calm! A furrow on the brow
Still lingers. 'Twas the work of years;
A mother's tears—a mother's pangs—
Mute token of a mother's cares!

Somewhere, I know, she waits for me,
In some bright nook of ageless lands;
But oh! I miss the fleshly proofs
Which craving human love demands.
To see her dresses laid aside,
To take the books she used to read,
And find the flowers she placed within—
O mother! this is pain indeed.

THE PIGOT MURDER.

I HAD been eight years on the special detective force in Philadelphia when that trouble about Joe Myers turned up. Joe was an old chum of mine: the only red-headed fellow I ever did trust, by-the-way, but it was a matter of propinquity; my father's tavern and old Pete Myers's shop were close beside each other, on the L—— turnpike; Joe and I were in the same classes in the district school; and after that, worked together on Squire Hall's farm, year in and year out, until I got that chance of an opening up in town. The fact is, whatever success I met with there is due to a succession of lucky chances—hits, as I may say, at discoveries in my line of business, rather than to any astuteness of mine. That troubled me but little; it was enough that I did succeed; at the end of the eight years had a snug marble-slabbed brick house out on Green Hill, which my wife had as prettily fitted up as any of the old blooded nob in town. She had a fanciful way of hanging plant-baskets about, and matching colors in carpets and the other trumpery, that set off a room somehow; she got up prime little game suppers for our friends, in winter, too; we had the boys at good schools; and, altogether, bid fair to settle down early into a comfortable, easy middle age. Next to Pike (the chief) I had the best salary on the staff; and no man on the force was so often called on for fancy jobs; and they always pay well.

Things move slower in the country, you know. Joe, in the mean time, had only come to be a sort of steward for Hall—an agent for selling his trees; for the Squire had gone into the nursery business within the last three years.

I think he and Joe were both bitten by the morus multicaulis mania, too, which raged about that time, and tried it in partnership. I know Hall had silk-worm galleries put up back of his forcing-houses.

Whenever Joe came up on business, and I saw his name among the arrivals, I'd go up to the hotel and have him down for an hour's talk. He seemed a dull, plodding fellow enough, with the vague, uncertain lout and shamle of the country clinging to his habit of thought as to his clothes; but doggedly in earnest in his work, or in his few likings and dislikings. He was a prime favorite with my wife, I remember. One night he happened up when her cousins from Boston were dining with us; and I confess I was conscious of his baggy clothes, and freckled face, and horse-laugh, and irritated by them; but I don't believe Jane once thought of them. She never weighs outward appearance enough, I think. It was on that night he told me about Susy Birt, I recollect. After the others were gone he and I sat over the dining-room fire sipping a glass of egg-nog, when I said:

"Myers, it's time you were taking a wife, and getting a snug little home of your own. There's a place in your head as bare as my palm: it will be too late to think of soon if you don't look sharp. Years tell on the women, Joe, at your age and mine."

Joe had emptied his glass and set it down, and now sat staring in the fire, chafing his red whiskers.

"I know it's late. It is six years now since we've been promised. It was not our fault."

"Eh? Who did you say, Joe?"

"I didn't say. But it's Susy Birt."

"Oho! I know her," I added, more gravely. "She is a true woman. I am glad to hear of it, Myers. Very glad."

Joe nodded once or twice in his earnest fashion.

"Yes; that's what she is—genuine stuff. If we had had our hands free we could have married five years ago. But I have been staving off that mortgage on the farm that father left, you know; it's all there is for Bill and me. And Susan's father and mother go with her when she marries. That's providing for three, you see. We counted it up many a time, but could make nothing of it; so she has gone on teaching at Pilkstown, and I have dogged on with Hall. He's close, the Squire is, Caldwell: I ought to have got on faster than I have," pulling his beard, thoughtfully. "Sharp and close."

"How about the mortgage, Myers?"

"It is a man named Pigot holds it, down in Waynesboro'. He threatens to foreclose this fall. But I have great hopes of doing a good stroke in wool this season. I've a venture of my own in that: if I do, I'll pay Pigot off, and bring matters to a focus with Susy. I'll risk our starting with the old folks. This is a miserable way of dragging along," getting up and stretching himself—"living alone, Caldwell. And the girl is getting thin and wearing out. It's hard we can't live while we do live—as other people."

Seeing how much he felt I turned the subject for him. But I took more interest in Joe after that night, and Jane and I used to look every week to see how wool was quoted. But wool went down at an unprecedented rate, and Myers came no more up to town that season.

"I suppose his man Pigot will foreclose the mortgage," I said.

"Poor Susy!" said my wife, with a sigh.

It is incredible the compassion that little woman has for all of her sex who can not marry. I rather like it in her, though it does make her a bit of a match-maker.

It was two months before we heard any thing of Myers; then intelligence came startling enough. One day I met Boyd Stroud (a hatter down in L——) on Chestnut Street, and asked him up for dinner.

"Any thing new down in the old place, Mr. Stroud?" I asked as the soup went off.

"News enough, I should say!" with the pride all country people have in their own gossip, when a chance morsel turns up. "Is it possible you haven't heard about Pigot? And you in that line of business too!"

"Pigot?" I glanced at Jane. "There's a Pigot in Waynesboro'; you don't mean him?"

"That's the man. But he was up in L—— half his time."

"Well?"

"Well, he was murdered up in our place. It was a foul deed, Sir—a bloody deed," growing hot. "I am surprised you have not heard of it. Why, the papers are filled with it."

"It is a bad business, no doubt. But your fish is growing cold, Mr. Stroud. This Pigot, my dear," to Jane, "is the man who held Myers's mortgage."

"Yes, I remember."

"The mortgage, hey?" said Stroud, sharply. "You knew about that? It's the worst feature against Myers in the case."

I dropped my fork.

"What do you mean? What has Myers to do with the case?"

"Oh, nothing," coolly, pleased at having touched me at last. "Only he's charged with the murder, and it is pretty certain he did it."

I knew how to control my face, so only said, "Tut! tut!" and went on with my dinner before asking any questions; but Jane flamed out, and said she was as likely herself to commit a murder as Mr. Myers, and after a moment or two grew very pale, and asked to be excused from the table.

I picked the story out of Stroud by piecemeal. Myers, as I said, was a sort of agent for Squire Hall, and for several years had boarded with him and his wife. There was no other man in the house at the present time; nor, indeed, any women but an old deaf cook, the other servants having left after harvest. Pigot, it seems, had come up to L—— on his way to Philadelphia, and stopped at Squire Hall's. The one tavern in the town was only a wagon-stand, and the gentlemen of the place were in the habit of asking their friends home even more than is usual in country villages. Pigot had been in the house for a day or two. He and Myers did not meet on the friendliest footing the whole town knew, as part of Pigot's errand in town was to foreclose the mortgage on Joe's farm and put it under the hammer.

"Pigot was hard on him, there's no disputing that," Stroud said. "If it had not been for the fall in wool Joe could have paid him last month. As it was, Hall would likely have come to the rescue in January, when his payments came in—so we all thought, at least."

"I thought Hall was a close man to deal with?"

"Well, yes. Still, him and Joe's pulled in harness together a long time. It's likely he'd have seen him through come New-Year's."

Hall, however, had not offered to see him through now. The mortgage was to be closed on a Monday. On Saturday night hard words passed between the two men at the supper-table, Joe swearing that he knew a way to hold to his own. The next morning Pigot did not appear as usual. No one entered his room until the bells were ringing for church; then a boy who did odd chores about the kitchen and outhouses was sent in, and found him dead in his bed, his face, chest, and arms already discolored.

"An effect only to be produced," said Stroud, evidently quoting the country paper, "by the infusion of the most virulent poison into the blood. In fact, a vial of the blood," laying down his fork, "and his stomach were sent here to a chemist for examination."

"Then they arrested Myers?"

"Of course."

"The blockheads! As if his murder of Pigot would have any effect on the mortgage business!"

Stroud looked rather damped. "There are other circumstances that tell against him," he said.

But although I bluffed it off with Boyd Stroud, I was secretly disquieted. Joe was not the man to reason, pro or con. He was a pig-headed fool when his prejudices were concerned; the very temperament on which revenge would have a maddening impulse.

In the two months that elapsed before the trial (for it was brought before the next court) I studied the minutiae of the case with a more rigid scrutiny than I had often bestowed on my own heaviest strokes of business; but I had a strange feeling that made it impossible for me to talk of it, even to Jane. Nor did she speak of it to me. When the L—— County Times was brought in we passed the yellow sleazy sheet from one to the other without a word. Two weeks before the trial, however, one evening, she laid it down, and sat resting her elbows on the table, and her head in her hands.

"You are very busy just now, Philip?" at last.

"Yes. I'm on the track at last of that Sleaman lay. It is just three years since I undertook that job."

(I've heard men in my line warn each other never to trust a petticoat; but I will say that Jane's clear head and ready wit have stood me in good place many's the time in my tightest puzzles. So I keep her posted generally.)

"You will not be able to leave town, then, this month?"

(Bless your soul! I knew what that little woman was up to from her first word.)

"Yes; I am going out of town next week."

"To L——?" quickly.

"Yes, Jane. I'll see what I can do."

"God bless you, Philip!" her blue eyes filling, and her pink cheek flushed. "Don't scruple to sacrifice any money to go. I feel sure it will all be right if you are there. You don't know how I have prayed for that poor Myers; such a simple-hearted, dogged soul as he is. And there's nobody there with a grain of wit to help him through: I see that," tapping the paper with her finger impatiently. It did not make our evening less warm and cozy that Jane overrated her great lumbering husband so much, as you may suppose.

Well, I went down to L—— the next Monday: a half-day's journey by railway, the rest by the old coaching—tiresome enough. I stopped a bit out of town at the Weirich Inn; for, although I had not visited my old home for nearly a dozen years, and, except by Stroud, Myers himself, and one or two others, stood no chance of recognition, I thought it best to keep quiet. It would do Joe no good with the thick-headed jury that he had a town "special" on his side. "Set a thief to catch a thief" is a motto with the country people.

The town of L—— is one of those dead-alive villages in the low, rolling Pennsylvanian hills which wakens up on Sundays long enough for its inhabitants to pace slowly to Seceder church, and listen to sermons three hours long. It has its wooden market-place, to which a dozen wagons repair leisurely twice a week from the neighboring farms; a squat brick tavern with a pump and trough before the door, where the coach stops once a day; the court-house on the edge of the town, shut up except for two weeks in the year, its pavement overgrown with grass and star-wort; no other central objects of interest, unless, indeed, you count Jim Allen's smithy and young Bob Fawcett's smart drug-shop down at the corner. You may guess, therefore, the buzz and hurry of the town as the time drew near for the county court, when the dusty house would be open and a trial for murder going on in it—a case, too, belonging entirely to themselves. They were a good, amiable herd of people down in L——; but they did gloat over that murder, both men and women. It was market-day when I arrived—a cool October day. I put on a farmer's coat and felt-hat, and walked from the Weirich house into town. How the smell of the hemlock woods and stubble brought back the old turnip-digging days to me, when Myers and I worked in Hall's truck-patch! I meant to call on Hall as I went in, but seeing some carriages in the lane as I passed put it off until my return, and made straight for Garfield's office. Garfield was prosecuting attorney: I had met him once or twice in the city, and found him to be a sharp, wide-awake fellow, with sufficient good-feeling at bottom to keep him honest. He was conducting the matter against Myers alone, and I knew could give me clearer insight into it than Joe's own counsel, a muddy-headed old chap, who belonged to L—— since he was born. I think his name was Woodsel. Garfield was a New Yorker.

He had a dingy little office, up two pair of stairs, hung round with maps, and full of tobacco-smoke, for he had a pipe in his mouth and was smoking while he worked out a problem in chess. That's the way these fellows in country towns idle out their lives, and live meanwhile on the fat of the land.

"What the deuce! Caldwell!" he said, eying me from head to foot. "I took you for Sander-son off the Ridge Farm. Sit down, sit down! What have you been about in the last year? Ferreting out state secrets, eh?"

"No, this is a private stroke of business."

He stopped a minute. "I see," gravely, "you've come down to look after Myers. I heard you were old chums. Well, I'm glad of it; but it's of little use, Caldwell, I'm afraid."

"Is it so squally for Joe, then?"

"Yes." He went on to outline the evidence as it stood then. Purely circumstantial, but just such as would tell on a jury like the one that would be apt to try Myers. After the men parted at supper (Joe sullen and cursing under his breath), Pigot had gone straight to his room to write letters, and had not left it that night. Myers sat moodily by the dining-room stove, his face buried in his hands, and on Bob Fawcett's coming in to chat an hour with the Squire, got up and went out without speaking; did not return until after ten that night, when Fawcett and Hall heard him go up to his own room, and laughed to themselves at Joe's ill-temper. Mrs. Hall and the cook had seen him meanwhile walking up and down the path to the stables.

"Now nobody in L—— could comprehend a man's working off excited feeling by pacing about in the dark and cold," said Garfield. "Only a murder could warrant such conduct to them. Fawcett left the house at half past ten. Hall reports that all was quiet in Pigot's and Myers's rooms when he went to bed, and farther evidence there is none, except that of Dr. Hopper, who passed the house about one o'clock on his way to visit a patient. He says there was a bright light in two of the upper windows, caused apparently by some one carrying a candle from place to place. The windows are those of Pigot's room."

"The chemist who analyzed the blood—?"

"Alleges the presence of poison, but curiously enough can not define its nature. How malignant it was we can judge by the effects."

"But there was no wound, Mr. Garfield?"

"Yes, there was," drawing his chair closer.

"Now to my mind that's the oddest part of the affair. The discoloration of the head and neck all appeared to proceed, radiate, I might say, from two minute punctures in the throat just below the ear, not larger than if made by a needle. The poison used must, therefore, have been of the subtlest nature."

"Now, Garfield," I exclaimed, "I leave it to your common sense to say if Joe Myers was apt to have any knowledge of such Borgia-like treachery? Bah! I always take a man's groundwork of character into account. Myers would have given the fellow a wallop with the axe or kitchen shovel, perhaps, but as for puncturing with needles— I'm glad I know this. It satisfies me. Let who will have done the deed Myers is clear."

"Well, well!" Garfield tapped thoughtfully on the table with his pencil, and said nothing. But I saw that he agreed with me. "Myers's conduct after the arrest was against him," he added, after a pause. "He was dogged and sullen. Just what you would have expected, eh? Perhaps, perhaps! But if Joe is cleared it will be by no plotting of his. He is running his mastiff-neck straight into the halter."

"He has no friends to plot for him?"

Garfield looked at me sharply. "He has one. You know, I perceive? She's a good girl, that daughter of Birt's. It takes a thing like this to bring a woman out."

"Clear-headed, eh?"

"Caldwell, I wish you'd call on her," he said, earnestly. "If there's any link dropped, or hint to be given, she is the one to help you. She has been with me once or twice to talk the matter over. Go this morning. It's a thing of life and death to her, and so far she has been fighting alone."

"Where is Hall? Has he made no exertion in the matter?"

"Well, yes. But you see Hall is a slow-brained fellow, not used to look out sharply for any thing but his own interest. Susan's quick. All that Hall can urge is the point that Myers had no object to serve in the murder, as it would not actually alter his own position, and that Pigot had no money with him if he had wished to rob. Now nobody would suspect Joe of any motive but revenge."

I was silent. An odd idea struck me. No money with him?

"Pigot had brothers in Waynesboro'? One is a wool-dealer, I believe—"

"And the other is suspected of carrying on an underhand lottery on a tolerably extensive scale."

"Humph, yes! Well, I think I will take your advice and call on the girl."

Before I called, however, I stopped in the book-store and scribbled a letter to John Pigot, of Waynesboro'. It went by that night's mail.

The Birts lived in a little quiet lane, running down from the village street to the creek. They lived there when I was a boy, when Susy and I and a dozen others speared for frogs in the pond at the back of the garden. She was only a fat, giddy, freckled school-girl then, but had left a pleasant impression on me somehow. The house was unaltered. I stepped up on the shaky old wooden porch, covered with the same coral honey-suckle, and caught a glimpse of Mrs. Birt's milk-pans airing by the pump just as they did twelve years ago. But it would have been hard to recognize the thin pale woman who opened the door for me. The freckles were there on the homely, grave face as on the chubby, dimpled one of long ago, and the same mass of nut-brown hair pushed behind the ears, but that was all of the likeness. There was nothing pretty in this woman's face. Something better than beauty, maybe; it grew on me as I talked to her; a rare intelligence in the mobility of the lips and inflation of the delicate nostril; and in the quiet eyes a sort of thoroughness, truth—a melancholy fidelity, such as you see in the eyes of some horses that have been kindly used. A man in my business soon learns whom to trust. In five minutes I was talking of every phase of this matter with this girl, almost as much in earnest as she, and thoroughly en rapport with her. We were alone in the little "keeping-room:" and even to me there was something oddly strange in the contrast of the quiet of the hazy noon without, the garden blooms of purple and crimson hollyhocks and dahlias, the sleepy hum of the bees in the sun, and within the pale, intent face of this woman, and the smothered feeling in her soul of which it but feebly hinted. Her little school had vacation now: "it happened well, for I could not have thought of any thing else, and—this," she said, her hands clasped on the table before her, working together as if she were in a spasm. Otherwise she was perfectly still. She did not seem to doubt me from the first. "I know you will do what you can. But I have thought and thought, and nothing comes of it. And it matters to me," her voice growing low. "He is all I have." When I spoke cheerfully—"You don't know the people here," she said, in the same low, hopeless tone. "They are hounding him on to his death, because they always join in the same outcry. They don't know enough of life to judge fairly." But she was not bitter even then. "They all like Joe; they don't mean to be unjust. But it is a new thing—a murder; so they talk and argue day by day to keep up the excitement. They don't see the harm it does," with a sudden motion of the hand to her forehead, checked before made. I saw how thick and swollen the veins in her neck and head were. "A case of brain-fever in less than a week," I thought. "She must have something new to think of." I drew my chair sharply up to the pine table.

"Please attend to me, Miss Birt," I said. "If Myers is saved, you and I must do it. For Woodsel, he is a mere log; I remember him of old. The trial comes off in two weeks; of this time I can spare four days from other business to devote to it."

"Four days!" She smiled, bitterly; her very lips were white and dry.

"You think that is a narrow plank to interpose between a man and death? It will be enough, God helping us. My belief is this: that Pigot, most probably, had money with him—that he was murdered by some one cognizant of the fact; there is a sharp gang, I know, in the outskirts of L—— county. I am the more convinced of the truth of this guess by my knowledge of Hall's house; for, if you will remember, there is a slanting roof from the second story back by which an expert climber could easily have reached the chambers unheard. Let us but catch the slightest clew to such an attempt and we are safe. I leave you to watch; I can give but two days now, two at the time of the trial. Meanwhile I mean to prove that Pigot had money with him; the establishment of any other motive than revenge will be a strong premise in Joe's behalf."

I stopped short there, with half of my real thought untold; for the fact was, I wanted to occupy her mind by this harangue as much as any thing else. She had followed me, a curious change working out on her face, a sort of childish, breathless eagerness, her big dark eyes growing wet, her thin cheeks red. When I had finished she drew a gasping breath. "I see! He's safe, Joe is! Joe—" put her hand on my arm, and then turned to the window with a nervous half-cry and half-laugh. She was so much more credulous and silly and lovable a woman than I had expected to find when Garfield talked of her clear head. If ever this bout was over wouldn't Jane delight in coddling and making much of the girl up in the little parlor on Green Hill!

"It is growing late," I said, rising; "I will only see you once again, Miss Birt, most probably. I may have to run down to Waynesboro' to-night, and to-day I must sift the evidence. You will communicate with Myers?"

"I go there every evening," turning with the flush and trembling smile yet on her face.

The old Susy Birt was not dead yet; but I shook hands with her gravely, and turned down into the grassy lane leading to the village. It was past noon: the bees were droning lazily into the great purple iron-weeds along the fences: there was a heavy smell of harvest fields in the air: far off a faint, blue mist on the horizon hills shimmered like steam in the yellow August sunshine; little brown chippeys hopped right in my path as if we were the oldest sort of friends. Now I'm not a man that cares for these things, but I could not help walking slower, taking off my hat, and feeling what a pleasant, warm-hearted world it was, after all, and how it did a man's very bones good to be alive. Then came the thought of Joe yonder in that brick jail, of the girl I had just left—of the black death waiting for him in one of these early pleasant days; the two lives God had made going out suddenly in darkness and loss; homely, common lives enough, maybe, but full of a wholesome health—of an infinite tenderness—good for much in the world. Nobody to save them but me—! The thought came on me terribly there in that quiet lane and warm sunshine, I do not know why. I remember stopping suddenly, looking at my big muscles, feeling how weak they were, how dull my clogged brain—humbly; and if Phil Caldwell asked help to bring the truth to light that day you need not laugh at him. Some one was as near and quick to hear the detective in the sunny lane as if he had been the preacher yonder in the stone hill-chapel.

However, one does not often understand the fashion in which their prayers are heard. When I started back to Philadelphia, two days after, I got into the yellow stage-coach thoroughly disheartened—in fact, with a sense of utter defeat. If I thought at all of that little passage in the lane it was but to smile bitterly at it. I am not going into detail about those wasted days. I had discovered nothing in Waynesboro' to prove that Pigot had money about him; his brother, the lottery-dealer (of whose underhand remittances I supposed the murdered man to be the bearer), had gone West two days before Pigot's death. I was tired of dogging the meagre evidence up and down the village streets, trying to foist some new bearing into it. Meagre as it was, the facts were sharp and direct enough with these L—— people, I saw, to carry poor Joe to the gallows, and I was powerless. The atmosphere of the town infected me, I believe; it was dull, ignorant, lethargic, from the first. Myers's doom had appeared a thing as certain to them as the rising of the sun on the sultry day that was to see it. Insensibly I found myself swerving into that habit of thinking. I wanted to get out—to thrust the whole matter away from me. The very glare of the sun on the steep, narrow brick pavements choked and taunted me with the useless efforts I had made. The afternoon before I left Garfield called me up as I was passing his office window. A broad-shouldered, stumpy, boorish-looking man was sitting on the edge of a chair balancing a shiny low hat, such as sailors wear, between his knees. I knew the dead black eyes swaddled in fat, and the low forehead well, though the face had sharpened, and the hair and whiskers turned gray since I saw them.

"Squire Hall"—holding out my hand—"I have called twice, but could not find you."

"No, Philip, I've been up to town. I—"

The old man looked troubled; his voice was unsteady.

"The Squire," said Garfield, heartily, "can not rest about Joe. He has been up to engage other counsel. Glendenning is on the defense now with Woodsel."

"What do you think of my choice, Caldwell?" said the old man, anxiously, pulling at his cravat, his hand nervous, as I remembered it long ago—a man always unsure of himself. "He was the highest-priced of those city chaps, so I thought must be the sharpest—eh?"

"Not a safe general rule, but it will serve in this case. Did you want me, Garfield?"

"Only to warn you of a new point against Myers," gravely pulling something from his pocket.

"How? No! Eh?" The old man stooped eagerly over the table, so as to hide the object from me, his face turning pale as he looked up. "It is no point against Joe; it means nothing. Don't let them turn you against the boy, Philip!"

"Squire!" said Garfield. He turned to me a little heated. "His feeling for Myers makes him unjust to me. I have barely done my duty in this case, and God knows how unwillingly that was done!"

"But this point against Myers?"

"Nott, the jailer, found this secreted in the coat Joe had on when arrested," handing me a coarsely-cut key, apparently that of a valise or large port-folio. "It opens the case in which Pigot kept his papers—a spring-lock, you see. The inference is, Myers had obtained the key, but was probably deterred by some noise from securing the mortgage."

"What did Joe want with the mortgage?" said the Squire, starting up fiercely. "The boy is no fool! Would he have clenched the proof of the murder on himself?"

"He has done it, I'm afraid," said Garfield.

Hall stood looking down into his hat, fumbling with the rim, the dark blood coming and going to his face. I was touched by his emotion: it was unexpected, I confess.

"I'm glad you take this case up as you do, Squire."

He looked me full in the face.

"I did not at first. It stunned me. And I didn't know what Joe was to me; come eleven years in February he's worked on the place. It's a hard blow, Philip!" running his hand uncertainly through his white hair, his face turning actually livid. "I'm not used to changes. I'd give my right arm out from the socket," facing me suddenly, "to see Joe Myers a free man to-day!"

Garfield was standing thoughtfully by the table: the key touched it. Hall started at the noise, curiously.

"For that key it proves nothing!" he said, in a shrill voice. "You don't think it weighs in the evidence, Caldwell?" coming up to me, patting my coat in an inane, pleading way.

"With the jury you will have—every thing."

He turned away slowly; stood silent a moment. "I'll go, gentlemen," he said, in a low voice. "I'm not well." As he went I noticed that he staggered.

"I did not think the old buffer had so much feeling," muttered Garfield, shutting the door after him.

"It is genuine," I said; "no sham." Yet it impressed me strangely.

I did not see Hall again, leaving by daylight the next morning. I had not the heart to go to the Birts' cottage; why should I? However, as I left Garfield's office that evening I saw Susy coming out of the lane on the street, on her way to the jail. I noticed her step was quick and eager; a hopeful glow yet in her face. She had a bit of a pink bow in her brown dress (Jane would have liked that), and carried a bunch of clove pinks and tansy under her shawl. Well! well! People looked after her with sad, grave faces; their voices had something tender in them as they gave her good-morning, too, I noticed. Steve Derrick's little daughter ran out from the shop with something wrapped up in a napkin—a hard cheese-cake, I think. "Take it to Uncle Joe; I made it for him—me, Miss Susy, mind!" Susan took it and hurried on, then turning back kissed the child passionately. "God bless you, Phoebe Derrick!" she said. I remembered that Myers was "Uncle Joe" for all the youngsters in L—.

When I came back to L— it was but two days before the trial. The case had excited much interest through the State, Glendenning having thrown the effect of his name on Joe's side. Such things tell. I arrived after night. I had met, it was easy to know by the state of the town: every shop and corner seethed with an excitement people in cities can not imagine; the very boy that blacked your boots was grave with importance. As I finished my steak and potatoes the landlord touched me.

"Mr. Glendenning is in his room," in a mysterious whisper; "wishes to see you, Sir."

Glendenning was a little blue-eyed man, thorough, acute, direct; giving himself utterly up, body and soul, to the business of each hour; consequently one of the most successful lawyers at the Philadelphia bar (I use fictitious names, of course).

"It's a bad business, Caldwell," when I was seated at the other side of the oil-lamp. "If I gain an acquittal the verdict would be, in verity, only 'not proven,' and the man lives under a stigma worse than death, to my mind. Make the best of three days. I must go back to-night. Here is something you can turn to account, perhaps," watching me sharply as I glanced at a bit of paper he handed me. "I tore it from Pigot's memorandum-book. You see? 'To dep't. Sept. 3. Phil. M. and F. Bank. $40,000.' That means," his uneasy fingers playing on his lip, "just what I believed from the first: that Pigot had a sum of money to deposit, and for that money he was murdered."

"Exactly. Now prove it, my fine fellow," jumping up nimbly and going about the room like a sparrow. "One dollar of that money found would weigh more in Myers's favor than all evidence for his character. Where is it? If Pigot had it in trust, where is the owner? His own books show no such sum in hand."

"Well, do your best, Caldwell. For the girl's sake, at least," growing suddenly quiet. "You have seen her?"

"In the jail. Yes."

"What an exquisite face she has!" half to himself. "It put me in mind of the Francesca di Rimini."

I knew nothing of the Di Rimini woman, and I was a little surprised to hear of Susy's beauty; so I thought best to keep quiet.

Glendenning set off that night. But in the two days I did nothing. I was like a man holding an endless skein of thread; one broken end, and the whole would have been unwound cleanly; but the end did not come into my fingers.

The day of the trial was gray and dull, a fine drizzling rain falling without cessation. The sky seemed to settle down heavily on the low hills, shutting in the dingy little village and the deed that was to be done in it to-day. Despite the lowering weather, however, a steady tide of people had set in from the neighboring counties, beginning the night before: a gala day with such a relish of horror L— had never known. I remember listening to the rumble of wheels all the night, and when morning broke standing smoking at the tavern window, watching the muddy jostle of buggies, horsemen, Jersey wagons in the narrow street, and wondering how the sounds came to Myers, shut up in the brick jail down the street. His old companions these men were. The court-house bell began its cracked jangle at nine. Long before that, however, the crowd had been packed on the pavement without, waiting for the doors to open. I did not go down. I remember how I stood for an hour chewing the end of an unlighted cigar, sick in blood, like a nervous woman, with but the one thought: he might have been saved, and I had done nothing; now it was too late. I do not know that I should have gone down that day if Glendenning had not sent me a note requiring my attendance on some trifling point of business.

It was a little, square, plastered room, with green shutters, the court-room, the window sashes and doors picked off with red. The rain dashed against the panes. Even the sills were packed with the mass of people, their stolid, anxious faces all turned toward the one point where I dared not look. Judge Gillmore was on the bench, fat, red, waggish even there (we had begun to elect our judges in this State then). I heard Glendenning's shrill, abrupt tones as I entered. All these points I took in before I gathered courage to glance at the dock. When I did Myers's back was toward me. I saw his broad shoulders in the old bulging coat, and the red head held stiffly erect; and somehow the old turnip-digging days flashed vividly before me, and Joe in the field beside me—how truthful and dogged he was!—free with his money, surly with his word.

"I never pleaded for a manlier client," whispered little Glendenning after he had told me what he wanted.

"What chance?" I said.

"None. Look at that row of wooden faces in the jury-box, and—"

He stopped, chewing tobacco vehemently. As usual, he had thrown all his strength into the case. I drew back into the crowd. Jolliffe, my landlord, touched my elbow.

"D'ye see? There she is," pointing to a dark corner near Myers, where I could catch sight of a small figure wrapped in a brown shawl. The face was hid. I knew she would be there; it would do Joe good to feel her beside him, strengthen him as religion would a less commonplace man. It belonged to her simple real nature to do this thing.

Well, the evidence summed itself up slowly. Garfield's slovenly looseness in summing could not keep back facts. The existence of the mortgage was proved; Joe's offers to pay in January; Pigot's refusal; after that threats from Myers in various places and at frequent times, so open and frequent as to show their slight weight. Squire Hall, the next witness called on the stand, saw this, and began to mutter about "a man's not being likely to take the whole village by the button when he was set on murder," until he was called to order by the court. The old man was haggard and worn, holding himself erect by the pine railings of the witness-box, the stumpy fingers trembling. There was something so foreign to Hall's hard, sharp character in this real feeling that I drew involuntarily closer to inspect it. His testimony was dragged out of him piecemeal; additional facts about the mortgage; the history of Pigot's visit; the squabbling between the two men from day to day; finally the scene at the supper-table, when Joe declared his purpose to hold to his own by a sure way. Hall balked here; his voice grew thick and husky; he was silent when the next question was asked, the color going out of his face, leaving it mottled.

"It will be necessary for you to answer, Squire," said Gillmore.

There was a moment's pause. The old man raised both hands to his neck as if he were choking.

"Judge, d'ye see, I'm swearing Joe's life away? I never meant that."

His voice was sharp and piping. Gillmore said something about painful duty. Hall did not hear him.

"The rest don't matter," he said. "But Joe an' me's pulled together eleven years. I'll not have his blood on my soul."

To give him time they put his wife on the stand, a sharp, gray-eyed woman, older than her husband. It cost her nothing to tell the story. It came out clear and pointed enough, from Myers's threat to the finding of the blackening corpse. Something—the foul air or the woman's acrid tones—nauseated me. I turned off into the jury-room, where the witnesses were waiting to be called. As I went I caught Joe's eye. He shook his head, with a half-smile, the most hopeless and quiet I ever saw on human face. It meant good-by, I knew. He saw the truth—that his doom was sealed. I hurried out.

A few moments after I was standing by the window of the little jury room when a vague something startled me out of the stupid quiet into which I had fallen as needing attention. I believe in presentiments; I knew then, God knows how or why, that the broken end of the skein was in my hand. It was nothing but a faint perfume I perceived, peculiar and sickening. I glanced about me: Sam Tarr, the stable-boy, who had discovered Pigot dead, and whose evidence came next in order, was standing nearest me; a loutish, good-natured-faced lad, with a good deal of trouble just now in his look. He was tossing a bit of glass up and down, unconsciously as it seemed. The odor hung about this thing.

"What is that?" holding out my hand. "Eh? Show?"

"A bottle-stopper. That's all. Queer cut, isn't it? I kep' it for the smell. D'ye know where I found it, now?"

"No."

"On the floor of old Pigot's room, that morning. I'm keepin' it for a remembrancer, I'm h—Lend it to you? Of course, Sir," his
ing. "It's nothing after all." sit,
Com

It was nothing, and yet I turned out of the room quickly, with a strange certainty of having work to do. As I passed through the courtroom some words stopped me. Dr. Hopper was on the stand; had testified to passing Hall's house between one or two o'clock the night of the murder. "My attention was arrested," he said, "by an unusual light in two of the front windows, the room occupied by the deceased. It was such a direct, sharp light as would be produced by a candle, not the steady glow of a night-lamp, and caused me to wonder if any of the Squire's family were ill. The light was held near one of the windows, and for a moment, as I passed, was dimmed, and then grew bright again."

"Ask him if it was entirely extinguished?" I said to Glendenning.

"No, only dimmed as though some large, solid object were momentarily interposed between me and it. I drove on, and can not therefore say how long the light continued in the room."

"Nothing material there," said Glendenning, aside. Was there not?

A detective abhors an inexplicable trifle as much as nature does a vacuum. Why was the light dimmed? I knew the construction of the room thoroughly. It had been open for examination; there was no means of dimming a light near that window; no apparent means at least.

"A means not apparent? Eh?"

I put on my felt-hat.

"Keep the drag on the evidence for two hours," I said to Glendenning, and beckoning to Jolliffe and another shrewd-looking fellow, left the courtroom and struck across the fields to Hall's house. The rain beat in our faces as we went; the smoke from a kiln swept in sullen folds along the wet stubble-fields; the house itself stood deserted and vacant, a howl from a chained dog being our only greeting.

"It looks as if the murder-curse had fallen on the place," said Jolliffe, coming closer to me. But I had no time to study effects. "Come with me, gentlemen," I said, thrusting aside the stupid servant-girl that stopped the entrance, and assuming an air of assurance I was far from feeling, I led the way to Pigot's room. It was a square, plainly-furnished chamber, such as you find in any farm-house, with the usual red and green striped carpet, three wooden chairs, cherry bedstead, and wash-stand. With one exception a feature, however, common in many Pennsylvania houses, built fifty years ago. A paneling of pine wood, slightly beaded, ran half-way up to the ceiling, met there by the tawdry paper. I had a vague hope of some discovery to be made in this wood-work which would account for the dimming of the light close by the window. There was no time to spend in search of secret springs; lifting a heavy brass andiron from the open grate, I struck vigorously on the wall. The echo came; thank God! came hollow and dull! "Break it open," I said, handing the bar to Jolliffe. In another moment the thin, wooden door was crushed in and the cupboard left bare. Within was a small case of glass vials; one without a stopper, and empty "I make this vial complete, you perceive?" I said. "It would be better not to smell to it too strongly, friend Jolliffe," trying to laugh. What a fool I was that I could not steady my hands nor my tongue!

"Your mistress's room," I said to the woman who met us at the door. She was new in the house, and led us to the chamber without hesitation. I must make my story brief. Enough to say that, secreted in Hall's sleeping-room, we found the money of which the murdered man had been robbed; that, by a strange chance, as we returned through the main street to the courtroom the long-looked-for letter from Pigot's brother was placed in my hand, claiming this money, and furnishing means to identify it.

The dull afternoon was darkening into evening when we re-entered the courtroom. Glendenning was speaking—speaking weakly and vaguely, against time I saw at a glance, watching the door for our return. There was something damped and cheerless in every inflection of his voice. He had brought up Myers's scanty defense, and knew it was of no avail. "I saw the verdict written on every one of those twelve stolid faces," he said afterward. A chill like that of the coming shadow of death had fallen on the house; the murky, damp air was full of it. Two or three faces out of the mass stamped themselves sharply on my memory as I entered. Hall's wife, pale, the light eyes, glowing like those of a tigress waiting to spring, fixed on the prisoner; her husband's, purple, bloated, frightened; Joe's, turned to the stretch of dull sky without, a solemn depth of meaning in it never seen there before, like that of a man who looked death in the face and asked what it had for him. There was something almost grand in the quiet bravery of the common face, with its shock of red hair, now that it drew close to eternity. But even in that instant of time I saw another look which I never forgot. Susy Birt had crept close to the dock, and drawn one of Joe's hands through the railings; a dull flicker of light fell on her head and half-closed eyes. I remember having an odd fancy that if the man were in hell the pain and love in that look could have purified and brought him back. But I had work to do. A few whispered words to the sheriff, and with a startled look he sauntered up to a group of constables, who speedily took their hands from their pockets and their melancholy regards from Joe, and quietly posted themselves behind Hall and his wife. Then I placed a scrap of paper before Glendenning; he glanced at it, suddenly wakened into energy, and abruptly asked that the rules be suspended to allow important witnesses to be placed upon the stand. How eagerly I mounted it I need not say. The dénouement did not arrive as I had planned it, however. At my first mention of the secret closet Hall started back with a muttered oath, dragging his wife with him. She shook him off and stood her ground, her lips only shutting a little tighter and turning blue. "Fool!" she hissed. I saw my time; drew out the roll of Pigot's money and laid it on the table. As I had hoped, the man's terror at this reached its climax, and clutching hold of the sheriff's coat, in a scene of the wildest confusion, he made a full confession, and begged and whined for mercy. In all the excitement that followed—the crashing of benches, shouts, exclamations, Joe's one gasping "Hurrah!" Susy's quiet dead fall on the floor—one little trait struck and touched me strangely. It was in Hall's wife. She faced Judge Gillmore, as they were dragging her off, pushing her rusty gray hair out of her eyes.

"I've this to say"—in a shrill voice that rose over all the clamor—"now that this old fool has leaked it all out, that you'd best let him go. One of us is enough, and it was me did it. I put him up to it, and found out the way, and it was me put the key in Myers's pocket. The Squire was agin' blamin' Joe from the first." The last words I heard from her were: "One of us is enough, God knows!"

Well, this all happened years ago. It's growing to be like a horrible ghost-story to us all, even to Joe and Susy. Yet it laid the foundation of a healthy, cheerful friendship between us—the most enduring we know, perhaps. As Jane said last fall when we were coming back from our annual visit to Myers's farm, "It made one's life fresher and nearer to God somehow, to be with people so natural and true." Jane and Susan came together just as I fancied they would: they have a real respect for each other, and that's rare among women, you know. I'll never forget how, when our Ben died of varioloid, and my wife was ill, Mrs. Myers came up, and in her still, gentle way turned into the sick-room and kitchen like any hireling. We go down there every summer, as I said. They have a cheerful little farm on the Juniata hills; and a jolly, noisy farm-house it is growing to be, now that their boys are stretching up into men and making Joe a boy again. In winter Joe and Susy come up, especially in Opera season; for Susan has an odd love and comprehension for music, different from ours. They are at our house on Green Hill now, by-the-way. Mr. Glendenning did us the honor to come out to supper the other evening, to "see that rare womanly face again," he said. "A real Francesca; he never had forgotten it." I think he was a little disappointed, however. I saw him watching her after supper, where she sat apart playing with her baby. "A pity!" he said. "Such a clear-cut tragedy face it was! I see! It is Joe, and the cheery farm, and the baby that have softened it down into that common beauty."

Glendenning is a critic in high art, I know; but I could not agree with him, somehow. I had seen Ary Scheffer's picture; but there was a beauty deeper and holier to me in the pink flush on Susy's cheek when Joe came near her, and in the look in her soft brown eyes resting on her baby.

MUSIC IN A CROWD.

WHEN I hear music, whether waltz or psalm,
Among a crowd, I find myself alone;
It does not touch me with a soothing balm,
But brings an echo like a moan

From some far country where a palace rose,
In which I reigned with Cleopatra's pride:
"Come, Charmian! bring the asp for my repose;"
And, "Queenly," men shall say, "she died."

There lived and ruled a happy, noble race, Primeval souls who held imperial power—
My kindred, gone forever from their place,
And I am here without a dower!

They were a Vision though. And are these real,
These men and women, moving as in sleep,
Who, smiling, gesture to the same Ideal,
For which the music makes me weep?

Have they my longings for that other world
New to them yet? I grant that Music's swell
Is like the sea; they may be thither hurled
By storms that thunder and compel;

Or, like those voyagers in the land of streams,
Glide through its languid air, its languid wave,
To learn that Here and There are but two dreams
That end in Nothing and the Grave!

FRENCH FLOWER FARMING.

FLOWERS are the incarnation of Poetry. Nothing seems more exquisitely useless than a flower to those who fail to see the use of beauty, and to whom Voltaire's subtle saying, Le superflu, chose si nécessaire! is a paradox. But in this seemingly useless display of color, form, and perfume the sensitive eye of the poet sees a divine meaning, and the astute eye of Commerce sees a marketable value. The restless activity of Commerce stretches its hand out every where, and, like Midas, touches every thing to gold. Ages ago it discerned the marketable value of Religion. It has in our day discovered a value in Poetry. How, then, can it have failed to turn Flowers into invoices?

Take a pair of compasses and strike an arc on the map of the French shores of the Mediterranean; making the Fort of Antibes the centre, open the compasses to Nice, and strike round—the highest point will be Grasse; then descending again to the shore in an opposite direction the compass leg will mark the fringe of the Estrelle hills, and the well-known town of Cannes, with Lord Brougham's villa. From Nice to Cannes it is twenty miles, and from Grasse to the shore ten miles. The three towns form a geographical triangle, having the tideless blue sea for its base. Within this triangle is the valley of the Flower Farms.

Elsewhere flowers are ornaments—charming accidents. Here they are staples. They grow like grass and corn, like potatoes and mangelwurzels. Here bloom the jasmine, the orange, the violet, the tuberose, the jonquil, the rose, the cassia, not as in our beds, not as in horticultural gardens, not as gardens, but as fields. Broad acres of color flash under the hot sun. The atmosphere is heavy with perfumes when the snows are melting on the mountains, and the gurgling Var is rapidly growing into a roaring torrent. Here we enter homesteads not of golden grain, but of lavender sheaves; not of cheese, but of olive-oil; not of beer and elder wine, but of orange-flower and rose-water in vats; not of clotted cream, but of jasmine and violet butter. It is like a country of the "Arabian Nights." You expect the dark-eyed peasants to answer you in lyrics, and the very dogs to bark in tropes. You are oppressed with the prodigality of splendor. The soil is so fertile that, to borrow Douglas Jerrold's witty conceit, if you tickle it with a hoe it smiles with a flower; or, as the natives say, if you plant a walking-stick the ferrule will blossom. M. Septimus Piesse, the well-known perfumer, who is an expert chemist, has analyzed this soil, and finds, in 1000 parts, its contents to be:

Silica and Sand .....	860.00
Silicate of Magnesia .....	008.50
Carbonate of Magnesia .....	007.00
Alumina .....	030.70
Silicate of Alumina .....	013.00
Sulphate of Lime .....	005.80
Carbonate of Lime .....	006.80
Potash Salt .....	004.80
Soda Salts .....	006.70
Phosphate of Lime and Magnesia .....	005.60
Carbonate of Iron .....	010.50
Carbonate of Copper .....	001.70
Organic Matter .....	022.30
Manganese and Iodine traces .....	—
Loss during Analysis .....	016.60

This soil, so marvelously adapted to flowers, has the reputation of being singularly adapted to man, and mud-baths are in great request here. The bather is taken to the shore, and, at a distance of some ten yards from the tideless brine, a grave is scooped, into which the bather descends; he is then covered up to the chin, and allowed to remain thus in the embrace of mother earth for fifteen minutes, after which the modern Antæus takes a plunge in the sea.

The flower harvest is considerable. On an average the district yields annually:

Orange blossoms .....	1,475,000 pounds.
Rose blossoms .....	530,000 "
Jasmine blossoms .....	100,000 "
Violet blossoms .....	75,000 "
Cassia blossoms .....	45,000 "
Geranium leaves .....	30,000 "
Tuberose blossoms .....	24,000 "
Jonquil blossoms .....	5,000 "

Not to mention lavender, which yields a produce worth about $150 an acre.

Commerce must have a dull eye not to see the value of flower-farming at this rate. As a general rule, the landed proprietors do not let the farms at a fixed rental, but make an arrangement with the owners of a laboratory to work the farm and its produce, receiving a share of the profits—frequently a third. Small landholders sell their flowers to the laboratory that will give the best price. Lord Brougham generally sells his to M. Hermann, of the great laboratory of Nôtre Dame.

By whom is the work done? Surely not by men like English chaw-bacons? Peasants, one would think, must be refined into a sort of ideal condition by constantly working on such flower farms. Perhaps they are; at any rate they are very jovial, honest, and peaceable. The gendarme has a sinecure. The summer wages are about 56 cents a day for the men, who do the heavy work of the fields, and 25 cents a day for the women, who attend to the culture of the flowers. In winter the wages are 50 cents a day for men, and 20 cents for women.

Nothing can be simpler or more primitive than the farming operations. Roses, for example: The field is first scantily manured—especially with the refuse matter left after the distillation of various plants; it is then plowed with oxen at the yoke; no weeds are allowed; new shoots with a few roots of old roses are then planted, and Nature does the rest. In the second year a considerable quantity of flowers appears, but it is not until the fourth year that they are fully developed. A plantation of roses well tended will last from six to eight years; but for this the land must be well drained. It requires ten thousand rose-plants to cover an acre, and this acre will produce, in an average season, five thousand pounds' weight of roses.

For cassias the land is prepared in a similar way. The young plants are raised from seed which is sown in beds. The best plants are left, the doubtful ones removed. In the third year they have generally a height of two or three feet, and are then planted out in fields, each tree requiring about twelve feet square. The blossoms of the cassia are successive, some being ready for plucking, while the others are scarcely formed. This is immensely useful to the farmer, one lot of blossoms being gathered and passed through the laboratory before it is time to gather the others. After the third year the tree produces flowers, growing at the same time till they attain maturity, when they reach a height of ten or twelve feet, with branches six feet long, and a stem as thick as a man's wrist. Each full-grown tree will produce about three pounds' weight of flowers, having an intense odor, somewhat resembling that of green tea.

The jasmine is cultivated by slips of the wild jasmine, grafted at the end of two years with the Spanish jasmine (Jasmina grandiflora). This produces a blossom the size of a shilling, of intense fragrance. It requires about eighty thousand plants to stock an acre; and they are not in full bearing till the second year after grafting; but when mature, every thousand plants yield about sixty pounds' weight of flowers annually. They are planted in rows, horizontal poles being thrust between them for support, the branches being woven in and out. Every August—the jasmine season—the fields are alive with women, old and young, and children, each having a little basket at her side suspended by a strap across her shoulders, both hands actively engaged in picking the flowers and filling the baskets. From morn till dewy eve these busy fingers ply. As each basket is filled it is conveyed to the shaded laboratory and there weighed. An acre of land will yield about five thousand pounds' weight of jasmine blossoms; and the more flowers are picked the more blossoms are produced.

The tuberose needs more care than any other flower of the farm. It is the most difficult to rear, but the best worth rearing, for a good plantation on a good soil will last for seven or eight years. It is a bulbous plant which propagates by throwing out a stem like the hyacinth, covered with fleshy flowers, and one or two sprays of blossom. And oh! what a fragrance breathes from it! what a bouquet, snatching perfumes from every flower with a superb eclecticism!

The tuberose, with her silvery light,
That in the garden of Malay
Is called the mistress of the night,
So like a bride, scented and bright,
She comes out when the sun's away.

Orange-trees are cultivated from seeds. A tree requires fifteen years to reach maturity, but will produce both flowers and fruit in four or five years. When in full vigor each tree yields an average of twenty-five pounds' weight of blossoms annually.

With us the violet grows any where, and almost any how; but the terrible sun of Nice, during July and August, is ill borne by violets. Consequently, on the farms they are planted under the green shade of the orange and lemon trees, or close to walls and houses. The method of propagation is division of the roots. They are planted so as to grow in tufts or clusters about a foot apart all round; and this space enables the growers to gather the flowers without treading on them. A surface of land, equaling an acre of planting, yields seventy or eighty pounds' weight of flowers.

Rose-leaf geraniums are grown for the sake of the rose-like odor extracted by distillation from the leaves. Rosemary and lavender are also grown, one can hardly say "cultivated," to a vast extent.

The eye has not long been wandering over these broad acres of splendor without the inquisitive mind asking what are they for? Obviously these masses of color are not for ornament. An air of business prevails. The handwriting on these fields requires no interpreter: the imposing word "Profit" stands legible to all. Whence? An agreeable flattery of our most prominent feature suggests the answer. Man is nasal; and the imperiousness of the Schneiderian membrane demanding scents for its gratification, and partly, also, for the suppression or mitigation of stinks, has, in all ages and among all tribes, forced the genius of man to extract perfumes from flowers. When the tribe has been defective in genius of an inventive order it has called in the aid of Barter. At present Europe largely supplies the untutored but not less nasal savage. The subjects of King Dahomey are great importers of lavender-water.

They give us ivory and palm-oil in exchange—"poor, ignorant creatures." In the far West the tribes of the vast prairies, and the ermine-hunters, gladly exchange their best furs for packets of snuff scented with essence of Bergamot, and, by way of combining their pleasures, they eat the snuff. People who have not the stinks of Cologne are eager for the water of the "only genuine" Farina.

The nose having its needs and luxuries, Commerce is but too happy to pander to it. There are many odorous bodies, but none yield their perfumes so easily as flowers. Hence the people of the valley of Cannes have devoted themselves to the production of these perfumes; that is, to their extraction from the flowers. Nature helps them, as she helps the people of Havanna to the propitiation of the "sooty Bacchus."

And how is the process performed? It is partly chemical, partly agricultural: the laboratory stands in the midst of the flower farms. Just as the farmer and the gleaner carry their corn to the miller to have it ground the landholders carry their flowers to the laboratory. Suppose we visit one of these laboratories? That of M. Mero, within a mile of Grasse, may be taken as a type; and M. Mero, with the ribbon of the Légion d'Honneur in his button-hole, stands beside his char-à-banc at the door, smiling gracieux et charmant. He is only too happy to show us over, and we step into the little carriage, almost feeling that we are conferring the obligation we are receiving. We are driven first to a four-acre field of roses. O cockneys! O my brothers! imagine what a sight. Not half-a-dozen bushes straggling round a mangy grass-plot; not a row of bushes hedging in a gravel path; but millions of buds and blossoms burning over four acres!

We tear ourselves away to enter a jungle of jasmine. You know what a perfume one good jasmine-tree will breathe into the air; imagine a forest of such trees. Then turn into the orange grove, with its voluptuous perfume mingling with that of the violets growing thickly in the shade. We pass from it into the region of the prickly cassia, and the imperial tuberose. Sight and scent stimulate, intoxicate. We are in an unreal world. The very prodigality overpowers us.

M. Mero drives us to his laboratory, and with the perspicuity of a Frenchman—ce qui n'est pas Français—explains to us the art and mystery of extracting odors from flowers. Thus illuminated, we can smile with bland superiority on the popular notion (which we entirely forget that we ever entertained) respecting the process. We now know that distillation is not the only, not even the usual process; but in the great majority of cases the odors are isolated by two methods, that of maceration and enfleurage (enfleurage). It is thus that orange, tuberose, acacia, violet, jasmine, rose, jonquil, and others, are treated; and these processes depend on a fact unknown in this country, at least unpublished, until M. Septimus Piesse brought out his work, "The Art of Perfumery." We allude to the property which pure oil, butter, grease, and fat, have of absorbing the fragrant principle from flowers in contact with them. Fats absorb odors, as a sponge absorbs water. If the fat, thus impregnated, be placed in pure alcohol, or any other spirit, the fragrant principle quits the fat, and we have then the scented spirit which perfumers sell.

Such being the principle, let us now learn the process. The grease—beef suet or lard—is bought, and purified from all animal fibre and sanguineous matters by long boiling in water and nitre. When cold, it is again boiled in rose-water, to which a minute quantity of benzoin gum has been added. It is now allowed to cool and solidify, and is then fit for use. Large quantities of grease are thus prepared during the periods when the flowers are out of season. The grease is enflowered on a frame, very similar to a window-sash, the wood-work being two inches thick, with the glass in the centre; so that when two or more frames are laid together there is space sufficient for the flowers between the glasses. The glass has a layer of pure fat spread over it, each glass requiring about a pound of fat. On this the freshly-gathered flowers are sprinkled, and as there are several hundred frames at work for each kind, the quantity of perfumed grease prepared at once is enormous. When the flowers are spread on the grease, each frame is piled on another, till they amount to forty or fifty. There they remain from twenty-four to thirty-six hours; then the old or spent blossoms are removed and fresh flowers placed upon the grease; and this is repeated until the fat is sufficiently impregnated, when it is scraped off the glass, melted at a low heat, and strained to remove stray petals. It is finally poured into the canisters for preservation and exportation.

Fat may also be perfumed by maceration, i.e., the infusion of the flowers in melted fat, or in cold oil. Some flowers answer best on the enflowering process, others by maceration. Cassia oil is made by simply infusing the fresh-gathered buds in fine olive-oil, changing the flowers by straining till the desired strength be attained. Sometimes, as with the manufacture of violet-scented grease, the enflowering process is first employed, and then the grease is liquefied and fresh blossoms are macerated therein. Whenever flowers are macerated in grease, the coloring matter of the pollen and the petals is dissolved; hence, violet grease is green, cassia is yellow, jasmine and tuberose white.

Scented grease is now called pomade, though, strictly speaking, that term designates only apple grease. It is a comparatively modern name, and has replaced the old-fashioned "butter." A century ago we spoke of jasmine butter, rose butter, etc., and we find this entry in the Duchess of Grafton's account-book for the year 1765: "Orange butter, 6s." Who does not remember hearing of Lillie, whose "foreign butters" were patronized by fashion and the wits, and whose shop in the Strand was brightened by the presence of Pope and Steele, of Swift and Addison, of Arbuthnot and many others wise and gentle. Lillie is to be heard of in the Spectator (No. 358), in the Tatler (Nos. 92, 94, 96, 101, 103), and in the Guardian (No. 64). He may be still more circumstantially known by his recipe-book, published half a century ago, in which three pages are devoted to the information that "the best orange-flower butter and jasmine butter come from Florence."

But how about distilled essences? we ask M. Mero, at the conclusion of his exposition. He leads us into the distillery, and there we learn that distilled perfumes are not obtained from flowers, but from leaves, seeds, roots, and barks of odor-bearing plants. These contain their odors stored up in minute sacs, whereas the flowers may truly be said to breathe their odors. The perfume is an exhalation, lasting only with the life of the flower. Orange, jasmine, rose, violet, tuberose: indeed nearly all flowers are incapable of yielding by distillation the odors natural to them in life. Orange-flower otto may indeed be distilled from orange blossoms, but who will say that this otto smells like orange flowers? It is the same with otto of roses. The odors procured by enflowering are the very breath of the living flowers condensed. The odors procured by boiling or distillation are the perfumes of the dead. There is a seeming exception in the case of lavender, which, however, chemistry shows to be no exception at all. Distilled lavender yields a perfume which, when sufficiently old, does resemble that of the flower; but it is only by absorbing the oxygen of the air that the distilled lavender acquires this fragrance.

IN THE MEADOW.

HERE is the rake where I left it, and yonder, down the road,
I see the oxen plodding along to empty that last great load.

Near half an hour 'twill take them: meantime I'll rest me a bit,
And try if the sun on my forehead will quicken my tardy wit.

I wish I knew. You rascal Wind! do you reckon it all fair play
To take a man when he's down, you coward, and blow his hat away?

Here, Rover! fetch it, old fellow! Why, how unwilling to go!
What do you see in my face, old dog, to make you study it so?

Ah, Rover! when two have lived together, fast friends, so many years,
A pity if words are needed to tell of either's troubles and fears.

You know as well as I do, now, that something is going wrong:—
Please God, a glimmer of light may come to set me right ere long!

The meadow yonder is dotted with cows, and just across the lane,
The fields, as far as eye can reach, are yellow with ripened grain:

While under the hill, on the other side, through the fiery maple leaves
I see the house and barn, and father unloading the heavy sheaves.

My life, since I can remember, has passed between the three—
Cattle, and corn, and farm-house chores—what else has there been for me?

Just Rover's existence; eating and sleeping over and over again!
A little labor added to these, and how is it better then?

Well, well; that troubled me little enough in all the years that are past!
But boys, from childish words and ways, must waken to men at last.

For now, when the air is all alive with battle's iron hum,
Each drop of my blood stirs quick to meet and answer the booming drum.

Last June, I know, when Charley Allen came back to us one night,
Out of the Wilderness, where he fell in the very front of the fight;

Though he had the name of an idle scamp, remembering what we did,
Not one of us all but thrilled to lay his hand on the coffin-lid!

Three months since; and now there has been, as I thought there was likely to be,
Another call for soldiers—and why not a call for me?

Why not take my part with the rest, and fight till the thing is done?
Better that than to stay on the farm and fret out my heart alone.

What right have I to stand aside when the 'listed companies pass?
Suppose that a snake should twist himself about me here in the grass;

Mighty queer it would seem, I think, when I raised a terrible shout,
To see the men go on with their reaping and let me fight it out!

No, I could rather, if need there be, die even as Charley died;
And sleep at last like him in the sun, under the green hill-side:

The bees would be thick in the honey of the blossomed plum in spring;
And down in the meadows the summer long the mowers' scythes would ring.

It's nothing so hard to lie among the sights and sounds I know,
Covered with clover, having had my chance at the snaky foe!

The President calls for soldiers to finish up the fight:—
A few would settle it now he thinks—it's likely he is right.

What! are they through already? Smart work with that heavy load!
And father has turned the oxen again to drive them down the road.

It's leaving him that troubles me so; indeed it's easily guessed
What storm will whistle about me, if I make up my mind to enlist!

Well, if he cares for cattle more than country, I must try To forget it, and only remember he's not as young as I.

I'm out of my time, and, after all, no son of his, you know:
It doesn't make him my father because I call him so.

If he were alive—my own, I mean—I needn't go alone;
Long since we'd have marched to battle together, father and son.

But well I know what he'd tell me, this minute, if he could speak:
No use in beating about the bush—I'll enlist this very week!

Hi, Rover! I feel like another man since setting my mind on that—
And now perhaps you will help me, Sir, to chase my runaway hat?

There is the team—I must hurry, I see. Come on, you lazy Wind!
I think I can run as fast as you, with this burden off my mind.

AFTER PETROLEUM.

"IRVINE!" shouted the conductor on the western end of the yet unfinished Sunbury and Erie Railroad on the evening of Friday the 9th of September. Very un-September-like had been the weather—rainy and dingy and cold—and the traveler to whom Irvine was a destination rose from the dim light, gathered up his shawl and haversack and umbrella, and stepped out on a dark platform and looked about for the town. Not being able to distinguish the town, a form in the darkness was inquired of for the hotel, who, pointing to a distant light, said, "Follow down the track, cross over to that light, and there you'll find it." Going as directed, sinking in mire and stumbling over stones and ruts, the hotel was reached, and found as good as the country affords. It is not worth while to describe these "houses of entertainment." Some are better than others, and if my recollection serves me, some are considerably worse than others. The best are not such as railroad travelers who halt in the large cities are accustomed to. Nobody seems to be aware of their condition, or at least nobody complains. The New York dandy, out prospecting for oil, reaches almost as far for the butter as the backwoodsman who has a "nice thing for sale."

Irvine is the first point on the above railroad, where, coming in from the West, one strikes the Alleghany River. If you wish to see the oil regions thoroughly, and especially if you would form any theory respecting their geological features, involving their probable origin and duration, the best way is to take the Alleghany River down to Oil City, and thence branch off up the creek and its tributaries, until you have gone over the territory up and down from various points. A geologist will find the rock only in few places laid bare. What are locally called "boulders"—which indeed are not boulders of the drift formation, but only large rock fragments fallen from the high hill strata, and washed by the waters which have cut the deep valleys—are found on the borders of all the streams often beneath the soil. These fragments are not interesting except for their beautiful water-marks, and the confirmatory evidence they give of the otherwise perfectly obvious fact, that all the numerous valleys and gorges of the oil region are the result not of volcanic upheaval, but of watery erosion. Wherever the strata are exposed they lie almost horizontally, showing only the slow  $15^{\circ}$  dip S.W., which is hardly apparent to the eye. In some places, especially on the upper shores of the Alleghany and on the banks of the creeks that empty into it, there is possibly a slight anticlinal pitch, which, if real, would show that some little upheaval existed along the water-lines. A cause for this will be suggested further on, and a reason why the streams should follow these upheavals, and why oil is generally found near their banks.

The civil hotel-keeper at Irvine having removed my impedimenta, the first inquiry was for the means of transportation over the 50 or 60 miles of river that extended down to Oil City. My intention being to see the rocks and wells on both sides of the river, a skiff was the only resource. Nobody knew where a skiff could be bought. One mouth, however, that was emitting clouds of strong tobacco smoke, which rolled from underneath a broad slouched hat, that sat upon the top of a figure curled up and tilted back against the wall, uttered the information that a skiff could be had near the foundry.

Taking the directions, I went out again into the darkness toward a distant object a little blacker than the night, which they told me was a bridge. There was a roar and rush of the current underneath, which could be seen gleaming, or rather glaring, between the loose floor planks, suggesting the idea that the waters of the Big Broken Straw, as they were preparing for their leap into the Alleghany, would have no objection to take a drowned passenger along. The passenger, however, had his own objections, and being wet enough already, managed to get safely over, and safely down between the unfathomed mud of the road and the steep bank which lined the right shore of the creek. Jackson was found, and Jackson had a skiff, the only skiff in town, which he was willing to sell for 8 dollars. I had been informed that the usual price was from 3 to 5 dollars; but gold had risen in this far-away wilderness as well as in the wilds of Wall Street. Moreover, Jackson knew I must have a skiff the next morning, and could get none but his; therefore reasons accumulated why he should ask 8 dollars, and he got it.

In the morning the geological value of railroads was manifest from the front porch of the hotel. In order to shorten a curve, the Sunbury and Erie had cut the bank perpendicularly at the bluff point which divides the Alleghany from its tributary at the promising town of Irvine. The strata of the Vergent series, the Chemung of the New York geologists, were finely opened for the depth of at least 100 feet. They consisted of gray, blue, and red shales, some soft and some hard, containing a few fossils having the gentle southwest dip, with the almost imperceptible anticlinal lift northwest toward the Big Broken Straw.

Returning from the rocks a sturdy "son of the soil" applied for passage down the river. I engaged him at once, thinking that in the sixty miles of rowing he might prove a valuable companion. He was well acquainted with all the region, and gave me what information he possessed, none of which was of more than momentary advantage. He and all his class were totally unobservant of those points which are necessary to supply a geologist with facts out of which to form a scientific opinion. He knew where to find the swiftest water in going down stream. He had been a raftsman. He knew where the taverns and stopping-places were. He pointed out the locality of noted wells; but he knew nothing about the positions of the best, whether under bluffs or on the flats, what rocks they had bored to find them, and how much oil they severally produced. I was surprised and vexed at getting so little information on the points I was chiefly inquiring into. My vexation proved me a novice; for now I have seen the whole oil region of Northwest Pennsylvania, I should not be willing to stand a critical examination upon those points myself.

As my fellow-passenger said nothing of bearing his share of the cost of the skiff I handed him the oars, and politely kept him at them through the twenty miles that accomplished his journey. He was a little puzzled by my courteous way of taking for granted that he was exclusive oarsman; but he was good-humored and keen in his way. After mentioning the cost of stage fare to his destination, inquiring how much I gave for the skiff, and otherwise attempting in vain to discover my financial intentions respecting himself, he finally settled to his work with good will, and rowed steadily under the comforting self-assurance that muscle, not greenbacks, would this time pay his way.

Immediately upon leaving Irvine the banks of the river began to show the decaying monuments of many small fortunes ruined. Four years ago, when the first oil excitement arose, labor attempted to emancipate itself from capital. The world-wide struggle burst forth in this then untracked wilderness. Poor men with a few dollars in hand, and a few more borrowed, banded in small parties, resolved to sink oil-wells on their own account, and reap for themselves the splendid gains that generally fall to the rich man's share. These laborers took leases on small fragments of river front, agreeing to pay an eighth, a sixth, a quarter, or even a half of all the oil found, to the land proprietors, as "royalty;" and proceeded without order, system, or forethought to sink their wells. With appliances of the rudest kind they set to work. Cutting down four slim poles of 40 feet in length, they fastened them 10 feet apart at bottom, and 3 at top, raising them in the course of erection to an upright position, and staying them in all directions. This finished was called a derrick, and served for a guide and holder to the heavy drills with which the wells were bored, and as a convenient structure for a "fall and tackle." A strong post 10 feet outside the derrick, heavy and deeply driven into ground, supported the middle of a large timber weighted at the shorter and farthest end, so as to overbalance the drill which was attached to the end projecting to the central point under the derrick. This drill, with a steel-cutting face of about  $2\frac{1}{2}$  inches, was made of heavy iron, connecting above with a stiff rod, on two sides of which were small projections, called, I think, "stirrups," just large enough to take a man's foot. Two drillers stood each with a foot on the "stirrup," and together "kicked down" the drill, turning it by hand as they did so, and then lifting their feet while the weighted end threw up the tool preparatory to another "kick" downward. Sometimes instead of weighting they selected an elastic timber, fastened the farther end firmly, and let the spring of the wood raise the drill.

Had the oil been found in great abundance near the surface, shallow wells would have been sufficient—such wells as were practicable under the system of the "kicking drill." But good wells lie from 100 to 600 feet deep—both too great for the rude appliances described. Consequently these banded laborers soon expended all their means, and were compelled to give up their works. The general law was again vindicated. To capital belong the enterprises involving risks. Therefore capital must obtain the great gains, as it bears also the great losses.

The low price of oil four years ago—when, indeed, it was worth less than the barrels that contained it—helped the other causes of failure. Now, through the whole oil region abandoned derricks stand rotting slowly down, warning many and attracting more. They warn labor to keep to its own sphere. They attract capital, with the erroneous suggestion that some indications of oil must have existed where so much work was done—indications that can doubtless be followed out successfully by perseverance and sufficient means. In some places this view may be proved correct. But, without other signs, they alone are not enough, because the drillers of those early wells were even more distinguished than present "prospectors" in "going it blind."

Tidionte is the first point in the upper Alleghany where oil is profitably pumped. Neither a geologist nor a "practical" man would express an opinion against the oil-productiveness of other neighboring regions. They may yet develop finely; but hitherto success has not followed enterprise; or perhaps it would be more accurate to say that enterprise has not pursued success. Nearly opposite Tidionte are the so-called Economite Wells. Driving the skiff on land and making my way along greasy tracks, through rows of barrels marked "E. O. C.," I saw on the upper bank an untanned, benevolent face, under a broad-brimmed hat, over a figure clothed in blue. Accosting the gentleman, I soon found both intelligence and politeness in operation. In a few moments' conversation he gave me valuable knowledge. The sect in which he held the dignity of Presiding Brother, Patriarch, or some ruling office of another name, were "Economites" only because they had settled a town called Economy. In Germany they were known as Brethren of Harmony. They had separated themselves from the body of Protestants, with "harmony" as the one chief doctrine of their creed. The name indicates most commendable intentions in their founders. Having all things in common, they have doubtless found some little difficulty, within their close and secret precincts, in keeping down the unharmonious elements which the world, the flesh, and the devil are apt to intrude among man-and-womankind. A strong hand undoubtedly rules within, and when strong wills show themselves in the younger members they are probably crushed, expelled, or placed in power. Thus the Harmonites continue a sect, helped in their isolation by German temperament and their foreign tongue; marrying, though preferring celibacy; and all working industriously for the common enrichment.

A very valuable oil-property is owned by this sect opposite Tidionte. A large oil-spring, i. e., a spring of water in which thick oil rose to the surface, was found near, and doubtless determined the purchase. One well, 120 feet deep, yields 30 barrels a day. The oil is heavier than that of Oil Creek, and brings several dollars more per barrel. Four other wells produce about the same quantity, making 60 barrels a day. This, at even $10 the barrel, which, for heavy oil, is lower than it is now or may perhaps ever again be, would make them a daily income of $600. Their property has scarcely yet begun to be developed, and they are now sinking new wells. It is remarkable that the wells of this company are situated at the foot, or rather in the very side, of a steep bluff near the water's edge, a place not generally successful; while the flats opposite, usually most prolific, have not as yet remunerated the proprietors. The Economite wells are none over 120 feet deep, while a well on the flat opposite is now down 600 feet.

A very curious and simple contrivance is resorted to at these wells, one which alone would stamp the owners as true economists. The oil of many wells rises in a yellow or riley condition, and does not then separate readily from the water. Even the best oils have some affinity for the salt-water, with which they have been sleeping for ages far down in the depths of the earth. To facilitate their separation the discharge-pipe from the pump of the largest well is carried into the middle of an upright wooden cylinder, heavily hooped and very stout. The cylinder is about 6 feet high by 2 feet in diameter. Into the top a pipe that carries the exhaust steam from the engine is inserted, which connects with a copper drum in the interior. This of course heats the contents, and facilitates the separation of the oil and salt-water. The oil flows into a tank from an orifice 18 inches below the top of the cylinder; and the water flows off below, through a tube that adjusts the level. The space above the oil-vent gathers the gas, which is more or less pumped out of every well; and this gas is led by another tube to the fire-room, where it is burned for raising steam. Every thing is thus utilized. And as they draw their oil from the top of the tank next the cylinder into the one out of which they barrel, it is obvious that the oil they sell must be in the very best condition.

Half a mile below the Economite property is a well 975 feet deep, drilling under the intelligent superintendence of Mr. David Ralston, for the Tidionte and Alleghany Oil Company. This company, with commendable zeal, is prosecuting its labors with the intention of testing the question of the existence of large oil deposits far down in the rock. On Oil Creek the strata said to have been found are shale of different colors and different degrees of hardness, with three distinct layers of sand-rock. The sand-rocks there are about 20 feet thick, and lie at the several depths of about 200, 350, and 500 feet. Though oil and gas are found in or under every sand-rock, all the Oil Creek wells are driven down to, or partly, and sometimes wholly, through the third, where alone the great flows have been found. At Tidionte, however, in the deep well referred to, only one sand-rock has been passed through. This lay 150 feet deep, and showed some oil. It was not tested; but the drill, at 440 feet, though still in shale, struck more oil, which was also passed without pumping out; and now enough gas rises whenever the sand-pump is drawn to burn in flame when touched by a lighted match. The drill here, and now generally used in the oil region, has a cutting face of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  inches.

Opposite on the right bank of the river, in Lower Tidionte, where Gordon Creek comes in round the upper point of the bluff, are several small wells of lubricating oil producing five or six barrels a day, all of the shallow depth of about 120 feet.

In this and all the oil region what is called the "surface water" is shut off at the first sand-rock at a depth varying from less than 100 to about 200 feet. The surface water is the fresh water that forms the springs of the country. Its volume is sometimes very large; and were it left to run into the wells it would press the oil away so that the pumps would not be able to draw it. Therefore every well is tubed generally with 2-inch gas-pipe. The drill-hole being about four inches, enough room remains between the walls and the tubing for the insertion and pressure down to any depth of the "seed-bag," by which the surface water is excluded. The seed-bag is a simple leather bag containing dry flax-seed, which, fastened to the tube at the point desired, slides easily down in its dry state, and when in position rapidly swells so as to shut the whole orifice and leave the well of oil undisturbed by superincumbent water.

In all good wells the oil is found with, i. e., probably floating on, salt-water. This water evidently has no current, but lies shut up within fixed boundaries. Hence both it and the oil are local products. Whatever their cause and origin they are now where they were originally deposited, or, if they have flowed at all, they have now ceased to flow, having arrived at the point where no outlet leads them further on. Were this not so, much greater irregularity and different peculiarities would mark the yield of the wells.

This may be a fitting place to introduce, and submit for consideration, a theory respecting the formation and deposit of Petroleum, or Rock Oil; or rather of that deposit most fully developed in Northwest Pennsylvania. I submit this theory without claiming any authority for it. The geological facts upon which it is based are so well known, and stated by so many authors, that no one can be fairly credited with them. They are these. In the Chemung period of the Devonian age an internal sea, with a shore where Southwest New York and Northwest Pennsylvania now are, covered at least the whole middle of the continent of North America. This was the period in which were laid down the rocks that the oil-seekers are now so industriously boring. Limestone is not found; therefore the sea was shallow. Shale alternates with sandstone; therefore mud-flats must have existed with sandy barriers. A similar condition of shore now exists along the Atlantic side of New Jersey. It is altogether probable, as Nature's works always bear resemblance to each other, that the Chemung shores of the early internal sea bore close resemblance to the present New Jersey sand-banks and included marshes. These marshes are thickly covered with a heavy and rank salt grass, which grows sturdily and in great thickness, with its roots well matted with sea-weed. Channels are cut through them in various directions. Remembering now that the earth's crust was then in the Chemung period, we know that the soil of the marshes must have enjoyed at least a tropical heat. The atmosphere, as is well known, was surcharged with carbonic acid gas. Thus we have the three elements necessary for vigorous vegetation, viz., mud-flats, great heat, and plenty of nutriment for vegetable life. It becomes only less than positively certain that large salt-water marshes existed in the Chemung period, and that these marshes were filled with rank salt vegetation. It is further well known that the surface of the ground then, much more than now, underwent the processes of slow or rapid subsidence and uprising. These salt-marshes, throwing up gigantic and fragile weeds, may have been subject to subsidence—not enough actually to destroy vegetation, but only sufficient to draw mature plants under water and keep them there undecayed as water will, and furnish just enough decay at top to feed the new vegetation that would struggle upward. Let this process go on, as a similar one did in the fresh marshes of the coal-formations, and we have the one thing needed for the making of petroleum; viz., a deposit of undecayed vegetable substance, or perhaps many of them separated by water-courses or even sand-banks, the whole extending over large areas, and the separate ones perhaps many miles or possibly hundred of miles in extent. When all this was laid down, and a sufficient depth had been preserved, a sudden subsidence would cause the ocean to burst in the sand-barriers, and, sweeping over the marshes, carry every where a deep burial-covering of sand. This may have been repeated more than once, and layers of salt-marsh vegetation may have underlain every sand deposit. Thus, within walls that effectually excluded the atmosphere, the sea-plants, soft and easily decomposed into their chemical elements, lay waiting for Nature's next act. What was this? What, according to all analogy, could it have been but the application of the internal heat? This acting powerfully and steadily could not consume these plants, and drive off in vapor the salt-water shut up with them. The sand, now hardening into sand-rock, prevented that. The heat therefore distilled the watery weeds, taking away their form as it extracted the simple carbon and hydrogen which composed them. This carbon and hydrogen sought a new combination, and joining in proportions which chemical laws well know, and which were compatible with the heat of distillation, formed the hydro-carbonic compound now known as Petroleum or Rock Oil. The salt-water took its place beneath the oil, and the gas, which high heat also at the same time evolved, rose over both oil and water. The same heat that distilled the oil operated with some force upon the sand; and while helping its formation into rock at the same time cracked it in every direction. These cracks probably have some yet undiscovered general trend or bearing. That point is worth careful study. Now, however, it is only necessary to note the fact of the cracks or crevices. The attraction of gravitation, or the weight of the sand-rock would, after the distillation of the oil, press down into the liquid mass. Hence the gas and oil and water would rise into every crevice and run through all the sand-rock wherever a crack, vertical, inclined, or horizontal, small or large, could be found.

It is quite possible, at the time of the distillation of the oil, that gas in large quantities may, in some places, have been evolved. This, by its expansive force, would act powerfully against the overlying rock crust. If at any place that crust should yield, it would be lifted so as to make folds in the surface. In some places it might even crack without breaking through the surface of upward folds. These cracks extending far over the previous level would be seized by the waters then again submerging the land, and made into channels for their currents. When again the uprising land emerged from the ocean these channels would be the beds of streams. For ages running along these beds, carrying off the vast volumes of drainage waters incident to those wet eras, these streams would cut deep beneath the surface, while the debris from the upper strata, cut off by frosts and subordinate erosions, would fall down the banks.

The river valleys of the whole oil region are valleys of erosion; and whenever anticlinal in character, i. e., when the rocks on either side pitch away from the line of the stream, it is at least probable that their original course may have been determined by the causes above named. If so, the same force must have made cracks in the rocks below, and especially in those of hard and solid texture, which would not bear compression. These lower cracks are penetrated by drilling for oil in or near the banks of streams.

In boring now these underground cracks of the hard or the sand rocks are penetrated, sometimes at their tops, where the compressed gas being confined it alone escapes, sometimes just below at the oil level. In this case it often happens that the confined gas reacting against the oil drives it out of the well in volumes or jets, making what is called a flowing well, i. e., a well that yields oil without pumping. Again, the drill may strike at the lower part of the crevice, where the salt-water lies, which must all be pumped out before oil. A paper in the American Journal of Science, September, 1864, treats of these crevices in a very clear and scientific manner. A reader desirous of fuller explanations may with profit read that article.

There may be one objection to the above view respecting the origin of petroleum. It may be said that fossils, the one proof of geological facts and the one basis of sound scientific theorizing, are wanting—we do not find remains of the grass of salt-marshes. The answer is, that analogy can no more be discarded from geological science than from any other branch of knowledge. We know that the coal was deposited in a similar way. Of that there is ample proof from fossils. A theory, therefore, which accounts for existing phenomena, and accords with the facts of another well-known and similar natural production, can hardly be overthrown for want of fossils, especially as none of the oil deposits are found so near the surface that we can get at the fossils; while the distillation probably so effectually destroyed the form of the soft, watery plants that no remains of them could reasonably be expected now to exist.

The banks of the Alleghany preserve a varied uniformity all the way down. High bluffs, always wooded and very seldom showing the rock, run now on one side close to the stream and very steep, with opposing flats beneath an opposite remoter bluff, or a gently rising broken slope. The river winds continually, sometimes as at Tidionte, taking a duly westward course. At intervals the bluffs break suddenly, opening for creeks and small water-courses, and not unfrequently deep depressions run away perpendicular to the course of the stream over the crests of the hills. Some persons say that these gorges and breaks indicate the course of the subterranean crevices in the rocks, and are good guides in locating wells. Facts, however, are too few as yet to warrant any fixed rules for the guidance of practical enterprises.

Tionesta was the point chosen for a Saturday night stopping and a Sunday rest. Thirty miles in a skiff, although down stream and with an oarsman more than half the way, produced in a novice some weariness and a little heat of hands. It was dark before the destination was reached, and when found was not attractive. Grounding on shore in the darkness, and pulling out of the current the four rough boards slightly nailed together, and not very symmetrically formed, which in that country they call a skiff, I followed a light and asked for the hotel. Bailey from Maine, the smiling landlord, took me in, assured me that nobody would steal my skiff before Monday morning, gave me a warm supper and a good bed, and in every way cheerfully ministered as best he knew to my comfort.

Now I had reached the outskirts of speculation. Plenty of 1860 wells lifted their black derricks all around, and there were excellent traditions of their productiveness. At the hotel three cliques of New Yorkers were found, every one distinct in enterprise and all full of high expectation. As examples of the stories to travelers here are two. An island of not thirty acres lately sold for $40,000. Seven and a half acres on it later sold for $45,000. Nine acres of main land, near the bridge on left bank Tionesta Creek, at $7000 per acre. I say nothing of these prices. Men have their own heads to keep their own purses.

One thing surprised me here and through the whole oil region. Though on Pennsylvania soil New Yorkers control the speculations, and own largely in the land. You meet almost literally New Yorkers alone wherever you travel; and, most remarkable circumstance of all, and quite amusing, was a large full map—topographical, geological, and isothermal—of New York in the hotel at Oil City; while maps of Pennsylvania, and especially of the oil regions, could neither be bought, borrowed, nor begged. Some small New Yorkers are going to be badly swallowed up—"taken in" doesn't express it—by the big fish, with their grand schemes. But if little fish will swim in deep water they must take the consequences.

From Tionesta down unmistakable proved oil territory begins to appear. Much more may lie above, but it wants full proving yet. The bluffs and flats, the gorges and forests, the windings and the ripples, the wild shores, and the deer hunters waiting for deer, driven by their hunting dogs out in the woods, to take the water. These were the pictures that mingled with abandoned derricks as the skiff floated solitarily down stream.

"Hemlock" once, now the more ambitious town of President, was the natural place to dine. Rounding inshore with a handsome sweep, which my boyish sports had taught me how to make, the admiration of a smiling, intelligent-looking, plainly-dressed man in gray was elicited. "You have been on the water before," he said. Returning him a grateful look for the compliment, I replied politely as he boated and I took the shore.

I little thought when I exchanged a few words with and parted from the young man in gray, that he was one of the sudden millionaires of the land. Three brothers, with educations obtained at a Western Commercial College as their only capital, came into this oil region four years ago. Now they hardly know what they are worth. In lands undeveloped and already productive they count up many hundreds of thousands. The celebrated Heydrick Wells of the Alleghany River bear their name. It is their boast that any bargain either makes, however it may seem to their common disadvantage, all will ratify, bond or no bond.

Below President the wells thicken, and 300 feet is their usual depth. Their yield increases steadily. Some have flowed, one as much as 250 barrels per day. Many are pumping now from 6 to 60 barrels daily. The proved oil property extends from a few miles below President, growing better as you round Heydrick, Pit-hole, and Walnut Bends, until you begin to approach Oil City. The improved above and below may be equally good, but their capacity is as yet unknown and doubtful.

Oil City! Any city after such a wilderness! My fancy painted me a resting-place. Not home, indeed, but cleanliness and comfort entered into my expectations. But, alas! I had parted with those little travelers' trifles. The last of them faded with the Langstaff greeting, and the Langstaff farewell. At the end of fifty miles there had been found one abundant table, with even the luxury of snowy napkins, and the cheer of a domestic circle, forced by surrounding pressure "to take in boarders." Fresh from this oasis, I looked forward hopefully, after another weary row, for the green things, and the sweetness of a city's comforts. I didn't find many green things, unless some of the buyers were verdant; and as to sweetness, let us wait until we land.

It was not an easy thing to land at Oil City. In the first place, it was difficult to tell where the city lay. After a survey, the dirty shanties on the muddy right bank, along which were moored black and slippery oil scows, were thought to indicate the outskirts of the town. Asking for the Petroleum House, I was pointed to a low, dingy, but comparatively extensive, once white structure, hugging the bluff at the mouth of the creek. The rains had made the current strong; but putting my oars in position and myself in place, I prepared to show my power over the rushing waters. But in fact the waters showed their power over me, and catching me under a sloping scow bow, entered my skiff at will. This difficulty conquered, I pulled on further; but taking my bearings the Petroleum House still kept far away, and I pulled for a scow and landed. Driving a quick trade with a jolly boatman, who lent me a hand, he became full owner of my eight-dollar skiff, and I the owner of three dollars in greenbacks.

So my skiff journey was over, and city and hotel comforts were to intervene before the horseback part of the journey would begin.

I landed. Oh! is this Oil City? Whew, what smells so? Nothing but the gaseous wealth of the oily region. But pigs, mud, no sidewalks! Ah, but you are on the bank yet. Business can not afford to wash the ways down which oil barrels run, nor to scrub their leaky sides. Wait until you reach the main thoroughfare, the grand promenade, the fashionable street of the place. I waited. That is, I walked between wells and oil yards, barns and pens, along the slippery way, keeping my bearings as I could, and aiming for the Petroleum House front. I found the main street, the promenade, the leading thoroughfare. It was bare of trotting buggies. It was bare of handsome carriages. It was not at all dusty. Up one side rose a ledge of shale rocks, crowned on top with the "primeval forest." At its immediate foot ran the street. No, it didn't run. It couldn't run. Neither could it stand still. It was just too thick for water, and wholly too thin for land. Horses dragging heavy teams with a few barrels of oil sank below their knees, and tugged on. Horsemen, booted to the middle, floundered this way and that. The narrowest plank walk filled with hurrying men, muddy and eager, pushed by. A slip of a team horse, and his effort at recovery, sent the liquid, oily, earthy mixture of the street in showers among the walkers. Every body was used to it. I tried not to look like a novice. I looked upward at the green just under the clouds. My breath drew in the sweetness of the manifold combinations around. One silent oil well stood, unpumped and locked, just at the point of the bluff where the up-creek mud ran into and made one muddle with the mud of the town. That well flows, and has flowed for years, 15 barrels daily. One man owns it. $150 per day it gives him of income. All he has to do is daily to go in and take it. The region near, however, shows many abandoned derricks. Immediately around Oil City well digging had not proved on the whole profitable.

At the Petroleum House the landlords give their guests their best attention. Cleanliness in such a mud-hole is a simple impossibility. The food was good, the rooms quiet, and the beds clean. Any man that wants more had better not try this region.

Next day it rained. Oh! one might look out, and one might look in. Mud was outside, and not outside alone. Damp was outside, and it wouldn't stay outside. Having taken cold already from unusual exposure, a chill was in the atmosphere, and a chill was in my bones. My doctor had sent me into the fields among the rocks in hope of restoring a constitution shattered by a too sedentary life, and brain somewhat overworked. This was a little more than the doctor had prescribed. Nursing was out of the question. I couldn't conveniently get sick; therefore I resolved I wouldn't, and I didn't.

Next morning the sun shone. Early on horseback, with an umbrella and a shawl, inclosing a box of paper collars, strapped to the saddle, I was prepared for a three days' excursion up Oil Creek. Taverns, I was told, were scattered all along. Derricks, I was also told, were thick as ships' masts in New York docks. The great oil elephant would soon exhibit to me his huge body. His legs and trunk only reached round to and up the Alleghany.

The sun was warm, and though the clearing had been at night instead of the morning, which weather-wise acres say is a bad sign, I made up my mind for a warm ride, and for such wholesome perspiration as would drive out the cold got in the skiff on the Alleghany. It required good horsemanship to get safely out of town. A wagoner, driving his team up the hillocks and down the holes which underlie the apparent dead level of the soft road under the bluff, assured me for my comfort that up the creek the roads were worse yet. The assurance produced more curiosity than dismay. I became at once hopefully interested in the sight of roads worse than the streets of Oil City.

A wide flat extended at my right. The creek coming rapidly down made a sweep at the right bank, and washed the very foot of the bluff, along which the road held its slippery way. Beyond the creek lay the first flat of the valley, and as the scenery of the whole region was like its opening, a person who has noticed the external features for half a mile from its mouth has seen whatever is striking and peculiar in it all. The bluffs, generally high and steep, lie close to the river bank, now on one side and now on the other. Their line is generally curved, and they frequently break down suddenly into sharp gorges, which are succeeded just beyond by a new bluff line. Occasionally they sink gradually to low points; in which case corresponding low points, sometimes slightly overlapping, begin a new rise and new order of semi-precipices. At the curves of the bluffs, sometimes at their feet, but more frequently on the opposite sides of the creek, wide flats extend. These flats for miles are covered with black derricks, some silent, and some bearing the unceasing pump, which, with a steady "clip, clip," raises the odorous oily wealth from the secret caverns below. The whole aspect is as unattractive as any one with a prejudice for cleanliness, a nose for sweet smells, and a taste for the green of country landscapes can well imagine. Every thing you see is black. The soil is black, being saturated with waste petroleum. The engine-houses, pumps, and tanks are black, with the smoke and soot of the coal-fires which raise the steam to drive the wells. The shanties—for there is scarcely a house in the whole seven miles of oil territory along the creek—are black. The men that work among the barrels, machinery, tanks, and teams are white men blackened. Some, I afterward learned, were millionaires looking out for their own properties, and enjoying in imagination, for they could not in fact, the "clean money" they were heaping together. Through all this dismal scenery horsemen were riding hither and thither, generally alone, though occasionally in small groups. By the questions put to you in return, when inquiries were made at wells about their depth, the rocks bored through, the water-courses struck, and the "shows of oil and gas," it was apparent what all these horsemen were after. Nearly every man above the grade of laborer, after answering geological inquiries, asked, or looked like asking on his own account, if you didn't want to buy a "nice thing." Even the trees, which timidly clung to the sides of the bluffs, wore the universal sooty covering. Their very leaves were black. Only up toward the sky under the clouds, away along the tops of rocks, could the verdure of nature be seen. All below was in sombre clothing, except the sparkling creek, which rattled along its shallow bed. This in the sunlight glittered not like a silver thread in a setting of jet, as a poet would imaginatively assert, but in fact like one vast moving string of opal. The wasted oil from numberless wells floated over its whole surface, and spreading thinly out from bank to bank, reflected in changing beauty, from every ripple and wave, an exquisitely subdued brilliancy of rainbow hues. Up against this gorgeous stream, wholly oblivious of their vile contrast, struggled square, black, oily scows, filled with greasy, "loud smelling" barrels, drawn by horses harnessed as to a team on land, which walked knee-deep in the every where fordable water, and were driven by muddy oily men.

The production of the oil region, I found upon inquiry, was very variable. Abandoned wells were far more numerous than working ones. The reason given is that old leases stand in the way of improvement. The lessees having exhausted their means four years ago, can not work their wells, and others will not until the old leases shall have been extinguished. Some who claim to know say that the whole oil product on the creek does not increase; because new wells striking into old crevices reduce the amount of old wells as much as they themselves produce. It is certain that great oil strikes are no longer looked for. The flowing wells, some of which once yielded thousands of barrels daily, have now all fallen down either to a few hundreds, a few tens, or have even sunk to the order of the pumping class. The pumps draw from half a barrel daily up to about eighty, varying, however, continually. In general there is a diminution of production; though sometimes a sudden falling-off is succeeded by a partial recovery. On the whole, however, the business is steadily getting out of the hands of those who with small means are making haste to get rich, into those of persons who have capital with which to "hold on;" and energy, skill, and perseverance, with which to make the most and the best of knowledge and opportunity.

Turning to the left, about four miles up, my horse's head pointed up Cherry-tree Run, a branch of Oil Creek, which comes in from the northwest. Here I found only experimental wells. Cherry Run, on the other side of the creek, coming in from the northeast, is now the centre of speculation and enterprise. It is thought more promising than the creek itself. But this northwest branch has as yet been taken only by speculators. No wells of importance had early in September been sunk in it. Why it should not prove as productive as any other portion of the vicinity no geologist can say, for its features above ground are certainly like the rest. But well-boring is a venture. If you have a well, you have it; if you haven't a well, you haven't it: and that is all one positively knows. More careful observation may afford data hereafter out of which science may form safe rules for locating oil wells; but facts are too few as yet. Therefore, readers, don't buy into merely "promising" companies for investment. Speculate any where; only be ready to bear pecuniary loss, and risk the moral consequences. There are some prizes, though they are getting few and small, with many and large blanks.

Two miles from the mouth of Cherry-tree Run one old well was down, not yielding, and two new ones were sinking. Riding up to inspect the débris and to question the driller, I was surprised at the sight of a nice-looking, tidy, and intelligent woman, with a key at her girdle. If I had met her in some wealthy mansion I should have had no difficulty in recognizing the easy, affable, and self-confident housekeeper. Her very aspect was suggestive of plenty and contentment. I looked all round the woods, but saw no signs of mansion, with its assurance of a well-stocked larder and comfortable promise of forks of silver, napkins and cloth of linen, with covers containing whatever a hungry traveler might desire. There was a shanty away in the woods, toward which the hospitable matron was soon picking, not wending, her way, through brush and stumps, after promising respecting dinner "to do the best she could." Nor was this a little; for perfect cleanliness pervaded table, bureau, chairs, and stove, the furniture of the one room of the shanty; and out of the store-house corner of the rough plank vestibule came forth meat and vegetables, which were soon smoking in savory stew. The father of the hostess had been an "Edinburgh gentleman," and her mother an "English lady of Scotch descent." She and her man were Scotch. He had been some years in this country, and four years in the oil region. Although he had found and located for other people some of the best wells on Oil Creek, he had not been fortunate in the selections he had made for himself. At least his own leases had not been profitable to himself, though others who had bought him out were now in a fair way to make money.

He was a burly, open-hearted Scot, full of conversation, and a wizard as well. He did not seem to know or care much for geological science; but if any man wanted to put down a well he could tell him where to locate. I was all attention at once. This was the practical problem I would like to solve. Once solved, the uncertainty of the pursuit of oil would be removed. It would at once take rank and position among the law-governed affairs of business. He informed me that it was a peculiar gift, this power of his. Some others had it, but not many. He knew at that moment where four wells could be sunk, two of which would produce 50 barrels every day, and two others 25. I was all eagerness to learn the secret; but it proved to be the mystery of the witch-hazel.

Some are wizards; and this is the way with their divining rod: they cut a crotch of the hazel, plum, or peach, with its two legs long and slender. Their extreme points are held in either hand, in the palms beneath the ends of the closed fingers. The insides of the wrists are then turned upward, and the thumbs outward. The point of the crotch is held near the breast, inclined very slightly from you. Thus armed and equipped the wizard walks over the land. Water-courses sometimes trouble him; for the "witch-hazel" is also a revealer of springs. But he professes to have learned the different effects upon his rod of oil or water-attraction. None but a very novice would now mistake the one for the other. Whenever an oil crevice is passed over down goes the point of the crotch, and the force and manner of the down-turning indicate the size and depth of the deposit. A wonderful story is told about the distinguished oil man, Mr. Phillips. He was about to locate a well when a wizard drove a stake for him. He laughed at the man; but having no better place to choose actually drilled down at the wizard's stake. Finding there one of his largest flowing wells he became a convert, and ever after has called in the aid of one of the gifted ones. Not having met Mr. Phillips I can not confirm the story. It is given as part of fully believed traditions of the oil region.

Dinner for man, but no oats for horse! Up the valley we went a little further to see more land, and, if practicable, feed the horse. A new well was found that had spouted vigorously when first struck, and was now receiving pump-rods. By the side of the new well was met a prospective millionaire. A young farmer, with land near by for sale, was eloquent upon the "show" the new well had made. He was just my man. A little study of human nature would afford agreeable relief after that of rocks and oil-veins. He was in age somewhere near the third ten. His homestead was a tumble-down log-house; but some of his farm having already been sold he had a cash balance on hand, and a "mighty pile" looming in his fancy. He took me to see some of the promising places he had for sale. On Fox Run, a brook coming into Cherry-tree from the west, he had thirty acres of "excellent oil lands." An old well at the mouth of the brook had made a "fine show." Success was sure. Any borer could make his fortune. All he asked for the whole thirty acres was $75,000. He thought I was in fun when I proposed he should make it round numbers, and ask $100,000. But there was an evident struggle in his mind when he found I was not a purchaser, between a doubt of my joking intention and a benevolent design of intimating to him that he could have got more for the asking. After chatting with him and two stragglers in for half an hour in the shelter of an unfinished shop, building in preparation for the expected influx of speculators and new well-borers, I had obtained all the information and amusement I desired. Going out with directions how to reach Oil Creek over the intervening hills, I went to where I had tied my horse. The heavy, prone trunk of the tree was there, but the horse was not.

manded the homeward road, it was certain that the horse had not gone that way. Looking up the hill that led into the woods I saw him, as I supposed, some fifty yards away. Bidding my merry speculating farmer a cheerful good-by, I walked on to secure my horse, so as to lose no more time in seeing the rest of the wonders. On arriving where my horse seemed to be, but was not, I noticed a very singular rotten stump, that, damp with the many showers of the day, then glistened in the treacherous sunlight. It was a reddish-brown stump, large, and inclined, but not a bright bay horse. The animal had gone this way, for his fresh tracks were visible in the wet, untraveled cart-track. Having had only the experience of thickly-inhabited regions, I pushed on cheerfully, rather pleased with the walking exercise after so many hours on horseback, and expecting every moment to come to some farmhouse and barn, where I made no doubt my horse would be found asking for oats. He had given me several evidences during the day of having a will of his own, and I had fallen into the natural error of mistaking that quality for intelligence. I should not have fallen into this error with a man, but when a horse turned readily backward and looked sharply at the only shanty barn we had passed, I was, I think, excusable in giving him credit for intelligence, and supposing that he knew my dinner-hour ought to have coincided with his own. As I seemed to have forgotten him, he had started off dinner-hunting on his own account. I walked, and walked, and walked, until the novelty of the exercise had quite worn off. On went my horse's fresh tracks, and on I went after them. The warm sun became overclouded. One of those floating masses of vapor which with silver edges shut out the rays of heat, surcharge the atmosphere suddenly with cold, and pour down not drops, but heavy streams of water, came on overhead. The day had witnessed many of those showers, but thus far I had managed to take them under shelter. This time the slight protection of the forest was all I could obtain; but this did not save my weariness from the added discomfort of damp and cold. To my delight, as the rain was ceasing a boy came toward me riding my horse. It was the same horse and the same saddle, but my shawl and umbrella had been evidently lost off. With it had gone my three days' baggage. I went toward the boy very gratefully, determined to be very generous in remuneration. The nearer I got the more I was sure of my horse. The boy, however, did not seem to understand my thanks. He had just taken the horse from his father's stable, near Cherry-tree. His father had raised the horse. It was just three years old. The evidence began to go against me. Recovery was removed into the distance. Hope fled! The boy hadn't even seen my horse.

But Cherry-tree was not far off, and on I went. Cherry-tree mill—nobody had seen a stray horse. Cherry-tree tavern—the horse was not standing at the barn asking for oats, like the sensible horse I had given him credit for being. Nobody had seen him at the tavern. Cherry-tree blacksmith-shop—two teams, a broken wagon mending, a horse or two waiting, village loafers hanging round. Nobody had seen a stray horse! I thought myself by this time thoroughly worn out. To walk further seemed less desirable than to part with a considerable proportion of the greenbacks in my pocket. I gave up the horse in despair, and offered any price to be taken where I could find any public conveyance to Oil City. The horse and fixtures—saddle, bridle, shawl, umbrella, and paper collars—might find themselves. I wouldn't look for them any longer. A general laugh greeted my expressions of dismay and weariness. It was a sympathetic, not a derisive laugh, and I joined in it. The laugh was refreshing. It encouraged me, and I walked a quarter of a mile further on. Going that quarter of a mile, I saw distinct signs of oil in a capital place for a well, and at the end of it came to the end of Cherry-tree. There stood the grocery store—it also was full of loungers. Nobody had seen my horse; and there was no horse in all the neighborhood that could be obtained for love or money—both which commodities I offered to dispense freely. The green-horns grinned at one another, and laughed sympathetically at me, as I threw myself on the counter in as comfortable a position as I could improvise, and declared I couldn't and wouldn't go any farther.

Hope having entirely fled at the grocery store I trudged back to the tavern and lay down on a bench. Soon a team drove up from the blacksmith-shop. The driver had there met me and heard me relate my misfortune. He couldn't possibly drive his team back to Oil Creek, but for three dollars would ride one of his horses bare-back and give me the other blanketed, and thus we might reach a point where a stage or something else could take me to Oil City. Mounted on a raw-boned iron-gray, with the gait of an ox and the head of a locomotive, we set out. In went the sun, and down came the cold water. I thought I never saw or heard of a cloud so small that could rain so much. There was no help. It began to draw toward evening as we drew nigh to Ryndville. Some boys had seen just my horse, bundle and all; and doubtless the Ryndville tavern-keeper had him. The last mile was comforted. Descending from the gray-skinned skeleton on the cold door-step of the Dutch tavern, I gave the Dutch teamster his three dollars, and turned to the Dutcher landlord, asking confidently for my horse. He had not seen a stray horse. Nobody had seen a stray horse.

"Had the stage gone down to Oil City?"

"Long ago. No other until morning."

I looked in at the dirty bar-room and the fireless stove. I looked further into the filthy eating-room. I looked up at the open windows of the damp and cheerless chambers. I was sure the sheets were oily, and I had been told that petroleum was not an exterminator of red-jacketed night-walkers. It was impossible to stay there. One nice, comfortable house was in the village. I put for it. The door from the yard opened into the eating-room. A warm fire was burning in the stove. Cleanliness pervaded the apartment. A long table was set out, loaded with clean food, with meat, and hot, smoking griddle-cakes up and down. I was overjoyed at the prospect of refreshment. I wished to be as delicate as possible in my hints, and yet let my plight be known. I therefore mentioned my unfortunate loss of my horse, and my inability to get on further, as neither public nor private conveyance could be obtained. When I had done speaking the side of a sharp face on the lank figure of a man in broadcloth turned up, and partly toward me, from before one of those smoking piles of hot cakes.

"Boarding houses there," he said, pointing with his finger.

Out I went into the deepening twilight, where the rain was beginning again to fall. Out to grocery stores, shanties, any thing, any where, in search of a horse or lodgings. Neither could be found, and I wandered to the bank of the creek, where the belated horsemen were passing toward Oil City. I hailed a young man who looked as if he knew the neighborhood.

"Excuse me, Sir." He reined up his horse.

"Can you tell me if any Christians can be found near here?"

He called to his companion, with a suppressed smile on his face:

"John, do you know of any Christians about here?"

John thought there was one on the Tarr farm about a mile up across the creek, who kept a tavern, and bore the name of Burroughs. Off I started, but found I could not possibly get on further. Some premonitory symptoms in the head warned me not to attempt more walking and fasting. The case was desperate. I dragged myself back to the comfortable house. Going in I saw the table, but the cakes had all disappeared.

"Sir, I have come to ask charity. I can not find my horse, I can not get another. I am faint, hungry, and wet. I can get no decent accommodations in the village, and I can walk no farther."

"I can't turn any body out. Come in."

I went in, I sat by his fire, I ate his supper. My confidence in Providence was vindicated. A boy who had found my horse just beyond the bend in the road where it forked away from the village of Cherry-tree had followed me up, and found me. He demanded five dollars for his trouble, got it, hitched the foolish beast who had lost his dinner, and I went back to my host. A gentleman from Ohio in the house had been very talkative, gave me some valuable practical information, for which in return I gave my theory about the formation of petroleum, and my opinion of its probable continuance. But my host said hardly a word. Of course I offered pay for my supper. "He didn't charge any thing."

Thanking him, and getting directions to guide me in the darkness, I mounted my horse again and pushed on up the creek among the black skeletons, under the dismal bluffs, and through the soft winding roads of the dark flat. Coming down from a high turn in the road, I found myself with high banks on the right and left, and before me the wide rushing stream on which the clouded moon was spreading a few spare beams. My horse was a small horse. The surface of the water was smooth. I feared it was deep. Just then far away in the dimness, halfway to the opposite shore, a large black object, evidently an oil scow, went floating by. An upright outline in the stern, and another in the bow, might be men or might be boys. I ventured a hail. "Can I ford the creek here?" "Yes!" came clearly over the water, and in I went. Not literally, for my horse went in, and only my boots in the stirrups went in also. We got safely over. We were landed at the Tarr farm. It was thick with shanties, engine-houses, pumps, and derricks. But the horse picked his way. Lights began to appear in the distance. The large whiteness of Burrough's tavern loomed lightly in the cloudy, rainy moonshine. I was approaching the public house of the Christian man. My day's adventures were about closing. Rest for man and beast drew near and nearer. At last I dismounted at the tavern door. Burroughs answered my summons, and replied to my request for entertainment,

"Not a bed or bench in the house unoccupied! Not a seat at table! Not one stall for a horse!"

"Is there any other public house here?"

"None."

"Can I be accommodated any where?"

"I don't know, I am sure."

"What shall I do?"

"Indeed I can not say."

A young man out in the darkness heard the conversation. "Perhaps Potter will take him;" and off he shot. I followed the light of his cigar, and soon heard a shout, "Potter!"

"Well, what do you want?"

"Can you take a horse for the night?"

"Yes, send him over to the cow stable."

I rode toward the sound and found the cow stable. Potter took in my horse.

"Now for the man, what can you do with him?"

Several lanterns threw light on both Potter and myself. He gave me a searching look, saw I was not a peddler, and said he would do the best he could for me.

Potter was a teamster who drove loaded scows up-stream to the lower end of the unfinished Oil Creek Railroad. He lived in a shanty on the Tarr farm, and was making money. His nice little wife and hospitable mother-in-law made me much more comfortable than I could have been at the tavern. I was warmed and dried at the cooking-stove. My boots were stowed away in a warm place for the night. An obliging man gave up his bed to me. The women, all kindness and attention, made it up with clean sheets, and I was soon repairing damages in sound slumber.

The next morning the sun shone in earnest. I rode my horse all day, stopped at the remarkable wells, ending with the Noble, that silently and alone pours out between four and five hundred barrels every day and Sunday too.

Over the hills to Plumerville! Why do the borers for oil cling along the banks of the rivers and creeks? A geologist would give a reason connected with the fracturing of the crust, and the original direction given to the first water-courses, why wells should be sunk near rivers. But he would also say that crevices might be caused by the shrinkage cracks made when the sand and mud were hardening into rock by the same heat which distilled the oil from the vegetation of the salt-marshes; and these crevices are doubtless under the hills which separate the rivers. In riding across from the head-waters of one creek to those of others I saw what seemed fair oil signs, and heard some rumors of intended prospecting, far up and far inland.

Plumerville is above the head of the developed oil region of Cherry Run. On this stream some valuable flowing wells have been struck—one, the Reed, said to be now (September) flowing two hundred and fifty barrels daily. Others are flowing steadily, and many pumping profitably. Derricks and drillers are getting thick; and here, as on Oil Creek, they will doubtless soon begin to tap each other's deposits, and finally bring all down to a low average of productiveness. Those who know will make money here, but those who follow with little knowledge will run some risk of being "cleaned out."

The celebrated Humboldt refinery lies below Plumerville—the best appointed and largest refinery in the region. Some of its crude oil is carted, and much spilled on the way, as the oil-covered puddles in the road evince. But much also is pumped over the hill from the Tarr farm in tubes. The Ludovici Brothers evidently have both capital and skill. They too are boring for oil, but not yet successfully.

Rouseville lies at the junction of Oil Creek and Cherry Run. It is a village of shanties. But a pair, at least, of young ladies live there, who know how to sport jaunty hats, and to take young gentlemen in tow. They took the mud and the occasional planks as if they were used to them; and accepted the escort of the youth, who was speedily tired of my questions, with all the ease of Broadway promenaders. Many old wells were in Rouseville; some daubed with a petroleum paint, and the engine-house of one containing, in rough letters, this legend, half fun and half disappointment, "Oil or China!"

Wells had here been tried on the hill, and oil found at the same level with the wells along the creek. Many new derricks were going up, and much confidence is felt there that, adding on the rise of the hill, oil will be found at corresponding depths with the wells in the valley.

Refineries are scattered all along the creek. They are not particularly new or interesting. Near one Mr. St. John, of Oil City—from whom much valuable information was obtained, and whose courtesy I would thankfully acknowledge—showed me an experiment in progress by which a failing well was in course of resuscitation. It is the theory that old wells become impaired by paraffine, a kind of thickened oil, which, adhering to the rocks and tubes, prevents the free flow of the oil. It is important to soften this. A three-quarter-inch pipe was in this case sent down nearly to the bottom of the well, the upper end being attached to the boiler. By its side an inch discharge-pipe was also put down, the top of the well being stuffed by a seed-bag. The steam drove oil and water out of the discharge-pipe; but the seed-bag not making a tight-joint, the whole contents of the well boiled up against it, and penetrated even to the top of the ground.

The patent Crocker Blower is another contrivance for reviving old wells, and particularly for renewing the flow in those that have stopped. This is a simple air-pump, which forces air at great pressure, and of course heightened temperature, down the orifice of a well. This air passes through the oily deposit in a tube fitted for the purpose, and driving up a discharge-pipe, creates a vacuum, which helps the weakly expanding gases below in driving out the oil. Perhaps some of this air may find its way to the tight compartment in the crevice where the gas is confined, and help it, by its own expansion, in ejecting the oil. The blower has been successful at the Empire-well, but both are as yet experiments.

How do the gentlemen live in those oily regions?

If the ladies could look in upon them they would see what unkempt savages the men become when they go beyond the limits of home and the boundaries of society. Without much attention to style they congregate, eat, and sleep; speculate, talk oil, and sometimes talk other things more flippantly than wisely. It is bad at any time and any where for men to leave their wives and children, and gather together hasting to get rich. Among the thousands around Oil Creek there is room for improvement, socially and morally. Swearing is as common as in the army. Yet they are a cordial and jovial set, full of frolic and mischief as school-boys, intending harm to no one, and very attentive to strangers. Information upon any subject is given courteously; and when satisfied of your own gentlemanly instincts and intentions they will do any thing in reason to serve you. You sit with them at table. You visit them in their offices. You walk about their works. They make no stranger of you. You take them as you find them. They attempt neither concealment nor apology. The good and the bad in them are equally prominent. They wish for the comforts and refinements of home circles, but they can not think of subjecting their wives to their own discomforts. Every one hopes to make a speedy fortune, and take it away. Meanwhile they are running heavy risks. Men are fearful mutual tempters. Perhaps the evils can not be remedied. But every wife and sister had better call home as often as practicable their beloved.

Oil City once more! The same oily city!

Southerly lie the oil regions improved, but rapidly undergoing trial: the Lower Alleghany, Dark Hollow, East Sandy, French Creek, the Clarion River, and even a creek far down in the bituminous coal regions, above the coal deposit. This last, if a true oil-field, must be anew accounted for. Its deposit may result from other causes than those found in the Chemung Rocks. There are peculiarities about the Virginia oil-fields well worth notice; and if oil should be found in Eastern Kentucky or Tennessee a geologist would not be surprised.

There in the future science will hunt, labor will develop, and adventure may be met.

ALMOST DIVORCED.

ONE would not guess they had ever a difference in their lives, just to see Mr. and Mrs. Puffer jogging along comfortably together in the same straight-backed green wagon, drawn by the same pumpkin-and-milk horse which took them home on the first day of their honey-moon; or, if not the very same horse, one precisely like it. Neither would one think it to see them of a Sunday—he in his sky-blue swallow-tailed coat, and she in her invisible green pongee silk and very-visible green satin bonnet, sailing off like a tug-boat towing a full-rigged schooner, he being exceeding spare, and she being exceeding portly.

And yet they once came as near dissolving into twain again as one flesh ever did. No one knows of it, however, excepting Counselor Sabin and I; and now, if I tell it to you, you are by no means to repeat the story.

Long and long before Mrs. Puffer was a fluffy old woman in caps and spectacles, when she was instead a plump, apple-faced girl, with eyes the color of whortleberries and skin the color of milk, she had a way very taking to the youths of her acquaintance—a way of which, I discover, she and her coevals by no means secured the monopoly; for truly as I write I see, under the elm-tree by my window, a maiden, in a line of descent full two generations later, standing idly enough swinging her parasol lightly to and fro, and smiling up from under the green ribbons of her jockey as innocent and artless as a damask rose; and I know, as sure as sure can be, that every careless wave and motion is to that boy beside her—a being with hair parted behind, shining with oil, and with no beard worth naming—as the twisting of a spider's web around a tender-hearted fly.

But I do not pity his weakness in letting a bit of blue-eyed calico sway him back and forth as lightly as she does her spotted-handled parasol, because I know they are only playing at a game of see-saw, and years hence Master will be up and Miss will be down. Then it will be my lady's turn to fetch and carry, while she believes a tender word and a smile make amends for every thing.

"Punctured by pins and tortured by fears," yet I rejoice in his pangs and doubts, for the time is brief enough. I'll warrant me that he plays the mouse and she the cat in their story. So also I am glad in my heart for every prick and torment the whortleberries and milk wrought upon young Puffer's callow heart while he was away back in spencers and soap-locks; because I am positive it was along of his man's despotism and love of self that I have this story to tell.

There came a time of course when, having carded and spun and wove and made her twelve dozen of every thing after the manner of the olden time princesses, this plump, white-faced girl, dressed in muslin, heavily embroidered by her own crafty fingers, and farther decorated by a wreath of apple-buds and wild myrtle upon her hair—which was of itself like a whole bush of whortleberries—in the presence of admiring witnesses, was made Mistress Puffer by a dignified, venerable clergyman, who lived in the times when ministers were not mere men. Thus her marriage had the grace and good omen of being a ceremony in which solemnity and sanctity impressively mingled. And Mrs. Grundy, who by no means confines herself to camp and court, affirmed there had never been a wedding in Northumberland which promised better; though the wretch took care to add, with a hypocritical sigh, that good beginnings make sometimes sorriest endings. The wretch was right too, as she most frequently is in measure, for of a truth the heaviest tempests sometimes come convoyed by remarkably bright mornings.

The mother of mischief is no bigger than a midge's wing; and let me, who am an old bird, tell you, young aspirants after the holy sacrament of matrimony! a little secret worth a dozen dozen of love powders and magic potions. Never for any consideration, as you value your domestic bliss, intimate by word, look, or gesture, that the lord of you—modest man—is, may, can, must, or will be in the wrong upon any possible occasion. Believe heartily in the perfection of his attributes if you are able to; such an annihilation of your judgment and common sense will make you more comfortable, doubtless, although it is not totally essential. The appearance, however, if not the reality, most certainly is; therefore, in either event, die and give no sign. Unfortunately for Mistress Puffer, but fortunately for the story, she lived too long ago to have the benefit of my large experience and ready benevolence, and so of her own knowledge she must find,

Springs and summers and autumns and winters had followed one another in monotonous level, each bearing its burden of cares and labors: house-cleaning and planting, butter and hay making, harvesting and fruit-drying, sledding and sewing; then the same round of toilsome duties over again and again, until Mistress Puffer was a wife of so many years that she had long answered to her matronly name with no more blushings and sweet shyness, but as though she had been born to it; until she went on making her soap and cider apple-sauce with sedateness and unction, as if she had always regarded these commonplaces the destined sphere and elected end of woman (as mayhap she had); and as if she had never, no, never, in her wildest days, gone from her chamber to a merry-making by way of window and shed-roof instead of the stairs; being, you see, too generous to disappoint her fellows, and too thoughtful to run any risk of disturbing the repose of her parents, who, themselves no longer young, had a strait-laced notion that every body ought to be sleepy by nine o'clock.

But all this time while she was growing matter-of-fact and portly, in the midst of the bakings and brewings, the washings and stitchings, a little cloud no bigger than a man's hand had arisen in her horizon, and was slowly overspreading the zenith. At least not much bigger: to be explicit, it was just the size and took the form of a milk-pail.

"I wish, husband, you would not milk in the strainer-pail. I don't think it is a neat practice, because dirt is liable to get into the strainer that way. Besides, it isn't necessary; you can milk in the other pail and pour into that just as well for aught I see," said Mistress Puffer.

Possibly Mistress P. had a fault; if so, it was the fault of saying too much. On the other hand, possibly Mr. P. had a fault; if so, it was the fault of saying too little. One might think that, as in the case of the distinguished eaters, Jack Sprat and his wife, these opposite imperfections would prove mightily harmonious in their meeting; but not so. Talking too little is, of the twain, though less oppressively tiresome, I think fraught more heavily with evil; for if a person will not speak how is one to know wherein and wherefor an offense arises, and haste to make due apology and reparation? So while the talking partner is rattling on in all innocence, the silent partner is brooding over some unmeaning slip of the unconscious tongue.

Thus his wife had no means of knowing whether or not Mr. Puffer had any reason for preferring to milk in the strainer-pail. /Possibly he had; one which would have amply contented the mistress, who was by no means an unreasonable dame. But being, like his fellow-beards, mightily autocratic, he considered that his doing it should be sufficient proof of the desirableness of a thing; although, being, like them, also fallible, this was not always a true test; and the dame, who was a woman of common feminine sagacity—I claim no more—knew it.

Therefore the pail came, in next evening bearing the usual unmistakable indications of having been within the forbidden palings of the stable; but not accompanied by the grace of a simple apology, which so easily—especially womanward—covereth, like charity, a multitude of sins. Now you and I know that if Mistress Puffer had not attained to a sufficient degree of sanctification so that she took the offending pail with a heart serene as a summer morning, as doubtless was her bounden duty, yet she ought most surely to have taken it with a saintly smile, and quietly do the best she could toward making bad better with a cloth strainer. But you remember her besetting fault was an overflow of words, so, not content with having entered a remonstrance, she must needs enter another. Still no apology or reply, but a look of stolid indifference upon the countenance of her legal head, which presented as much expression as a pair of tongs or an ironing-table. So, detecting no sign of attention, the dame added line upon line and precept upon precept, until at last, the legal head getting exasperated out of his defensive and offensive silence—as you have seen mosquitoes drive a dog from his corner—opened his mouth, and, in a voice no smoother than oil, spoke to the effect that a milk-pail was a small matter to waste so much breath and feeling upon. The ~~ton~~ more than the words, came like a dividing-knife upon Mistress Puffer's last sentence, leaving one half forever unsaid, and the other half, which would bear dwelling upon and repetition no better than other wasp-stings, constantly ringing in her ears. She felt somewhat blameworthy and self-disgusted; for it is rare indeed that any act shows out quite without flaw to the actor, when in stern and conscientious review; but neither did she love her husband very much for half a day.

Ah! what, indeed, is a milk-pail to waste feeling upon! What, in itself considered, was the bit of fruit plucked and eaten in the Garden centuries ago? For my own part I must say I never saw any inconsistency in the quarrel of children over a grasshopper as sufficient first cause for the Shawnese and Delaware tribes meeting in deadly combat; that is, if any object is worth fighting for. It is the principle of the thing, don't you see? And, if a person is disagreeably inclined, a clover blossom or a cambric needle may serve to show up his ugliness as well as any thing.

Not being then sociably impelled by quite the usual warmth of affectionate feeling toward her husband, and conscious, also, that she had already said too much, Mistress Puffer entered hereupon a long-projected and often-attempted reform. She did not talk much for two days; and the partner of her sorrows, inferring that she was sulking—upon one of the rare occasions when he waxed confidential—told her so. This misconception did not tend to a healthy healing of the wound, and, long after it was apparently closed and forgotten, there remained yet a pain and sensitiveness where it had been.

Having shown you whence the cloud arose, and in what manner the first rain fell, you can imagine how it pattered down, drop by drop, into the pelting, comfortless shower.

"I've been thinking, perhaps, you would be full as happy by yourself: you with your things, and I with mine. I can't seem to please you nohow," said Mr. Puffer at last, in a passionless tone.

Just as though he had ever tried to please her!—as though he had ever any thought excepting to mould her, and every body else with whom he came in contact, into a fac-simile of himself, angle for angle, hump for hump, and wrinkle for wrinkle. Though, as for that, this is only what we are all continually trying to do, more or less, to our fellows; and joy to us that we do not spoil the world by succeeding!

These cold-blooded words, from which every drop of manifest feeling had been carefully wrung before leaving the heart, fell with a sickening, paralyzing weight upon Mistress Puffer's brain; but in the midst of dumb despair and self-reproachful misgivings she was almost frightened to feel a certain relief. Now they were likely to be loosened she perceived how heavy and galling they had been; those chains which are of roses and lilies while they are welcome, and of unwrought iron as soon as we weary of them.

"I think you are right. I think we shall be happier apart," replied Mrs. Puffer, after ten minutes' silence.

This was the first time in a year the husband and wife had been fully agreed, and it was the beginning of better days. Courage! The sunshine is coming; but before we see the bow of promise there must be, to bring out its vivid brightness, a cloud of exceeding blackness.

The day wore on; the husband husked corn, and the wife darned his stockings, and put new sleeves into his old shirts, because, poor man! there would be no one to do these things for him by-and-by. At evening, when the fire was crackling up the broad black chimney, and a blazing pine-knot was flooding the low wainscoted kitchen with homely cheerfulness, throwing off sparkles of light from piled-up pans upon the dresser-shelves, and making the dust-pan, hanging on its nail behind the pantry door, shine like a first-class Koh-i-noor; when the dog lay curled upon the hearth, a brindled mass of embodied comfort, Mr. Puffer sat mending a harness at one side of the pine-knot, and dog and Mrs. Puffer sat at the other knitting a new heel upon a defective sock. There was an appropriateness in the accident of sitting separated by the brindled Bose; for the dog-family had been, indeed, one of the chief promoters of domestic schism.

Mistress Puffer, as it happened, doted on cats and detested dogs, while master approved of dogs and despised cats. So it always fell out the playful, purring kittens which mistress possessed herself of, and loved with all her heart, invariably disappeared, sudden and untimely, like Bluebeard's wives; while a great, lazy glutton of a dog perpetually fattened and grew insolent without let or hindrance, being always eating, always underfoot, and always barking distractingly at passing travelers.

The group sat thus upon the evening of that fateful day, making a pleasant picture of domestic happiness; but one, alas! which was not founded upon fact.

"I've been thinking whether or no Lawyer Sabin wouldn't be as good a hand as we can get to help about dividing up the stuff," said Mr. Puffer, presently, trying to put a waxed-end through an awl hole.

"Yes, I should call him as good a choice as any. He is a man of excellent judgment and prudence, and he isn't of the telling kind, who would be likely to blab all the particulars to every body," replied Mistress Puffer.

This was the second point of agreement.

Then followed a long silence, filled only by the crackling of the fire, the heavy ticking of the gaunt eight-day clock, and the snoring of Bose. It was not until the clock had ticked half an hour from time into eternity that the Good-man spoke again.

"I calculate it will be your best way to take your part and go up to your brother's. William will be glad enough of you for a housekeeper, for he has had to get along most any way since his wife died."

"Yes, I expect I can be a help to William," replied Mrs. P., for the third time harmonizing. "But what do you lay out to do for a housekeeper?"

"Well, I am counting on making a shift somehow with mother's help," returned Mr. P., drawing up his waxed thread.

Now the mother was an infirm old body not over-neat or energetic at the best, and Mrs. P.'s heart began to swell with pity; but of course it was not for her to object or dictate, so she only knit the faster, knowing well there would be sore need.

"I want to finish out my corn to-morrow. What supposing we ride up to Sabin's the day after and settle up the matter?" suggested Mr. Puffer, when the clock struck nine.

"Two, four, six, eight, ten," responded the dame, counting her stitches. "I don't know but that time will suit me as well as any. I have been laying out to make up the quinces to-morrow, and then you need a new frock, you know; but I guess I can fetch them both to-morrow."

There was a shade of sadness in her tone, for she was morally sure Mother Puffer would let the preserves mould or ferment or come to ruin in some unhousewifely way, and she was thinking, too, of the rags to be in the blue woolen frock. But then it was not worth while to show any such feeling; so, just to testify to her light-hearted indifference, she began to sing softly to herself while she bound off the heel; meantime the husband, from his side of the dog, could but confess the sound of her voice was much more musical than his mother's asthmatic breathing.

The next morning Mr. and Mrs. Puffer were astir long before light, for they had a busy day before them. Mr. Puffer husked out his corn and ate his meals, which happened to be of his favorite kinds of food, in his usual heavy silence; and Mrs. P.—well I am afraid Mrs. P., though she bustled about with a great show of cheerful activity, mingled a few pitying tears with the beef-brine she was scalding, and even went so far as to pat Bose once or twice, and feel a thrill of affection for him in her capacious heart when he looked up with a wag of delight.

But the busy hours of the October day hastened to spend themselves, and quite too soon the old skeleton clock pounded out nine of the evening again.

"Do you lay out to be ready for to go to the Squire's to-morrow?" asked Mr. Puffer at last, finding Mrs. Puffer would not speak according to her wont and save him the trouble of opening his mouth.

"Ye-es, I suppose so," returned that lady, reluctantly; "I rather thought whether or no I shouldn't manage to spin up that little handful of rolls into stocking yarn; then the pickle-vinegar needs scalding over; and I do suppose your winter flannels ought by good rights to have an overhauling; but somehow the time has slipped away, and I haven't seemed to accomplish half I meant to. The fact is, there is always something to be done in a house, and I don't know but I am as ready as I shall be. Your mother will keep up things the best she can, I've no doubt; but the poor old woman is rather wheezy and shaky, and she can't do as she could once."

As a reply was not strictly necessary, of course Mr. Puffer made none, but there was an answering "Amen" deep down in his heart, which was the fourth time they two had found a point of agreement.

That night Mistress Puffer could not sleep for thinking how every thing about her well-ordered house would go speedily and surely to rack and ruin under the thriftlessness of madam the mother. Neither could master sleep for thinking, selfish soul! of the same. But I will do him the credit of admitting that mingled with personal bewailings was a degree of pity for the life of slavish toil which awaited his late helpmeet at her brother's house, where there was, besides, a possible chance that she might be at any time supplanted by a new sister-in-law.

So upon the next morning the husband and wife drove over to Counselor Sabin's in the high-backed green wagon with the pumpkin-and-milk horse—heartily agreeing, fifthly, in pity for each other.

"Ye-es, ye-es! As I understand it, you two wish to divide your joint possessions and go each your way, without any formal public divorcement. Wa-al, wa-al; let us see, let us see!" said Squire Sabin, referring to a paper which he had already filled with minutes. "Five cows; what will you do about them?—make beef of one and divide the meat, hey?"

"No, I would not consent to that. It is my choice; he has three cows; he will find more use for them than I shall, being that two cows make nothing of a dairy by themselves; while my share, be it less or more, will work right in with my brother's," put in the good dame.

"I sha'n't agree to any such division. If I find I need more cows I can buy them; and I am not willing she should go away empty-handed. She won't find she has got any too much to make herself comfortable with the most she can have," returned he.

Thus they now began to disagree again.

"I am willing for any thing which is fair, but I sha'n't consent to such a one-sided dividing off as he speaks of. I mean to take a reasonable view, and I want he should do the same; and he knows, if he looks at the matter candidly, that he will find more use for three cows than I shall. So there is no good in multiplying words about it, for I sha'n't come back of what I have said!" protested Mistress Puffer, resolutely.

"Hu-mph! If you can not agree to live together, you must agree to separate, you know," interposed the lawyer, who testifies that contention of mutual concession may be as difficult to settle satisfactorily as strife of mutual greed.

Silenced, but not convinced, Good-man Puffer held his peace hereupon, while he inwardly reflected that all the Good-wife said could not prevent his driving this bone of contention—the third cow—over to her brother's barn in due season. So he allowed her face to glow with satisfied triumph without any further protest.

But passing down along Squire Sabin's list, the swine proved quite as unmanageable in their turn as the kine.

"I have no notion of taking the fat hog and one of the little pigs. What can I do, I should like to know, in the first place, with such a pile of meat? And when you have fed that porker up to this time, and thought so much of him, I sha'n't hear a word to taking him, any way. Now that is so!" affirmed the Good-wife.

On the other hand, the Good-man was equally decided. "Mother couldn't try up the fat into lard and take care of the meat, if we kept it; and the pork is worth as much for her to sell as it is to me," he said.

"Ye-es! Wa-al, I would suggest that, as you two can't seem to agree even to disagree, you make a compromise. Mrs. Puffer had the matter of the cows her own way; suppose, then, Mr. Puffer suits himself in the pig question?" interposed the counselor, mending his pen for a fresh start.

"Come, now, that is no more than fair!" assented Mr. Puffer; although, of course, the arrant hypocrite was all the time conscious in his inmost heart—and outmost, too, for that matter—that he had never for a moment intended to abide by the decision of good Mrs. P. in the last dispute. Therein you see a silent partner has an advantage in an argument; for good Mrs. P. herself, having no power of knowing this mental reservation, was obliged reluctantly to concede.

Thus, inch by inch, and animal by animal, they fought their way through the live-stock; and coming after a tedious while to the personal property, found that to be even more refractory.

"He must have two bed-quilts and two pairs of sheets to my one. I sha'n't give my consent to any thing else; for his mother is getting too old and feeble for quilting, and weaving, and the like of that work," affirmed the Good-wife, with cheerful benevolence.

"Of course I sha'n't take her setting-out, and she needn't propose it!" protested Good-man.

Mrs. P. opened her mouth with a face which evidenced a burst of words as clearly as ever a black cloud betokened a burst of rain.

"You needn't say a word for nor against. I tell you I won't hear to it, even if you run out a case as long and as strong as the Moral Law!" added her lord, with unusual fervor.

"H-m-m! ye-es! Wa-al, wa-al, my advice to you two good people is, seeing you can not agree to separate, to get into your wagon and ride home together," said wise Counselor Sabin, at last, cleaning his pen upon his hair and twisting the paper of minutes into a cigar-lighter.

The good people were finally persuaded to follow this advice, which proved the soundest he ever gave; and paying the price of the fattened swine for it they clambered into the high-backed wagon and rode off, with a joint feeling of conscious relief, yet too shame-faced to speak during the whole distance home.

When they arrived there Bose came running to the end of the lane which led to the house to give them a gruff bark of welcome, and Mrs. P.'s heart warmed with pleasure. She even stopped to pat him and call him a nice fellow upon her way into the porch in full view of Mr. Puffer, who felt grateful to the very tips of his callous fingers for this unwonted token of friendliness, while Bose jumped and frisked awkwardly around, whining with delight. Then she disappeared through the doorway into the kitchen; and when she saw the homely room and its furniture looking so familiar and kindly, as they, in their way, gave a mute welcome home again to their mistress, she sat down in her old splint rocking-chair and had a hearty cry. Then she brushed away her tears, which were by no means bitter ones, and raked open the very coals upon the stone hearth which she had covered so carefully before leaving the room forever, as she believed, hung the tea-kettle upon the crane, and drew out the table for supper.

So when the husband came in from unharnessing the horse and feeding the cows and pigs, instead of the dreary stillness he had been bargaining for he found the room alive with warmth and cheeriness. The fragrance of new-made tea mingled with that of stewed peaches and broiling beef, which sputtered a pleasant sort of accompaniment to the humming tea-kettle; while the Good-wife, with a satisfied face, was putting a plate of smoking-hot flap-jacks, buttered, and sugared, and quartered, upon the table, and singing as blithe and light of heart as a May bird. To tell the truth, the weak-minded woman had been actually kissing, with tears in her eyes, the clumsy old rolling-pin, which, from its rough finish, had been to her like a thistle in the shoe for years.

"Well, wife, this seems like getting home again after a long journey," said Mr. Puffer, warming his hands and his heart also at the blaze, and looking about with a smile upon his face which quite transfigured it.

And so it was. Madam the mother came indeed with her asthma and her palsy, but it was only to sit in the easiest chair in the warmest corner. A hungry gray cat appeared also very mysteriously, which Mrs. Puffer tried at first to drive away, but which Mr. Puffer treated like Vice, which, seen too oft, is first endured, then pitied, then embraced.

So having found betimes, as many a married pair has found too late, alas! that however difficult union may be, disunion is still more difficult and hazardous, they have jogged up and down so comfortably together that, to see them now, one would never suspect, as I said at first, they had ever been of diverse minds upon any subject.

A VISIT TO THE ENGLISH COURTS OF JUSTICE.

ONE never tires of wandering through Westminster Abbey. Though you go among the sombre and stately chapels ever so often, each last visit discovers something which you have not remarked before. There is food for contemplation on every hand. Each stone and aisle speaks to us as from out of the past. An American there stands among those who were kings over his ancestors—among the poets and statesmen who immortalized the common language—among the generals who fought for the perpetuity of the Anglo-Saxon, the common fountain of our descent. An American lawyer is especially attracted by the community of possession between the two countries in the fame and works of the great who slumber there. For all about him lie the remains of those master-spirits who laid the foundation and added the elaborate fabric of that Common Law to which American as well as English jurisprudence yields homage and precedence. There stands the noble statue of Mansfield, sitting in judicial robes, and seeming from mute marble to dispense living law. There repose Somers and Hardwicke and Eldon and Romilly, the chieftains of the old forum, whose words are the daily law in every court through both countries. I found myself one day meditating by the side of these venerable graves, when the thought struck me that a visit to the scenes of these great men's labors, and a comparison between them and those who in the present fill their places, would be full of interest.

I directed my steps to the New Palace Yard, opposite the Abbey, and thence was directed through the confusion and hurrying to and fro, which betokened the presence of Parliament, to the halls of the Courts of Justice. My attention was called to a lofty portal in one corner of the Square, where there was a perpetual ingress and egress of people, and there I entered among the rest. I was standing in a vast hall, which seemed to be a sort of vestibule, leading to the chambers of the courts and to the two Houses of Parliament. A ponderous oaken roof, elaborately carved in ancient style, first attracted my notice. All around the comparatively bare wall I observed the figure of the white hart, which told me that it was built in the time of the Plantagenets. A glance at the upper or south end of the hall revealed a window glorious for its bright illumination, its richness and variety of tint, and the harmony and beauty of its effect. There were emblazoned the heraldic bearings of all the kings, with their lions rampant, their presumptuous fleurs-de-lis, their heroic symbols of the Garter, and their jeweled coronets with varicolored plumes. A broad marble staircase mounted beneath the window to a platform, whence two smaller ones, this to the right, that to the left, led the way to the Peers and Commons and the royal apartments.

Notwithstanding the dignity of the general effect, I supposed this hall to be merely the vestibule which introduced me to the chambers of the palace. I was startled when I heard a guide glibly relating to a pair of wide-eyed and open-mouthed strangers what great events had taken place on this spot. I was in famous Westminster Hall. Here, then, that wise and warlike monarch, Edward the First, had feasted and caroused with his hardy old barons at the time of his coronation—a merry example readily followed by each of his successors. Here quaint Archbishop Chicheley, astounding his hearers by the novel text, “Vox populi, vox Dei,” had declared the expulsion of the weak and persecuted Edward the Second from the throne. Here the third Edward, exultant in the conquest of two kingdoms, had entertained in princely profusion his kingly prisoners, David of Scotland and John of France. Here Richard the Second celebrated his accession, and heard the sentence of his downfall. Here Charles the First had heard his accusation and received his sentence. Here Cromwell, sitting on a high throne of state, his frame enveloped in a splendid robe of purple velvet, and holding in either hand a sceptre of gold and a Bible, was hailed Lord Protector; and here, too, within three years after, his ghastly head was lifted on a pole and placed in a conspicuous niche, amidst the execrations of the multitude.

But courts of justice having no sympathy with the sentiment of strangers, obviously would conclude their sitting if I did not pursue my immediate object of visiting them; so I proceeded up the hall with accelerated step. My attention was drawn to a large placard, posted obtrusively on the wall, and on reading it I found it to be of direct service to me. These were its contents: “House of Lords. The House will sit to consider the appeal in the case of Waters vs. M’Kenrick this afternoon at two o’clock.” It is known that the House of Lords sits in cases of final appeal from the courts of common law; but it is not to be imagined that the judicial House is in reality identical with the political House. Only those peers attend in a judicial capacity who have either been judges or chancellors, or who have been distinguished for being learned and interested in legal subjects.

I formed a hasty plan of first visiting the highest court, and thence descending in the scale of dignity, as I might not have opportunity to visit all. As I entered the corridor which leads to the new chamber of the Peers I was forcibly struck by the contrast which it afforded to the ancient hall I had just left. Every thing was new, fresh, and brilliant. On either side were stately statues of the greatest English celebrities, and it was interesting to gaze upon the athletic form and open countenance of Fox, the majestic attitude of Chatham, the proud and disdainful air of Pitt, the ardent eagerness of Grattan, and the judicial gravity of Mansfield. The inner corridor revealed lively frescoes of historical events, among which I was especially struck with King Charles’s funeral, the embarkation of a Puritan family, and the parting of Lord and Lady Russell before his execution.

Out of this opened an octagon ante-chamber of elaborate finish, whence one immediately entered the House of Peers near the throne. Certainly nothing in London strikes one as so highly illustrative of the material glory of English royalty as does this noble chamber, dazzling the eye with its almost excessive blaze of gilding and splendid drapery; leading the imagination to the days of chivalry and kingly pomp with its emblazonry of symbols and heraldic illustrations, with its portraits of sovereigns upon the tinted windows, its mosaics of Italian handicraft, its lofty canopy of state, beneath which stands the throne, so glittering as to be painful to behold; recalling the renowned scenes of English history and tradition by frescoes many in number and vivid in execution; and lifting the mind to the higher regions of allegory by representations of the guardians of the national safety and honor—Religion, Law, and Mercy.

On a square red cushion, which is far-famed by the name of “the woolsack,” but which is in fact a very ordinary-looking article of furniture, sat the august personage who ranks in dignity third after the royal family, who has the somewhat impossible office of keeping the King’s conscience, and who is supposed to be the guardian of helplessness and the protector of innocence throughout the realm. The Chancellor usually sits with his back to the throne, and facing the Peers and the desk; but on this occasion he sat looking toward the throne. A small box, like one of our witness-boxes, was temporarily placed between him and the canopy, and there a flourishing young British barrister, with national whiskers of light red, and the British fault of perpetual stammering, was holding forth on the merits of the case at issue.

The Lord Chancellor struck me as an excellent specimen of the genus John Bull. He was habited in a long, elaborate wig of horse hair, which reached far down over his shoulders, and completely enveloped his head and neck. A large gown, worked profusely with gold lace, covered his body. Beside him, on the wooll-sack, lay the crimson silk bag, richly worked in silk and gold, wherein is kept the Great Seal of England. Out of the enormous wig peeped a great, round, rubicund countenance, full-moon shaped—the very semblance of a sherry-drinking, beef-eating, irascible Englishman. A large, calm, keen blue eye indicated a mind toned to searching judgment and deliberation of thought. A complacent and attentive dignity was in his countenance and posture. The nose was prominent, and the lips close set; and the rotundity of the face was completed by a large double chin. I was amused to hear issue from this bulky form and majestic countenance a high, soft, old-womanish voice, which seemed to fawn upon the ear, and lisped, in insignificant tones, the wisdom of a life of toil. Lord Westbury has long had the reputation of being the best Chancery lawyer at the English bar, and as Sir Richard Bethell he was noted not only for his legal attainments, but also as a successful debater in Parliament. He has always been a thorough Whig, and has been the favorite advocate of several of the great families who are attached to Whig interests. He is not only conspicuous for the extensive and varied learning which he evinces, and which has been obtained by faithful study, but also for the aptness and accuracy with which he brings that learning to bear upon the particular cases which arise before him. As the presiding officer of the House of Lords Lord Westbury is not very popular, for he is quite often overbearing, and takes it into his head to lecture their lordships occasionally, in a manner such as irritates them not a little. He takes rank above every subject of the Crown except the Archbishop of Canterbury; and thus, though only a baron, he outranks dukes, marquises, and earls. He very often takes part in the debates of the House, and is especially active when some statute modification is to be made. As a speaker he is elegant, terse, dealing but little in the graces of speech, but seeking the gist of the subject without diversion. His position socially is very high, and he is universally respected. He may be favorably compared with his immediate predecessors on the wooll-sack, and is regarded as a better judge of Chancery than Campbell, Cranworth, Cottenham, or Brougham were, and as little inferior to Eldon. His personal appearance is certainly much more commanding than that of any of the ex-Chancellors whom I have had opportunity of seeing, and he looks with equal fitness a great officer of state and a model English judge. He is not descended from noble blood, but, like most of the great English lawyers, derives his descent from that best element of English society—the upper middle-class. He is about sixty-four, and evidently in the prime and full strength of intellectual power, and is said to maintain with unflagging assiduity the habit of patient labor which was formed in his youth, and which has built up in his mind a rare knowledge of equity law. When sitting in Chancery, at Lincoln's Inn, he wears a wig similar to those worn by the Queen's Bench, and seems much less formal and ceremonious than when presiding over the House of Peers.

Although the High Court of Appeals theoretically consists of all the House of Lords, there were only four peers present. These were sitting around without the least formality, on the bright red cushions, on either side of the House. The proceedings of the Court were less ceremonious than is customary in tribunals of that nature. The counsel was frequently interrupted by questions and suggestions from the Chancellor, or one of the law lords; and often a little discussion between two of the judges would give the barrister opportunity to rest his voice and freshen his memory. It was hard for an American, accustomed to see a full bench sitting on Appeal cases, and much formality observed in the intercourse between the bench and the bar, to comprehend that in this quiet, colloquial scene the highest legal interests of British subjects were being determined. It looked more like a cozy little meeting of a legislative committee hearing an argument on an election case. And indeed the House of Lords, sitting in its political capacity, disappoints one's expectation of seeing, in an assembly of great aristocrats, an imposing and venerable body. For, on entering the narrow gallery reserved for strangers, you see usually only about thirty out of the four hundred and fifty peers; and most of the talking is done in a monotonous conversational tone across the table by the leader of the Government and the leader of Opposition. It is only when a topic of striking interest arises, such as the Polish or Danish war, that any thing like spirited speaking occurs. Lord Derby asks Lord Russell a question as though he had met him in the street and was saying good-morning, and the reply about keeps pace with the inquiry. Meanwhile my Lord Chancellor is chatting with the Bishop of Oxford, spectators are pointing out the celebrities, and commoners are hobnobbing with lordly cronies behind the railing of the throne.

By far the most striking person in the Court of Appeals was the venerable Brougham, whose long life of activity and brilliant effort has made his name a household word through all the nations. He is still a most constant and assiduous attendant both upon the legislative and the judicial proceeding of the House of Lords; and when I saw him, the most noticeable lord there, I was reminded of that caricature in Punch, which represents the House sitting on Appeals, my Lord Brougham in checked pantaloons and high stock, the sole representative of the nobility, and a barrister standing over him with arms swinging and hair disheveled, the noble judge the while listening with intense dignity and importance. There, indeed, were the checked breeches and the high black stock: the nose reared as high as when he thundered against George the Fourth at the trial of Caroline: the small gray eye glittering as brightly and fiercely as when he used to throw a lightning glance along the benches of the Tories, and with withering words dare Peel and Canning to forensic combat: the voice as shrill and clear as when, fifty years ago, he poured out his youthful wrath upon the intolerance of the State Church: the enunciation rapid, nervous, yet distinct, without the tremor of age or its want of memory: the delivery demonstrative, energetic, prompt: the hair white and thick, straight up from the forehead, and carelessly brushed: the body erect and entirely steady: the whole manner that of one yet capable of powerful effort, indifference to fatigue, and obstinate endurance in contest. Lord Brougham does not look like a lovable man; he looks crabbed, impatient, with a don't-speak-to-me air about him. What feelings one has toward him are prompted by a contemplation of his great vigor, his industry, his long life of well-sustained conflict, his great variety of ability—for he has been great no less as a classical scholar, a philosopher, and an essayist, than as a Parliamentary orator and lawyer—and the wonderful vivacity with which now, in his extreme old age, he continues to put himself to the work he has learned to love. There are no indications of dotage either in his movements or speeches, and yet he is close upon ninety.

A few days before seeing him in the judicial capacity I heard him make a very telling speech in the House of Lords on the Polish question, then much agitated in England. His defense of the insurgents, and his appeals to the House in their behalf, gave indications of his ancient fire and power, and had the old effect upon the minds of his auditors. While he was in the midst of his best point his false teeth fell from his mouth and dropped on the floor. As he stooped to pick them up he trod upon them, so that when he sought to restore them to his mouth they would not fit. He attempted to go on with his speech, but the poor old hero could but mumble on indistinctly, and was soon obliged to sit down, while on every hand the faces of his peers were sadly sympathetic—so melancholy and startling, was this first demonstration of infirmity in the glorious old war-horse. He yielded to the patent misfortune with all the cheerful grace imaginable, and expressed in his face, "You see that even the great Brougham must yield to Time the conqueror." In the Court of Appeals he listened critically to the argument, and occasionally interrupted the counsel with a curt, sharp question, which set him to stammering and blushing more than ever. His mind seemed centred on the case at issue, and he was evidently unwilling to let any sophistry or misquotation pass without reprimand and correction to the unfortunate barrister.

The other Lords present were the ex-High

Chancellors Cranworth and Chelmsford, and Lord Kingsdown, formerly Chancellor of the palatine Duchy of Lancaster. Lord Cranworth was a short, round-shouldered, busy-looking man, with a prompt and business-like manner, and an intelligent but by no means intellectual countenance. What he had to say during the progress of the case was said politely and with deference to contrary opinion, yet earnestly and plainly. No one would ever take him for more than a practical and good-natured gentleman; and indeed his career on the woolsack was rather marked by the care and labor evinced than for originality or diversity of legal talent. Lord Chelmsford, on the contrary, long the legal champion of the Tory party as Sir Frederick Thesiger, was evidently a man of unusual ability, rapid and clear in his course of thought, seeking without irrelevancy the gist of the subject in hand, and arriving apparently without labor at a conclusion well sustained by the logical process by which he reached it. He was quite tall and not ungraceful, with a very small but well-proportioned head, a pleasing and spirited countenance, and jet-black eyes and hair—looking much younger than he really is. His voice was melodious and conciliating, and in every word and movement he displayed the thoroughly high-toned gentleman, and yet the complete aristocrat. He paid more close attention to the proceedings than the other judges, interrupted the counsel oftener, and was more exact and critical as to every point broached. Nothing could be more in contrast than Lord Chelmsford's suavity and respectful attention, and the curt and abrupt manner of Lord Brougham. Lord Kingsdown was of least consideration, evidently, of those who were sitting on the Appeal, having but little experience in the judicial capacity, and more of an amateur than a practical lawyer. A short, thick-set man, with red face, bright blue eyes, and white bushy hair, a good-natured expression, and sensible in what he had to say; he was another type of a thorough English gentleman.

The spectators consisted of but few persons, who apparently had rather wandered in accidentally than attended for the purpose of hearing the cause, and occupied a niche near the throne behind the barrister who addressed the court. No seats being provided they were huddled together in a position of little comfort, and ill adapted to see what was proceeding. Near the Chancellor, on the woolsack, was a great square bag, elaborately worked with the royal arms in gold and vari-colored silk, and with long tassels pendent, which contained that mighty instrument of executive power, the Great Seal. This is kept constantly near the Chancellor wherever he goes, and is even placed on the bed where he sleeps; for its use on a document, even if affixed fraudulently, is valid, and hence the greatest caution is necessary to prevent its being stolen. When the gruff old Lord Thurlow was Chancellor it was stolen from his bedchamber, and created a great alarm throughout the kingdom; and it was not till it was recovered, and the keeper had it safely again in his possession, that his equanimity was restored. After interesting myself in the personal appearance and manners of the distinguished judges, and observing with much amusement the various tribulations of the evidently new-fledged barrister, the monotony and dullness of the scene drew me away to the more enlivening spectacle of the lower tribunals.

Returning once more to Westminster Hall, I saw over a narrow door near the entrance "Court of Queen's Bench." A long, narrow vestibule preceded the chamber itself, where vendors of modest edibles were stationed, and barristers in imposing habit were regaling themselves after their labors with a simple luncheon. A medley of people was hurrying to and fro: clients waiting impatiently, and seizing their counsel frantically as they emerged; attorneys with long parchments beating a little idea of their cases into stubborn, wig-crested heads; and little groups of noisy barristers elated over a professional joke. A few idlers like myself were gazing with open mouths at the great luminaries who passed in and out. Two long red curtains, pulled aside, admitted one into the immediate presence of the court.

The chamber was smaller than the court-rooms in America, and the windows, being high and narrow, admitted but a partial light, so that a befitting sombreness dignified the room. Nearest the door were raised benches, which descended as they receded, and were level with the floor below the judges' desks. Several of these were devoted to spectators: in front of the spectators were the barristers; and those occupying the lower benches were the sergeants-at-law. Between the sergeants and the clerk's desk (which was just beneath the judges) seats were provided for the attorneys. A broad canopy protruded over the judges' heads, and beneath it, against the wall, were emblazoned in elaborate oaken carving the royal arms of Great Britain; the lion and the unicorn appearing more pugnacious than ever in this exaggerated form.

A long desk extended in front of the judges, and they occupied separate chairs behind. The costume worn by the barristers is, as has often been remarked, quite striking, and even imposing, to a stranger. The highest rank, called Queen's Counsel, are robed in long silk gowns, the lower ranks having to content themselves with stuff gowns. Their wigs are of elaborate make, gray or white, with regular rows of twisted curls at the back terminating in two gracefully-looped queues. The Sergeants-at-Law, next in rank to the Queen's Counsel, have on the crown of their wigs the coif—a small black patch of silk—which is also worn by the judges. These sit on the front bench of the barristers, and are honored by the flattery of being addressed as "brothers" by the court, while the ordinary barrister hears the homely "Mister" applied to his name. The judges wear square wigs, a purple cape to their gowns, and a clerical cravat, snowy and starched. There were some twenty or thirty barristers present—specimens in every stage of legal vicissitude, from eager-looking young fellows, who cast many an envious glance at their prosperous elders, to the self-satisfied and well-fed Queen's Counsel, who, as he began his argument, was easy as to its result. Men who had worked their way amidst a sea of trouble to the attainment of a gown; noblemen's younger sons, who had seen only the prandian side of an Inn of Court; geniuses, who, like Erskine, had had fifty briefs the day after their first; and stupidities, at whose success every body was astonished, grouped side by side, and in daily rivalry to reach higher in forensic consequence. Some loitered over the morning Times; some took careful notes of the case on trial; some discussed politics or legal questions; some gossiped over the last ball or the last scandal from court; some were tugging away at their luckily-got briefs; some were restless as their cases came further up on the docket. A thoroughly English scene—just such a one, barring the wigs and gowns, as you would meet with at an English inn, an English club-room, in an English car, on an English beach, at an English dinner-party.

Four of the five judges were present. The Chief-Justice, Sir Alexander Cockburn, Kt., sat in the second seat from the right, having on his right Justice Wightman, whose death has recently left a vacancy for that ablest of living common law advocates, Sergeant Shee. One is apt to picture the Chief-Justice of the Queen's Bench of England to his fancy as a large, red, fierce, obstinate-looking John Bull, full of importance and impatience and awful dignity. You could not go wider from the reality of the present occupant of that high station. A little, weazen face tops a diminutive and agile body; the countenance rather betokens a lawyer accustomed to sharp practice than a profound legal erudition, and there is but little dignity in the general manner. Yet the John Bullishness of his lordship sticks out the minute he speaks; for he is smilingly ironical, and pleasantly bitter, and never says more damaging things than when his pinched face beams with benignant complacency. He rides over the hesitation and terror of the younger lawyers as gracefully and easily as he worries with coolly put questions the older stagers. He never becomes crabbed or scolding, is always cool and measured in every word and motion, hardly ever attempts to clear a dilemma, but seems rather to delight in piling obstructions in the way of the poor advocate who is growing hotter and redder each minute over some knotty question. He is quick to detect a flaw, and prompt and merciless in exposing it. Apparently perfectly heartless, he clings to the strict and dry process of the law, and neither permits irrelevancy nor harangues intended to arouse sentiment at the expense of judgment. He reminded me much in his personal appearance of Governor Letcher, of Virginia, who, when in the national House of Representatives, was conspicuous for the frequency and pertinacity with which he put in his "I object." Cockburn has the same sharp nose and chin, the same hard, blue eye, the same complexion of a red impartially enveloping every part of the face, the same retreating forehead, the same thin and tightly pressed lips. He is the youngest of the judges, about fifty, which is older than he appears. His career as a judge has been an entirely successful one, and his promotion has been rapid. He succeeded Lord Campbell as Chief-Justice, when that great man was designated as the Lord High Chancellor, on Lord Palmerston's accession to power in 1859.

It has been usual for over a century to elevate the newly-appointed Chief-Justice to the peerage at the same time he ascends the bench; but Sir A. Cockburn is an exception to the rule. He continues in the rank of Knight, while his predecessors have long been peers of the realm. A number of reasons are given why he should not likewise be thus honored; that which seems generally favored is, that his private morals are of so doubtful a nature that the Queen is unwilling to create him Baron. George III., pious as he was, did not object to the notorious licentiousness of Lords Thurlow and Kenyon; and it may savor a little of inconsistency that her Majesty should appoint Sir A. Cockburn Chief-Justice at all, if he were so obnoxious—especially as an unprincipled Chief-Justice is capable of doing more serious injury to the public weal than an unprincipled lord. It would seem that since he is Chief-Justice, it would be only yielding him his proper dignity and influence to place him among the hereditary legislators of the kingdom. His knowledge of the law and its application was evidently profound and ready; and yet he seemed to excel rather in the practical technicalities. The Chief-Justice is a Whig in politics, does not move much in society, and is understood to be rather jovial in his tastes and associations. On the whole, I could not help ranking him below his predecessors in general; it seemed to me that the mantle of Hale, and Mansfield, and Kenyon, and Ellenborough, and Denman had fallen on shoulders not quite worthy to sustain it. Indeed the succession on the King's Bench has been remarkable for the splendor of the abilities which have almost invariably ornamented it; and the reputation of the greatest Chief-Justices vies with, if it does not surpass that of the greatest Chancellors; though the latter dignity is much the most coveted by the leaders of the profession. Still I would not convey the idea that Chief-Justice Cockburn is an incompetent judge; for he has performed the duties of the office to the general satisfaction, and with no little credit to himself. But he does not evidently possess that conspicuous superiority of legal calibre by which most of his predecessors have gained a lasting name among the archives of the common law of England. In point of private character his reputation is by no means so spotless as that of the later legal celebrities, Campbell, Denman, Bexley, Ellenborough; and, on the other hand, forms a favorable contrast to those of the last century, Kenyon, Thurlow, Cowper, even the great Hardwicke and the greater Somers—the tales of whose dissoluteness are rendered permanently accessible to posterity by their production in Lord Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors. The venerable Campbell was evidently far from being a Puritan.

The most prepossessing person on the Queen's Bench is Mr. Justice Blackburn. The writer observed him when he first entered the room, and, upon inquiring of a barrister, was told his name, and that he was much the most popular of the judges. Apparently not over forty-five (although, the wigs having a tendency to conceal the age, it is a mere guess), a Scotchman by birth, and having a calm and kindly expression, he was listened to with much more attention than was paid to either of his colleagues. His face is rather long, widening toward the forehead; he has dark, thoughtful eyes, overhung with thick brows; and a fine, broad, protuberant forehead, indicating his intellectual stamina. There is a simple and natural dignity about him which, combined with blandness, is very attractive. In every word and tone he exhibits the true feeling of a gentleman, while he never forgets that he is a judge. He appeared to me to have an evident desire of arriving at the justice of a case with the least discomfiture to the counsel on either side. A courtesy thoroughly refined, and yet not so systematic as to be mere ceremony, never left him while I saw him on the bench. While Chief-Justice Cockburn was impatient and sharp in his intercourse with the barristers, and thus frequently roused them to rebellion, Blackburn, by a few earnest and reasonable words, would soothe the feelings of all who were irritated. Essentially aristocratic in his bearing, almost proud, he was yet at once the best-bred and best-natured of the court. From the little opportunity I had to judge, he seemed to be the most thorough and ready jurist, and my impression was confirmed by the testimony of several barristers with whom I conversed. He spoke slowly and distinctly, without the hesitation incident to nearly all British public men, expounding in simple language the question at issue, and carrying every one with him by the clear light in which he made it appear. His voice was full, round, and sonorous, perhaps a little pompous, and strongly tinged with that inflection which one hears among the higher class of Scotch gentlemen. He is one of the select few Scotchmen who have been honored with the English ermine, and does not detract from the sterling ability with which Mansfield, Loughborough, Erskine, Brougham, and Campbell have exhibited the capacity of the clear northern brain. Like Cockburn, he is descended from the educated middle class, and is as well a correct scholar as an admirable judge. Perhaps it is not necessary to the proper fulfillment of the judicial function that there should be graciousness of manner, and a well-bred tone; but certainly these qualities add a grace to the bench which makes the path of the lawyer as well as that of the judge more pleasant. Justice Blackburn never forgets that he is a gentleman, and that he is dealing with gentlemen; and that is certainly rare among English judges, if not among all judges. Never giving way to the petty annoyances which are constantly arising, yet never descending to seek popularity; steady in his attention to argument; explaining each point with terseness and model clearness; ready to be corrected in a wrong impression; doing justice to the claims of either side—he has won the respect and attachment of the whole bar.

It so happened that a trial of unusual and general interest was progressing. One of the British generals of brigade in the Crimean War had published an account of his experiences during that memorable struggle. He had been so situated as to observe that famous onset which is known every where by Tennyson's poem of "The Charge of the Light Brigade." In the course of his narrative, therefore, he devoted a large space to a description of so romantic an incident. Probably the General was not without those petty jealousies which are so common between rival military men; for he took this occasion to impugn the bravery of the Earl of Cardigan, the commander of the Light Brigade. He asserted that the gallant peer, after leading his men to the onset, was, when they got before the guns, nowhere to be seen; that he was afterward seen galloping off and leaving them to their fate; in fact, that while he has all along been reaping the glory of having made the boldest dash of the campaign, he really showed the white feather, and was no more nor less than an arrant coward. These charges the General endeavored to substantiate by the testimony of other officers present.

Now if there is any Englishman in whom the sentiment of chivalric pride remains, it is this haughty Earl of Cardigan. He is almost Quixotic in his attachment to the ancient principle of martial honor. It is the one tender spot where you can wound him most acutely. When, therefore, the great halo of his life was dimmed by a libel, when one sought to "filch his good name" when his good name had been made illustrious, he was sensible enough to bring the libeler before the highest tribunal of justice. The trial was of great interest, involving the particular evidence of the valorous incident, in which, on one hand, the defendant essayed to prove the truth of his charges, and the indignant Earl produced counter accounts. My Lord was in court in a suit of elegant black, relieved by a faultless white cravat, and fitting his person with exquisite perfection. He was tall and very stately, with white hair and a chivalrous mustache, which could only have received its graceful curve at the hand of a barber. He was the perfect picture of a military aristocrat: he did honor to his noble descent from Robert the Bruce and the old house of Brudenell. By his side sat Sergeant Shee his counsel, and the leading advocate at the bar, who has since taken the seat on the Queen's Bench, made vacant by the death of Justice Wightman. He is the first Irishman who has been made a Judge in England. The result of the trial was the triumphant vindication of Lord Cardigan's courage, and the presumptuous General was found guilty of libel, and fined accordingly. This trial naturally excited much comment from the London press, and the result was generally regarded as doing justice to veracious history. After that Lord Cardigan could appear in his opera-box with undiminished hauteur, and was lionized over again for the gallant exploits that had been called in question, while the General sunk into popular contempt.

When the excitement attendant on this case subsided by its conclusion the court resumed its usual monotony. On the whole, the Queen's Bench rather disappoints one who has been accustomed to associate the idea of its appearance with its importance. The same may be said of Parliament and other public bodies of England. It is rather its associations which makes the court an object of interest.

A NEW ANECDOTE OF WASHINGTON.

IT is well known that Colonel Seth Warner, of Revolutionary memory, who, with his noted regiment of Green Mountain Boys, as rear-guard of St. Clair's retreating army, after the evacuation of Ticonderoga, beat back a whole brigade of the hotly-pursuing British in the battle of Hubbardton, and thus saved, probably, that luckless general's entire forces, hurrying on just in front, from rout or capture—who came down like a thunder-bolt on the flushed foe in mid-battle at Bennington, and secured the victory for the wavering and half-beaten Stark, and who finally was every where known as one of the best-looking, most heroic, and accomplished military officers of the Continental army—that Colonel Warner was an especial favorite of General Washington.

This preliminary, however, is here introduced less on account of any particular pertinency most of it may have to the subject than for the purposes of explanation, and securing a readier appreciation and credence of the interesting personal anecdote which is about to be related, and which, it is confidently believed, has never before appeared in print.

One son of Colonel Warner still survives, or was surviving a few years ago, an unpretending resident of Lower Canada, from which—though then seventy-five years old, but very active, and in full possession of all his strong native faculties—he came to the capital of Vermont with the object of petitioning the Legislature for compensation for some lands formerly granted to the heirs of Colonel Warner, but unwittingly trenched upon by subsequent grants; and it was there and then that the writer of this reminiscence was introduced to him, and held several very interesting conversations.

In one of these conversations, while speaking of the private affairs of his father, Colonel Warner, he frankly said that the Colonel was very thoughtless about pecuniary matters; that he not only expended in the cause of the country, or aiding the needy families of his soldiers, all his available property, but contracted many debts, which finally compelled him a short time before his death to place a mortgage on his homestead, amounting at last to over nine hundred dollars, and causing the family a great deal of depression and uneasiness. But of this depressing load they were at length suddenly relieved in the occurrence of a most unexpected incident, and one which formed, as well it might, quite an era in their family history. But we will let Mr. Warner, whose Christian name, we believe, was that of his father, Seth, relate the memorable incident in question in his own language; which, by the aid of the minutes before us, we know we can repeat substantially, and we think very near literally, as he made use of it.

"It was," he said, "in the month of September, 1789, the fall that General Washington made his tour through the Eastern States. We had kept ourselves tolerably well posted about the progress of this tour, and heard that he was to be in New Haven or Hartford, Connecticut, somewhere near the time at which the event I am going to relate to you took place. But as either of those places was quite a number of miles from Woodbury, where we lived, we had no more idea of seeing him than the man in the moon. My elder brother, Israel Putnam Warner, then a man grown, and myself, a lad of twelve or thirteen, were both living with our mother at that time. And at the particular time of the day I refer to, Israel was in the yard grooming father's old war-horse, which he had been compelled to go with father through all his campaigns to take charge of; for the fiery and proud old fellow would never let any body but his master, the Colonel, and his son Israel, mount or come near him, though he had now got so much tamed down by old age that he would behave quite decently with me or any body. I was in the house with mother, who happened to be unusually downcast that day, and was brooding over our family embarrassments, and had just been saying:

"No, no, Seth, I can never pay, nor, with our means, hardly begin to pay this dreadful mortgage. And as I hear it is about to be foreclosed, we must now soon be driven from our pleasant home, where we have lived so long, and, until your father's death, so happily. My husband, the Colonel, fought as well as the bravest of them, and did all he could, and more than his part, for the good cause, they all are willing to allow; and I know very well that he wore himself out in the service, and was thus brought to a premature grave. And yet here is his family almost on the verge of beggary."

"Tears here started in mother's eyes, which so touched me that I rose and went and looked out of the window; when, to my surprise, I saw entering the yard two well-mounted stranger gentlemen, whom, from something about their general appearance, I took to be old military officers of pretty high rank—or at least, one of them, who was large and had a very commanding look. Having significantly beckoned mother to my side, she eagerly gazed out at the newcomers a moment in silence, when she suddenly gave a start, and, with an excited air, exclaimed,

"Seth! just take notice of that noble-looking one! Why, he looks ever so much like the picture I once saw of— But no; that surely can't be!"

"Well, at any rate, mother, he must be a man of some consequence; for, see! brother Israel, who acts as if he knew him, is swinging his hat from his head clear away at arm's-length, and bowing lower than he would to a king! Israel is quite too stiff-necked to do that for any common man. But they are beginning to talk. I will just open the door here a little mite, and perhaps we can hear what they are saying."

"I did so, and the first words I distinguished were those of the personage who had so attracted our attention, and who, addressing my brother, and pointing to the horse, by the side of which he was standing, asked,

"Is not that the horse Colonel Warner used to ride in the war?"

"It is, your Excellency," replied Israel, again bowing low and very respectfully.

"Ah yes, I thought so," resumed the former, turning to his companion, or attache, and pointing to the old war-steed with that interest with which he was known ever to regard fine horses. "I thought it could be no other. Just glance at his leading points—shapely head, arched neck, deep chest, haunches, and limbs. I have seen Colonel Warner riding him on parade, when I noted him as a rare animal, and thought that the horse and rider, taken together—for Warner was a model of a figure, and several inches taller than I am—made a military appearance second to none in the Continental army. But my business is with your mother, my young friend, and I will now, if you will take charge of my horse a few minutes, go in at once to see her."

"Hearing this announcement mother and I hastily retreated to our former seats, and, with the curiosity and excitement which what we had witnessed naturally raised in us, silently awaited the entry of the expected visitor. We had been thus seated but two or three minutes before he came in, and, bowing graciously to my mother, said:

"I take this to be Mistress Warner, the widow of my much esteemed friend, the late Colonel Warner, of the Continental army?"

"It is, Sir," she replied, tremulously.

"Will you permit me to introduce myself to you, madam?" he resumed, with that winning sort of dignity I had noticed in him from the first; "I am General Washington. And after

I arrived in this section of the country, a few days ago, I made—and I hope you will pardon me the liberty I took with your private affairs—I made some inquiries about you and the situation of your family; when learning, to my deep regret, that your late husband, in consequence of his long-continued absence from his home and business, while in the service of his country, and his subsequent shattered health, resulting from the hardships of war, left you laboring under pecuniary embarrassments, I was prompted to come and see you.'

"'I had little dreamed of such an honor and such a kindness, General,' she responded, nearly overpowered by her emotions and the imposing presence of her august visitor.

"'There is a mortgage,' he rejoined, without responding in any way to her last remarks, 'a rather heavy mortgage on your homestead.'

"'I am sorry,' she replied, sadly, 'very sorry to be compelled to say there is, General—a much heavier one than I can ever pay.'

"'So I had ascertained,' he proceeded; 'and I have also, before coming here, been at the pains of ascertaining the exact amount now due, and required to cancel this, to you, doubtless, ruinous incumbrance, and I propose now to leave with you the sum of money you will need for effecting that desirable object.'

"'Does the money come from Government, Sir?' she asked, doubtfully, and with a look that seemed to say, 'If it does, then all right.'

"Washington looked at her, and hesitated a little at first, but soon, while taking up the valise he had brought in with him, slowly responded:

"'In one sense it does, I may say, madam, if you have delicacies on the subject. I am in receipt of a liberal yearly salary from Government, from which it is discretionary with me to impart aid sometimes to deserving objects; and I certainly know of none so than one which will relieve the family of so meritorious an officer as your late self-sacrificing husband.'

"Without waiting for any rejoinder to these remarks he opened his valise, and took from it a bag of silver money, and deliberately proceeded to draw out and count from it, till he had reached the sum of nine hundred and some odd dollars, which afterward proved to be precisely the sum demanded, in principal, interest, and fees, for the discharge of the mortgage on our place. He then, after returning the money to the bag and setting it aside for the purpose he had designated, and taking the hand of my mother, who seemed inclined to remonstrate, but could not force the words for it from her quivering lips, tenderly but with an air that seemed to forbid any attempt at refusal, said to her:

"'Accept it, don't hesitate to accept it—take it and get the mortgage discharged at once; and then all your immediately pressing anxieties will be relieved, and soon you will find those brighter days the God of the widow has kept in store for you. And now, as my time is quite limited, it only remains for me to say, as I do most sincerely and kindly, Heaven bless you, dear madam, Heaven bless you. Farewell!'

"I was present during the whole of this interview between General Washington and my mother, heard every word they both said, and saw all the money counted down on the table, and feel very confident that I have neither taken from nor added to any thing that there took place.

"On leaving the house, Washington immediately mounted his horse and rode away, leaving us quite unable for a while to realize this unexpected visit, and the still more unexpected benefaction of the illustrious visitor."

* As Mr. Warner was ascertained to have been a man of integrity, and of an unbroken memory, there need be but little doubt respecting the truth and authenticity of the above related incident, which, while it involves testimony highly honorable to the heroic leader of the Green Mountain Boys, furnishes a new and beautiful illustration of the elevated and benevolent character of Washington.

DECEMBER.

DARKEST of all Decembers

Ever my life has known,
Sitting here by the embers,
Stunned and helpless, alone—

Dreaming of Two Graves lying
Out in the damp and chill;
One where the buzzard, flying,
Pauses at Malvern Hill:

The other—alas! the pillows
Of that uneasy bed
Rise and fall with the billows
Over Clarence's head.

Theirs the heroic story—

Died by frigate and town!
Theirs the Peace and the Glory,
Theirs the Cross and the Crown.

Mine to linger and languish
Here by the wintry sea—
Ah, weak heart! in thy anguish,
What is there left to thee?

Only the sea intoning,
Only the wainscot-mouse,
Only the wild wind moaning
Over the lonely house.

THE QUEEN'S ENGLISH.

EVERY one who has traveled in England, or who has had occasion to mingle with English emigrants to America, has noticed the multiplicity of dialects spoken among the common people. To say nothing of the misplacement of the aspirate, universal among the cockneys of London, it may be safely affirmed that within a space of fifty miles in almost any part of England may be found more marked dialectic variations, from good usage not only in pronunciation but in words, than can be found among native Americans from Maine to Arkansas. Indeed the negroes on a Southern plantation speak better English than the majority of the Yorkshire, Northumberland, and Lancashire peasants. Dr. Latham, in his elaborate work on "The English Language," translates into a score or two of these dialects the first and a part of the fourteenth verse of the second chapter of the Song of Solomon, which in our common version read thus:

*I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys.
O my dove, that art in the clefts of the rock, and in the secret places of the stairs.*

From these versions we select the following, which the reader may compare with Tennyson's poem, "The Northern Farmer," in this Magazine for October:

NORTH NORTHUMBERLAND.

Aw 's the rose o' Sharon, an' the lily o' the valleys.
O maw duve, that 's i' the holes o' the rock, i' the hidin'-pleaces i' the steps.

NORTHUMBERLAND.—NEWCASTLE.

Aw my dove, as uz in th' crivices o' th' rock, in th' zecret pleäcen o' th' staairs.

SUSSEX.

I be de roäz of Sharon, and de lily of de valleys.
O my dove, dat 's in de clifts of de rock, in de sacret plaüces of de staairs.

Mr Peacock, in a recent volume of the "Transactions of the Philological Society," thus renders the whole chapter into the dialect of Northern Lancashire:

1. I 's 't rooäz a Sharon' èn 't lily a 't valleys.
2. Amang 't lasses, my luvv 's like a lily amang 't wickwoods.
3. Amang 't lads, my beluvvd's like an apple amang 't common trees. I sat mah down under his shadda wi girt plezzer, èn his friut was sweet ta mî teyast.
4. He browt ma ta 't feeästin'-house, èn his culler ouer ma was luvv.
5. Gimma a sooäp a summat ta sup, ta cumfert mah, èn I sud like sum apples ta itt: for I 's deäid seek a luvv.
6. His left hand 's under mî heed, èn his reight hand cuddles mah.
7. En mind ye this, ye Jerewzlem lasses, bî 't vallî a o' 't ky èn sheep i' 't fields, èz ya don't stir up, ner wakken mî luvv, t'l a likes.

CHAPTER I.

THE TRAVELERS.

IT was the opening of the season of eighteen hundred and thirty-two, at the Baths of Wildbad.

The evening shadows were beginning to gather over the quiet little German town, and the diligence was expected every minute. Before the door of the principal inn, waiting the arrival of the first visitors of the year, were assembled the three notable personages of Wildbad, accompanied by their wives—the mayor, representing the inhabitants; the doctor, representing the waters; the landlord, representing his own establishment. Beyond this select circle, grouped snugly about the trim little square in front of the inn, appeared the towns-people in general, mixed here and there with the country-people in their quaint German costume, placidly expectant of the diligence—the men in short black jackets, tight black breeches, and three-cornered beaver hats; the women with their long light hair hanging in one thickly-plaited tail behind them, and the waists of their short woolen gowns inserted modestly in the region of their shoulder-blades. Round the outer edge of the assemblage thus formed, flying detachments of plump white-headed children careered in perpetual motion; while, mysteriously apart from the rest of the inhabitants, the musicians of the Baths stood collected in one lost corner, waiting the appearance of the first visitors to play the first tune of the season in the form of a serenade. The light of a May evening was still bright on the tops of the great wooded hills, watching high over the town on the right hand and the left; and the cool breeze that comes before sunset came keenly fragrant here with the balsamic odor of the firs of the Black Forest.

"Mr. Landlord," said the mayor's wife (giving the landlord his title), "have you any foreign guests coming on this first day of the season?"

"Madam Mayoress," replied the landlord (returning the compliment), "I have two. They have written—the one by the hand of his servant, the other by his own hand apparently—to order their rooms; and they are from England both, as I think by their names. If you ask me to pronounce those names my tongue hesitates; if you ask me to spell them, here they are letter by letter, first and second in their order as they come. First, a high-born stranger (by title Mister), who introduces himself in eight letters—A, r, m, a, d, a, l, e—and comes ill in his own carriage. Second, a high-born stranger (by title Mister also), who introduces himself in four letters—N, e, a, l—and comes ill in the diligence.

His excellency of the eight letters writes to me (by his servant) in French; his excellency of the four letters writes to me in German. The rooms of both are ready. I know no more."

"Perhaps," suggested the mayor's wife, "Mr. Doctor has heard from one or both of these illustrious strangers?"

"From one only, Madam Mayoress; but not, strictly speaking, from the person himself. I have received a medical report of his excellency of the eight letters, and his case seems a bad one. God help him!"

"The diligence!" cried a child from the outskirts of the crowd.

The musicians seized their instruments, and silence fell on the whole community. From far away in the windings of the forest gorge the ring of horses' bells came faintly clear through the evening stillness. Which carriage was approaching—the private carriage with Mr. Armadale, or the public carriage with Mr. Neal?

"Play, my friends!" cried the mayor to the musicians. "Public or private, here are the first sick people of the season. Let them find us cheerful."

The band played a lively dance tune, and the children in the square footed it merrily to the music. At the same moment their elders near the inn door drew aside, and disclosed the first shadow of gloom that fell over the gayety and beauty of the scene. Through the opening made on either hand a little procession of stout country girls advanced, each drawing after her an empty chair on wheels; each in waiting (and knitting while she waited) for the paralyzed wretches who came helpless by hundreds then—who come helpless by thousands now—to the waters of Wildbad for relief.

While the band played, while the children danced, while the buzz of many talkers deepened, while the strong young nurses of the coming cripples knitted imperturbably, a woman's insatiable curiosity about other women asserted itself in the mayor's wife. She drew the landlady aside, and whispered a question to her on the spot.

"A word more, ma'am," said the mayor's wife, "about the two strangers from England. Are their letters explicit? Have they got any ladies with them?"

"The one by the diligence—no," replied the landlady. "But the one by the private carriage—yes. He comes with a child; he comes with a nurse; and," concluded the landlady, skillfully keeping the main point of interest till the last, "he comes with a Wife."

The mayoress brightened; the doctress (assisting at the conference) brightened; the landlady nodded significantly. In the minds of all three the same thought started into life at the same moment—"We shall see the Fashions!"

In a minute more there was a sudden movement in the crowd; and a chorus of voices proclaimed that the travelers were at hand.

By this time the coming vehicle was in sight, and all further doubt was at an end. It was the diligence that now approached by the long street leading into the square—the diligence (in a dazzling new coat of yellow paint) that delivered the first visitors of the season at the inn door. Of the ten travelers released from the middle compartment and the back compartment of the carriage—all from various parts of Germany—three were lifted out helpless, and were placed in the chairs on wheels to be drawn to their lodgings in the town. The front compartment contained two passengers only—Mr. Neal and his traveling servant. With an arm on either side to assist him, the stranger (whose malady appeared to be locally confined to a lameness in one of his feet) succeeded in descending the steps of the carriage easily enough. While he steadied himself on the pavement by the help of his stick—looking not over-patiently toward the musicians who were serenading him with the waltz in Der Freischütz—his personal appearance rather damped the enthusiasm of the friendly little circle assembled to welcome him. He was a lean, tall, serious, middle-aged man, with a cold gray eye and a long upper lip; with overhanging eyebrows and high cheekbones; a man who looked what he was—every inch a Scotchman.

"Where is the proprietor of this hotel?" he asked, speaking in the German language, with a fluent readiness of expression, and an icy coldness of manner. "Fetch the doctor," he continued, when the landlord had presented himself, "I want to see him immediately."

"I am here already, Sir," said the doctor, advancing from the circle of friends, "and my services are entirely at your disposal."

"Thank you," said Mr. Neal, looking at the doctor as the rest of us look at a dog when we have whistled and the dog has come. "I shall be glad to consult you to-morrow morning, at ten o'clock, about my own case. I only want to trouble you now with a message which I have undertaken to deliver. We overtook a traveling carriage on the road here, with a gentleman in it—an Englishman, I believe—who appeared to be seriously ill. A lady who was with him begged me to see you immediately on my arrival, and to secure your professional assistance in removing the patient from the carriage. Their courier has met with an accident, and has been left behind on the road—and they are obliged to travel very slowly. If you are here in an hour you will be here in time to receive them. That is the message. Who is this gentleman who appears to be anxious to speak to me? The mayor? If you wish to see my passport, Sir, my servant will show it to you. No. You wish to welcome me to the place, and to offer your services? I am infinitely flattered. If you have any authority to shorten the performances of your town band, you would be doing me a kindness to exert it. My nerves are irritable, and I dislike music. Where is the landlord? No; I want to see my rooms. I don't want your arm; I can get up stairs with the help of my stick. Mr. Mayor and Mr. Doctor, we need not detain one another any longer. I wish you good-night."

Both mayor and doctor looked after the Scotchman as he limped up stairs, and shook their heads together in mute disapproval of him. The ladies, as usual, went a step farther, and expressed their opinions openly in the plainest words. The case under consideration (so far as they were concerned) was the scandalous case of a man who had passed them over entirely without notice. Mrs. Mayor could only attribute such an outrage to the native ferocity of a Savage. Mrs. Doctor took a stronger view still, and considered it as proceeding from the inbred brutality of a Hog.

The hour of waiting for the traveling carriage wore on, and the creeping night stole up the hill-sides softly. One by one the stars appeared, and the first lights twinkled in the windows of the inn. As the darkness came the last idlers deserted the square; as the darkness came the mighty silence of the Forest above flowed in on the valley, and strangely and suddenly hushed the lonely little town.

The hour of waiting wore out, and the figure of the doctor, walking backward and forward anxiously, was still the only living figure left in the square. Five minutes, ten minutes, twenty minutes, were counted out by the doctor's watch before the first sound came through the night silence to warn him of the approaching carriage. Slowly it emerged into the square, at the walking pace of the horses, and drew up, as a hearse might have drawn up, at the door of the inn.

"Is the doctor here?" asked a woman's voice, speaking out of the darkness of the carriage in the French language.

"I am here, madam," replied the doctor, taking a light from the landlord's hand and opening the carriage door.

The first face that the light fell on was the face of the lady who had just spoken—a young, darkly-beautiful woman, with the tears standing thick and bright in her eager black eyes. The second face revealed was the face of a shriveled old negress, sitting opposite the lady on the back seat. The third was the face of a little sleeping child, in the negress's lap. With a quick gesture of impatience the lady signed to the nurse to leave the carriage first with the child. "Pray take them out of the way," she said to the landlady; "pray take them to their room." She got out herself when her request had been complied with. Then the light fell clear for the first time on the farther side of the carriage, and the fourth traveler was disclosed to view.

He lay helpless on a mattress supported by a stretcher; his hair long and disordered under a black skull-cap; his eyes wide open, rolling to and fro ceaselessly anxious; the rest of his face as void of all expression of the character within him, and the thought within him, as if he had been dead. There was no looking at him now, and guessing what he might once have been. The leaden blank of his face met every question as to his age, his rank, his temper, and his looks which that face might once have answered, in impenetrable silence. Nothing spoke for him now but the shock that had struck him with the death-in-life of Paralysis. The doctor's eye questioned his lower limbs, and Death-in-Life answered, I am here. The doctor's eye, rising attentively by way of his hands and arms, questioned upward and upward to the muscles round his mouth, and Death-in-Life answered, I am coming.

In the face of a calamity so unsparing and so dreadful there was nothing to be said. The silent sympathy of help was all that could be offered to the woman who stood weeping at the carriage door.

As they bore him on his bed across the hall of the hotel his wandering eyes encountered the face of his wife. They rested on her for a moment; and, in that moment, he spoke.

"The child?" he said in English, with a slow, thick, laboring articulation.

"The child is safe up stairs," she answered, faintly.

"My desk?"

"It is in my hands. Look! I won't trust it to any body; I am taking care of it for you myself."

He closed his eyes for the first time after that answer, and said no more. Tenderly and skillfully he was carried up the stairs, with his wife on one side of him, and the doctor (ominously silent) on the other. The landlord and the servants following, saw the door of his room open and close on him; heard the lady burst out crying hysterically as soon as she was alone with the doctor and the sick man; saw the doctor come out, half an hour later, with his ruddy face a shade paler than usual; pressed him eagerly for information, and received but one answer to all their inquiries, "Wait till I have seen him to-morrow. Ask me nothing to-night." They all knew the doctor's ways, and they augured ill when he left them hurriedly with that reply.

So the two first English visitors of the year came to the Baths of Wildbad, in the season of eighteen hundred and thirty-two.

CHAPTER II.

THE SOLID SIDE OF THE SCOTCH CHARACTER.

At ten o'clock the next morning, Mr. Neal—waiting for the medical visit which he had himself appointed for that hour—looked at his watch, and discovered to his amazement that he was waiting in vain. It was close on eleven when the door opened at last, and the doctor entered the room.

"I appointed ten o'clock for your visit," said Mr. Neal. "In my country a medical man is a punctual man."

"In my country," returned the doctor, without the least ill-humor, "a medical man is exactly like other men—he is at the mercy of accidents. Pray grant me your pardon, Sir, for being so long after my time; I have been detained by a very distressing case—the case of Mr. Armadale, whose traveling carriage you passed on the road yesterday."

Mr. Neal looked at his medical attendant with a sour surprise. There was a latent anxiety in the doctor's eye, a latent pre-occupation in the doctor's manner, which he was at a loss to account for. For a moment the two faces confronted each other silently, in marked national contrast—the Scotchman's, long and lean, hard and regular; the German's, plump and florid, soft and shapeless. One face looked as if it had never been young; the other, as if it would never grow old.

"Might I venture to remind you," said Mr. Neal, "that the case now under consideration is my case, and not Mr. Armadale's?"

"Certainly," replied the doctor, still vacillating between the case he had come to see and the case he had just left. "You appear to be suffering from lameness—let me look at your foot."

Mr. Neal's malady, however serious it might be in his own estimation, was of no extraordinary importance in a medical point of view. He was suffering from a rheumatic affection of the ankle-joint. The necessary questions were asked and answered, and the necessary baths were prescribed. In ten minutes the consultation was at an end, and the patient was waiting, in significant silence, for the medical adviser to take his leave.

"I can not conceal from myself," said the doctor, rising, and hesitating a little, "that I am intruding on you. But I am compelled to beg your indulgence, if I return to the subject of Mr. Armadale."

"May I ask what compels you?"

"The duty which I owe as a Christian," answered the doctor, "to a dying man."

Mr. Neal started. Those who touched his sense of religious duty touched the quickest sense in his nature. "You have established your claim on my attention," he said, gravely. "My time is yours."

"I will not abuse your kindness," replied the doctor, resuming his chair. "I will be as short as I can. Mr. Armadale's case is briefly this: He has passed the greater part of his life in the West Indies—a wild life and a vicious life, by his own confession. Shortly after his marriage—now some three years since—the first symptoms of an approaching paralytic affection began to show themselves, and his medical advisers ordered him away to try the climate of Europe. Since leaving the West Indies he has lived principally in Italy, with no benefit to his health. From Italy, before the last seizure at—tacked him, he removed to Switzerland, and from Switzerland he has been sent to this place. So much I know from his doctor's report; the rest I can tell you from my own personal experience. Mr. Armadale has been sent to Wildbad too late; he is virtually a dead man. The paralysis is fast spreading upward, and disease of the lower part of the spine has already taken place. He can still move his hands a little, but he can hold nothing in his fingers. He can still articulate, but he may wake speechless to-morrow or next day. If I give him a week more to live, I give him what I honestly believe to be the utmost length of his span. At his own request I told him—as carefully and as tenderly as I could—what I have just told you. The result was very distressing; the violence of the patient's agitation was a violence which I despair of describing to you. I took the liberty of asking him whether his affairs were unsettled. Nothing of the sort. His will is in the hands of his executor in London, and he leaves his wife and child well provided for. My next question succeeded better; it hit the mark: 'Have you something on your mind to do before you die, which is not done yet?' He gave a great gasp of relief, which said, as no words could have said it, Yes. 'Can I help you?' 'Yes. I have something to write that I must write. Can you make me hold a pen?' He might as well have asked me if I could perform a miracle. I could only say, No. 'If I dictate the words,' he went on, 'can you write what I tell you to write?' Once more I could only say, No. I understand a little English, but I can neither speak it nor write it. Mr. Armadale understands French when it is spoken (as I speak it to him) slowly, but he can not express himself in that language; and of German he is totally ignorant. In this difficulty I said, what any one else in my situation would have said, 'Why ask me? there is Mrs. Armadale at your service in the next room.' Before I could get up from my chair to fetch her he stopped me—not by words, but by a look of horror, which fixed me by main force of astonishment in my place. 'Surely,' I said, 'your wife is the fittest person to write for you as you desire?' 'The last person under heaven!' he answered. 'What!' I said, 'you ask me, a foreigner and a stranger, to write words at your dictation which you keep a secret from your wife!' Conceive my astonishment when he answered me, without a moment's hesitation, 'Yes!' I sat lost; I sat silent. 'If you can't write English,' he said, 'find somebody who can.' I tried to remonstrate. He burst into a dreadful moaning cry—a dumb entreaty, like the entreaty of a dog. 'Hush! hush!' I said; 'I will find somebody.' 'To-day!' he broke out, 'before my speech fails me, like my hand.' 'To-day, in an hour's time.' He shut his eyes; he quieted himself instantly. 'While I am waiting for you,' he said, 'let me see my little boy.' He had shown no tenderness when he spoke of his wife, but I saw the tears on his cheeks when he asked for his child. My profession, Sir, has not made me so hard a man as you might think; and my doctor's heart was as heavy when I went out to fetch the child as if I had not been a doctor at all. I am afraid you think this rather weak on my part?"

The doctor looked appealingly at Mr. Neal. He might as well have looked at a rock in the Black Forest. Mr. Neal entirely declined to be drawn by any doctor in Christendom out of the regions of plain fact.

"Go on," he said. "I presume you have not told me all that you have to tell me yet?"

"Surely you understand my object in coming here now?" returned the other.

"Your object is plain enough—at last. You invite me to connect myself blindfold with a matter which is in the last degree suspicious, so far. I decline giving you any answer until I know more than I know now. Did you think it necessary to inform this man's wife of what had passed between you, and to ask her for an explanation?"

"Of course I thought it necessary," said the doctor, indignant at the reflection on his humanity which the question seemed to imply. "If ever I saw a woman fond of her husband, and sorry for her husband, it is this unhappy Mrs. Armadale. As soon as we were left alone together I sat down by her side and I took her hand in mine. Why not? I am an ugly old man, and I may allow myself such liberties as these."

"Excuse me," said the impenetrable Scotchman. "I beg to suggest that you are losing the thread of the narrative."

"Nothing more likely," returned the doctor, recovering his good-humor. "It is in the habit of my nation to be perpetually losing the thread, and it is evidently in the habit of yours, Sir, to be perpetually finding it. What an example here of the order of the universe, and the everlasting fitness of things!"

"Will you oblige me, once for all, by confining yourself to the facts?" persisted Mr. Neal, frowning impatiently. "May I inquire, for my own information, whether Mrs. Armadale could tell you what it is her husband wishes me to write, and why it is that he refuses to let her write for him?"

"There is my thread found—and thank you for finding it," said the doctor. "You shall hear what Mrs. Armadale had to tell me in Mrs. Armadale's own words. 'The cause that now shuts me out of his confidence,' she said, 'is, I firmly believe, the same cause that has always shut me out of his heart. I am the wife he has wedded, but I am not the woman he loves. I knew when he married me that another man had won from him the woman he loved. I thought I could make him forget her. I hoped when I married him; I hoped again when I bore him a son. Need I tell you the end of my hopes? you have seen it for yourself.' (Wait, Sir, I entreat you! I have not lost the thread again; I am following it inch by inch.)

'Is this all you know?' I asked. 'All I knew,' she said, 'till a short time since. It was when we were in Switzerland, and when his illness was nearly at its worst, that news came to him by accident of that other woman who has been the shadow and the poison of my life—news that she (like me) had borne her husband a son. On the instant of his making that discovery—a trifling discovery, if ever there was one yet—a mortal fear seized on him: not for me, not for himself; a fear for his own child. The same day (without a word to me) he sent for the doctor. I was mean, wicked, what you please—I listened at the door. I heard him say: I have something to tell my son, when my son grows old enough to understand me. Shall I live to tell it? The doctor would say nothing certain. The same night (still without a word to me) he locked himself into his room. What would any woman, treated as I was, have done in my place? She would have done as I did—she would have listened again. I heard him say to himself: I shall not live to tell it: I must write it before I die. I heard his pen scrape, scrape, scrape over the paper—I heard him groaning and sobbing as he wrote—I implored him for God's sake to let me in. The cruel pen went scrape, scrape, scrape; the cruel pen was all the answer he gave me. I waited at the door—hours—I don't know how long. On a sudden the pen stopped, and I heard no more. I whispered through the keyhole softly; I said I was cold and weary with waiting; I said, Oh, my love, let me in! Not even the cruel pen answered me now: silence answered me. With all the strength of my miserable hands I beat at the door. The servants came up and broke it in. We were too late; the harm was done. Over that fatal letter the stroke had struck him—over that fatal letter we found him, paralyzed as you see him now. Those words which he wants you to write are the words he would have written himself if the stroke had spared him till the morning. From that time to this there has been a blank place left in the letter, and it is that blank place which he has just asked you to fill up.' In those words Mrs. Armadale spoke to me; in those words you have the sum and substance of all the information I can give. Say, if you please, Sir, have I kept the thread at last? Have I shown you the necessity which brings me here from your countryman's death-bed?"

"Thus far," said Mr. Neal, "you merely show me that you are exciting yourself. This is too serious a matter to be treated as you are treating it now. You have involved me in the business, and I insist on seeing my way plainly. Don't raise your hands; your hands are not a part of the question. If I am to be concerned in the completion of this mysterious letter, it is only an act of justifiable prudence on my part to inquire what the letter is about. Mrs. Armadale appears to have favored you with an infinite number of domestic particulars—in return, I presume, for your polite attention in taking her by the hand. May I ask what she could tell you about her husband's letter, so far as her husband has written it?"

"Mrs. Armadale could tell me nothing," replied the doctor, with a sudden formality in his manner which showed that his forbearance was at last failing him. "Before she was composed enough to think of the letter her husband had asked for it, and had caused it to be locked up in his desk. She knows that he has since, time after time, tried to finish it, and that, time after time, the pen has dropped from his fingers. She knows, when all other hope of his restoration was at an end, that his medical advisers encouraged him to hope in the famous waters of this place. And last, she knows how that hope has ended, for she knows what I told her husband this morning."

The frown which had been gathering latterly on Mr. Neal's face deepened and darkened. He looked at the doctor as if the doctor had personally offended him.

"The more I think of the position you are asking me to take," he said, "the less I like it. Can you undertake to say positively that Mr. Armadale is in his right mind?"

"Yes; as positively as words can say it."

"Does his wife sanction your coming here to request my interference?"

"His wife sends me to you, the only Englishman in Wildbad, to write for your dying countryman what he can not write for himself, and what no one in this place but you can write for him."

That answer drove Mr. Neal back to the last inch of ground left him to stand on. Even on that inch the Scotchman resisted still.

"Wait a little," he said. "You put it strongly; let us be quite sure you put it correctly as well. Let us be quite sure there is nobody to take this responsibility but myself. There is a mayor in Wildbad, to begin with; a man who possesses an official character to justify his interference."

"A man of a thousand," said the doctor. "With one fault—he knows no language but his own."

"There is an English legation at Stuttgart," persisted Mr. Neal.

"And there are miles on miles of the Forest between this and Stuttgart," rejoined the doctor. "If we sent this moment we could get no help from the legation before to-morrow; and it is as likely as not, in the state of this dying man's articulation, that to-morrow may find him speechless. I don't know whether his last wishes are wishes harmless to his child and to others, or wishes hurtful to his child and to others; but I do know that they must be fulfilled at once or never, and that you are the only man who can help him."

That open declaration brought the discussion to a close. It fixed Mr. Neal fast between the two alternatives of saying Yes, and committing an act of imprudence—or of saying No, and committing an act of inhumanity. There was a silence of some minutes. The Scotchman steadily reflected; and the German steadily watched him.

The responsibility of saying the next words rested on Mr. Neal, and, in course of time, Mr. Neal took it. He rose from his chair, with a sullen sense of injury lowering on his heavy eyebrows, and working sourly in the lines at the corners of his mouth.

"My position is forced on me," he said. "I have no choice but to accept it."

The doctor's impulsive nature rose in revolt against the merciless brevity and gracelessness of that reply. "I wish to God," he broke out, fervently. "I knew English enough to take your place at Mr. Armadale's bedside!"

"Bating your taking the name of the Almighty in vain," answered the Scotchman, "I entirely agree with you. I wish you did."

Without another word on either side they left the room together—the doctor leading the way.

CHAPTER III.

THE WRECK OF THE TIMBER SHIP.

No one answered the doctor's knock when he and his companion reached the ante-chamber door of Mr. Armadale's apartments. They entered unannounced; and when they looked into the sitting-room the sitting-room was empty.

"I must see Mrs. Armadale," said Mr. Neal. "I decline acting in the matter unless Mrs. Armadale authorizes my interference with her own lips."

"Mrs. Armadale is probably with her husband," replied the doctor. He approached a door at the inner end of the sitting-room while he spoke—hesitated—and, turning round again, looked at his sour companion anxiously. "I am afraid I spoke a little harshly, Sir, when we were leaving your room," he said. "I beg your pardon for it, with all my heart. Before this poor afflicted lady comes in, will you—will you excuse my asking your utmost gentleness and consideration for her?"

"No, Sir," retorted the other, harshly, "I won't excuse you. What right have I given you to think me wanting in gentleness and consideration toward any body?"

The doctor saw it was useless. "I beg your pardon again," he said, resignedly, and left the unapproachable stranger to himself.

Mr. Neal walked to the window, and stood there, with his eyes mechanically fixed on the prospect, composing his mind for the coming interview.

It was mid-day; the sun shone bright and warm; and all the little world of Wildbad was alive and merry in the genial spring-time. Now and again heavy wagons, with black-faced carters in charge, rolled by the window, bearing their precious lading of charcoal from the Forest. Now and again, hurled over the headlong current of the stream that runs through the town, great lengths of timber loosely strung together in interminable series—with the booted raftsmen, pole in hand, poised watchful at either end—shot swift and serpent-like past the houses on their course to the distant Rhine. High and steep above the gabled wooden buildings on the river bank, the great hill-sides, crested black with firs, shone to the shining heavens in a glory of lustrous green. In and out, where the forest foot-paths wound from the grass through the trees, from the trees over the grass, the bright spring dresses of women and children on the search for wild-flowers, traveled to and fro in the lofty distance like spots of moving light. Below, on the walk by the stream side, the booths of the little bazar that had opened punctually with the opening season, showed all their glittering trinkets, and fluttered in the balmy air their splendor of many-colored flags. Longingly, here, the children looked at the show; patiently the sun-burnt lasses plied their knitting as they paced the walk; courteously the passing towns-people, by fours and fives, and the passing visitors, by ones and twos, greeted each other, hat in hand; and slowly, slowly, the crippled and helpless in their chairs on wheels, came out in the cheerful noontide with the rest, and took their share of the blessed light that cheers, of the blessed sun that shines for all.

On this scene the Scotchman looked, with eyes that never noted its beauty, with a mind far away from every lesson that it taught. One by one he meditated the words he should say when the wife came in. One by one he pondered over the conditions he might impose, before he took the pen in hand at the husband's bedside.

"Mrs. Armadale is here," said the doctor's voice, interposing suddenly between his reflections and himself.

He turned on the instant, and saw before him, with the pure mid-day light shining full on her, a woman of the mixed blood of the European and the African race, with the northern delicacy in the shape of her face, and the southern richness in its color—a woman in the prime of her beauty, who moved with an inbred grace, who looked with an inbred fascination, whose large, languid, black eyes rested on him gratefully, whose little dusky hand offered itself to him, in mute expression of her thanks, with the welcome that is given to the coming of a friend. For the first time in his life the Scotchman was taken by surprise. Every self-preservative word that he had been meditating but an instant since dropped out of his memory. His thrice-impenetrable armor of habitual suspicion, habitual self-discipline, and habitual reserve, which had never fallen from him in a woman's presence before, fell from him in this woman's presence, and brought him to his knees a conquered man. He took the hand she offered him, and bowed over it his first honest homage to the sex, in silence.

She hesitated on her side. The quick feminine perception which, in happier circumstances, would have pounced on the secret of his embarrassment in an instant, failed her now. She attributed his strange reception of her to pride, to reluctance—to any cause but the unexpected revelation of her own beauty. "I have no words to thank you," she said, faintly, trying to propitiate him. "I should only distress you if I tried to speak." Her lip began to tremble, she drew back a little, and turned away her head in silence.

The doctor, who had been standing apart, quietly observant in a corner, advanced before Mr. Neal could interfere, and led Mrs. Armadale to a chair. "Don't be afraid of him," whispered the good man, patting her gently on the shoulder. "He was hard as iron in my hands, but I think, by the look of him, he will be soft as wax in yours. Say the words I told you to say, and let us take him to your husband's room before those sharp wits of his have time to recover themselves."

She roused her sinking resolution, and advanced half-way to the window to meet Mr. Neal. "My kind friend, the doctor, has told me, Sir, that your only hesitation in coming here is a hesitation on my account," she said, her head drooping a little, and her rich color fading away while she spoke. "I am deeply grateful, but I entreat you not to think of me. What my husband wishes—" Her voice faltered; she waited resolutely, and recovered herself. "What my husband wishes in his last moments, I wish too."

This time Mr. Neal was composed enough to answer her. In low, earnest tones he entreated her to say no more. "I was only anxious to show you every consideration," he said. "I am only anxious now to spare you every distress." As he spoke something like a glow of color rose slowly on his sallow face. Her eyes were looking at him, softly attentive—and he thought guiltily of his meditations at the window before she came in.

The doctor saw his opportunity. He opened the door that led into Mr. Armadale's room, and stood by it, waiting silently. Mrs. Armadale entered first. In a minute more the door was closed again, and Mr. Neal stood committed to the responsibility that had been forced on him—committed beyond recall.

The room was decorated in the gaudy continental fashion; and the warm sunlight was shining in joyously. Cupids and flowers were painted on the ceiling; bright ribbons looped up the white window curtains; a smart gilt clock ticked on a velvet-covered mantle-piece; mirrors gleamed on the walls, and flowers in all the colors of the rainbow speckled the carpet. In the midst of the finery, and the glitter, and the light, lay the paralyzed man, with his wandering eyes, and his lifeless lower face—his head propped high with many pillows; his helpless hands laid out over the bed-clothes like the hands of a corpse. By the bed-head stood, grim and old and silent, the shriveled black nurse; and on the counterpane, between his father's outspread hands, lay the child, in his little white frock, absorbed in the enjoyment of a new toy. When the door opened, and Mrs. Armadale led the way in, the boy was tossing his plaything—a soldier on horseback—backward and forward over the helpless hands on either side of him, and the father's wandering eyes were following the toy to and fro with a stealthy and ceaseless vigilance—a vigilance as of a wild animal, terrible to see.

The moment Mr. Neal appeared in the doorway those restless eyes stopped, looked up, and fastened on the stranger with a fierce eagerness of inquiry. Slowly the motionless lips struggled into movement. With thick, hesitating articulation, they put the question which the eyes asked mutely, into words.

"Are you the man?"

Mr. Neal advanced to the bedside; Mrs. Armadale drawing back from it as he approached, and waiting with the doctor at the farther end of the room. The child looked up, toy in hand, as the stranger came near—opened his bright brown eyes wide in momentary astonishment—and then went on with his game.

"I have been made acquainted with your sad situation, Sir," said Mr. Neal. "And I have come here to place my services at your disposal; services which no one but myself—as your medical attendant informs me—is in a position to render you in this strange place. My name is Neal. I am a Writer to the Signet in Edinburgh; and I may presume to say for myself that any confidence you wish to place in me will be confidence not improperly bestowed."

The eyes of the beautiful wife were not confusing him now. He spoke to the helpless husband quietly and seriously, without his customary harshness, and with a grave compassion in his manner which presented him at his best. The sight of the death-bed had steadied him.

"You wish me to write something for you?" he resumed, after waiting for a reply, and waiting in vain.

"Yes!" said the dying man, with the all-mastering impatience which his tongue was powerless to express glittering angrily in his eyes. "My hand is gone, and my speech is going. Write!"

Before there was time to speak again, Mr. Neal heard the rustling of a woman's dress, and the quick creaking of castors on the carpet behind him. Mrs. Armadale was moving the writing-table across the room to the foot of the bed. If he was to set up those safeguards of his own devising that were to bear him harmless through all results to come, now was the time, or never. He kept his back turned on Mrs. Armadale, and put his precautionary question at once in the plainest terms.

"May I ask, Sir, before I take the pen in hand, what it is you wish me to write?"

The angry eyes of the paralyzed man glittered brighter and brighter. His lips opened and closed again. He made no reply.

Mr. Neal tried another precautionary question, in a new direction.

"When I have written what you wish me to write," he asked, "what is to be done with it?"

This time the answer came:

"Seal it up in my presence, and post it to my Ex—"

His laboring articulation suddenly stopped, and he looked piteously in the questioner's face for the next word.

"Do you mean your Executor?"

"Yes."

"It is a letter, I suppose, that I am to post?" There was no answer. "May I ask if it is a letter altering your will?"

"Nothing of the sort."

Mr. Neal considered a little. The mystery was thickening. The one way out of it, so far, was the way traced faintly through that strange story of the unfinished letter which the doctor had repeated to him in Mrs. Armadale's words. The nearer he approached his unknown responsibility, the more ominous it seemed of something serious to come. Should he risk another question before he pledged himself irrevocably? As the doubt crossed his mind he felt Mrs. Armadale's silk dress touch him on the side farthest from her husband. Her delicate dark hand was laid gently on his arm; her full deep African eyes looked at him in submissive entreaty. "My husband is very anxious," she whispered. "Will you quiet his anxiety, Sir, by taking your place at the writing-table?"

It was from her lips that the request came—from the lips of the person who had the best right to hesitate; the wife who was excluded from the secret! Most men in Mr. Neal's position would have given up all their safeguards on the spot. The Scotchman gave them all up but one.

"I will write what you wish me to write," he said, addressing Mr. Armadale. "I will seal it in your presence; and I will post it to your Executor myself. But, in engaging to do this, I must beg you to remember that I am acting entirely in the dark; and I must ask you to excuse me if I reserve my own entire freedom of action, when your wishes in relation to the writing and the posting of the letter have been fulfilled."

"Do you give me your promise?"

"If you want my promise, Sir, I will give it—subject to the condition I have just named."

"Take your condition, and keep your promise. My desk," he added, looking at his wife for the first time.

She crossed the room eagerly to fetch the desk from a chair in a corner. Returning with it, she made a passing sign to the negress, who still stood, grim and silent, in the place that she had occupied from the first. The woman advanced, obedient to the sign, to take the child from the bed. At the instant when she touched him the father's eyes—fixed previously on the desk—turned on her with the stealthy quickness of a cat. "No!" he said. "No!" echoed the fresh voice of the boy, still charmed with his plaything, and still liking his place on the bed. The negress left the room, and the child, in high triumph, trotted his toy-soldier up and down on the bed-clothes that lay rumpled over his father's breast. His mother's lovely face contracted with a pang of jealousy as she looked at him.

"Shall I open your desk?" she asked, pushing back the child's plaything sharply while she spoke. An answering look from her husband guided her hand to the place under his pillow where the key was hidden. She opened the desk, and disclosed inside some small sheets of manuscript pinned together. "These?" she inquired, producing them.

"Yes," he said. "You can go now."

The Scotchman sitting at the writing-table, the doctor stirring a stimulant mixture in a corner, looked at each other with an anxiety in both their faces which they could neither of them control. The words that banished the wife from the room were spoken. The moment had come.

"You can go now," said Mr. Armadale, for the second time.

She looked at the child, established comfortably on the bed, and an ashy paleness spread slowly over her face. She looked at the fatal letter which was a sealed secret to her; and a torture of jealous suspicion—suspicion of that other woman who had been the shadow and the poison of her life—wring her to the heart. After moving a few steps from the bedside she stopped and came back again. Armed with the double courage of her love and her despair she pressed her lips on her dying husband's cheek, and pleaded with him for the last time. Her burning tears dropped on his face as she whispered to him, "Oh, Allan, think how I have loved you! think how hard I have tried to make you happy! think how soon I shall lose you! Oh, my own love! don't, don't send me away!"

The words pleaded for her; the kiss pleaded for her; the recollection of the love that had been given to him, and never returned, touched the heart of the fast-sinking man as nothing had touched it since the day of his marriage. A heavy sigh broke from him. He looked at her, and hesitated.

"Let me stay," she whispered, pressing her face closer to his.

"It will only distress you," he whispered back.

"Nothing distresses me but being sent away from you!"

He waited. She saw that he was thinking, and waited too.

"If I let you stay a little—?"

"Yes! yes!"

"Will you go when I tell you?"

"I will."

"On your oath?"

The fetters that bound his tongue seemed to be loosened for a moment in the great outburst of anxiety which forced that question to his lips. He spoke those startling words as he had spoken no words yet.

"On my oath!" she repeated, and, dropping on her knees at the bedside, passionately kissed his hand. The two strangers in the room turned their heads away by common consent. In the silence that followed, the one sound stirring was the small sound of the child's toy as he moved it hither and thither on the bed.

The doctor was the first who broke the spell of stillness which had fallen on all the persons present. He approached the patient and examined him anxiously. Mrs. Armadale rose from her knees, and, first waiting for her husband's permission, carried the sheets of manuscript which she had taken out of the desk to the table at which Mr. Neal was waiting. Flushed and eager, more beautiful than ever in the vehement agitation which still possessed her, she stooped over him as she put the letter into his hands, and, seizing on the means to her end with a woman's headlong self-abandonment to her own impulses, whispered to him: "Read it out from the beginning. I must and will hear it!" Her eyes flashed their burning light into his; her breath beat on his cheek. Before he could answer, before he could think, she was back with her husband. In an instant she had spoken, and in that instant her beauty had bent the Scotchman to her will. Frowning in reluctant acknowledgment of his own inability to resist her, he turned over the leaves of the letter, looked at the blank place where the pen had dropped from the writer's hand and had left a blot on the paper, turned back again to the beginning, and said the words, in the wife's interest, which the wife herself had put into his lips.

"Perhaps, Sir, you may wish to make some corrections," he began, with all his attention apparently fixed on the letter, and with every outward appearance of letting his sour temper again get the better of him. "Shall I read over to you what you have already written?"

Mrs. Armadale sitting at the bed-head on one side, and the doctor with his fingers on the patient's pulse sitting on the other, waited with widely different anxieties for the answer to Mr. Neal's question. Mr. Armadale's eyes turned searchingly from his child to his wife.

"You will hear it?" he said. Her breath came and went quickly; her hand stole up and took his; she bowed her head in silence. Her husband paused, taking secret counsel with his thoughts, and keeping his eyes fixed on his wife. At last he decided, and gave the answer. "Read it," he said. "And stop when I tell you."

It was close on one o'clock, and the bell was ringing which summoned the visitors to their early dinner at the inn. The quick beat of footsteps and the gathering hum of voices outside penetrated gayly into the room as Mr. Neal spread the manuscript before him on the table and read the opening sentences in these words:

"I address this letter to my son, when my son is of an age to understand it. Having lost all hope of living to see my boy grow up to manhood, I have no choice but to write here what I would fain have said to him at a future time with my own lips.

"I have three objects in writing. First, to reveal the circumstances which attended the marriage of an English lady of my acquaintance in the island of Madeira. Secondly, to throw the true light on the death of her husband a short time afterward on board the French timber-ship, La Grace de Dieu. Thirdly, to warn my son of a danger that lies in wait for him—a danger that will rise from his father's grave, when the earth has closed over his father's ashes.

"The story of the English lady's marriage begins with my inheriting the great Armadale property and my taking the fatal Armadale name.

"I am the only surviving son of the late Mathew Wrentmore, of Barbadoes. I was born on our family estate in that island, and I lost my father when I was still a child. My mother was blindly fond of me: she denied me nothing; she let me live as I pleased. My boyhood and youth were passed in idleness and self-indulgence, among people—slaves and half-castes mostly—to whom my will was law. I doubt if there is a gentleman of my birth and station in all England as ignorant as I am at this moment. I doubt if there was ever a young man in this world whose passions were left so entirely without control of any kind as mine were in those early days.

"My mother had a woman's romantic objection to my father's homely Christian name. I was christened Allan, after the name of a wealthy cousin of my father's, the late Allan Armadale, who possessed estates in our neighborhood, the largest and the most productive in the island, and who consented to be my godfather by proxy. Mr. Armadale had never seen his West Indian property. He lived in England; and, after sending me the customary godfather's present, he held no further communication with my parents for years afterward. I was just twenty-one before we heard again from Mr. Armadale. On that occasion my mother received a letter from him asking if I was still alive, and offering no less (if I was) than to make me the heir to his West Indian property.

"This piece of good fortune fell to me entirely through the misconduct of Mr. Armadale's son and only child. The young man had disgraced himself beyond all redemption; had left his home an outlaw; and had been thereupon renounced by his father at once and forever. Having no other near male relative to succeed him, Mr. Armadale thought of his cousin's son, and his own godson; and he offered the West Indian estate to me and my heirs after me on one condition—that I and my heirs should take his name. The proposal was gratefully accepted, and the proper legal measures were adopted for changing my name in the colony and in the mother-country. By the next mail information reached Mr. Armadale that his condition had been complied with. The return mail brought news from the lawyers. The will had been altered in my favor, and in a week afterward the death of my benefactor had made me the largest proprietor and the richest man in Barbadoes.

"This was the first event in the chain. The second event followed it six weeks afterward.

"At that time there happened to be a vacancy in the clerk's office on the estate, and there came to fill it a young man about my own age, who had recently arrived in the island. He announced himself by the name of Fergus Ingleby. My impulses governed me in every thing; I knew no law but the law of my own caprice; and I took a fancy to the stranger the moment I set eyes on him. He had the manners of a gentleman, and he possessed the most attractive social qualities which, in my small experience, I had ever met with. When I heard that the written references to character which he had brought with him were pronounced to be unsatisfactory I interfered, and insisted that he should have the place. My will was law, and he had it.

"My mother disliked and distrusted Ingleby from the first. When she found the intimacy between us rapidly ripening; when she found me admitting this inferior to the closest companionship and confidence—(I had lived with my inferiors all my life, and I liked it)—she made effort after effort to part us, and failed in one and all. Driven to her last resources she resolved to try the one chance left—the chance of persuading me to take a voyage which I had often thought of, a voyage to England.

"Before she spoke to me on the subject she resolved to interest me in the idea of seeing England, as I had never been interested yet. She wrote to an old friend and an old admirer of hers, the late Stephen Blanchard, of Thorpe-Ambrose, in Norfolk—a gentleman of landed estate, and a widower with a grown-up family. After-discoveries informed me that she must have alluded to their former attachment (which was checked, I believe, by the parents on either side); and that, in asking Mr. Blanchard's welcome for her son when he came to England, she made inquiries about his daughter, which hinted at the chance of a marriage uniting the two families, if the young lady and I met and liked one another. We were equally matched in every respect, and my mother's recollection of her girlish attachment to Mr. Blanchard made the prospect of my marrying her old admirer's daughter the brightest and happiest prospect that her eyes could see. Of all this I knew nothing until Mr. Blanchard's answer arrived at Barbadoes. Then my mother showed me the letter, and put the temptation which was 'to separate me from Fergus Ingleby openly in my way.

"Mr. Blanchard's letter was dated from the island of Madeira. He was out of health, and he had been ordered there by the doctors to try the climate. His daughter was with him. After heartily reciprocating all my mother's hopes and wishes he proposed (if I intended leaving Barbadoes shortly) that I should take Madeira on my way to England and pay him a visit at his temporary residence in the island. If this could not be, he mentioned the time at which he expected to be back in England, when I might be sure of finding a welcome at his own house of Thorpe-Ambrose. In conclusion he apologized for not writing at greater length; explaining that his sight was affected, and that he had disobeyed the doctor's orders by yielding to the temptation of writing to his old friend with his own hand.

"Kindly as it was expressed the letter itself might have had little influence on me. But there was something else besides the letter; there was inclosed in it a miniature portrait of Miss Blanchard. At the back of the portrait her father had written half-jestingly, half-tenderly, 'I can't ask my daughter to spare my eyes as usual, without telling her of your inquiries and putting a young lady's diffidence to the blush. So I send her in effigy (without her knowledge) to answer for herself. It is a good likeness of a good girl. If she likes your son—and if I like him, which I am sure I shall—we may yet live, my good friend, to see our children what we might once have been ourselves—man and wife.' My mother gave me the miniature with the letter. The portrait at once struck me—I can't say why, I can't say how—as nothing of the kind had ever struck me before.

"Harder intellects than mine might have attributed the extraordinary impression produced on me to the disordered condition of my mind at that time; to the weariness of my own base pleasures which had been gaining on me for months past; to the undefined longing which that weariness implied for newer interests and fresher hopes than any that had possessed me yet. I attempted no such sober self-examination as this: I believed in destiny then; I believe in destiny now. It was enough for me to know—as I did know—that the first sense I had ever felt of something better in my nature than my animal-self was roused by that girl's face looking at me from her picture, as no woman's face had ever looked at me yet. In those tender eyes—in the chance of making that gentle creature my wife—I saw my destiny written. The portrait which had come into my hands so strangely and so unexpectedly was the silent messenger of happiness close at hand, sent to warn, to encourage, to rouse me before it was too late. I put the miniature under my pillow at night; I looked at it again the next morning. My conviction of the day before remained as strong as ever; my superstition (if you please to call it so) pointed out to me irresistibly the way on which I should go. There was a ship in port which was to sail for England in a fortnight, touching at Madeira. In that ship I took my passage."

Thus far the reader had advanced with no interruption to disturb him. But at the last words the tones of another voice, low and broken, mingled with his own.

"Was she a fair woman?" asked the voice, "or dark like me?"

Mr. Neal paused and looked up. The doctor was still at the bed-head, with his fingers mechanically on the patient's pulse. The child, missing his mid-day sleep, was beginning to play languidly with his new toy. The father's eyes were watching him with a rapt and ceaseless attention. But one great change was visible in the listeners since the narrative had begun. Mrs. Armadale had dropped her hold of her husband's hand, and sat with her face steadily turned away from him. The hot African blood burned red in her dusky cheeks as she obstinately repeated the question, "Was she a fair woman—or dark like me?"

"Fair," said her husband, without looking at her.

Her hands, lying clasped together in her lap, wrung each other hard—she said no more. Mr. Neal's overhanging eyebrows lowered ominously as he returned to the narrative. He had incurred his own severe displeasure—he had caught himself in the act of secretly pitying her.

"I have said"—the letter proceeded—"that Ingleby was admitted to my closest confidence. I was sorry to leave him; and I was distressed by his evident surprise and mortification when he heard that I was going away. In my own justification I showed him the letter and the likeness, and told him the truth. His interest in the portrait seemed to be hardly inferior to my own. He asked me about Miss Blanchard's family and Miss Blanchard's fortune with the sympathy of a true friend; and he strengthened my regard for him, and my belief in him, by putting himself out of the question, and by generously encouraging me to persist in my new purpose. When we parted I was in high health and spirits. Before we met again the next day I was suddenly struck by an illness which threatened both my reason and my life.

"I have no proof against Ingleby. There was more than one woman on the island whom I had wronged beyond all forgiveness, and whose vengeance might well have reached me at that time. I can accuse nobody. I can only say that my life was saved by my old black nurse; and that the woman afterward acknowledged having used the known negro-antidote to a known negro-poison in those parts. When my first days of convalescence came, the ship in which my passage had been taken had long since sailed. When I asked for Ingleby he was gone. Proofs of his unpardonable misconduct in his situation were placed before me, which not even my partiality for him could resist. He had been turned out of the office in the first days of my illness, and nothing more was known of him but that he had left the island.

"All through my sufferings the portrait had been under my pillow. All through my convalescence it was my one consolation when I remembered the past, and my one encouragement when I thought of the future. No words can describe the hold that first fancy had now taken of me—with time and solitude and suffering to help it. My mother, with all her interest in the match, was startled by the unexpected success of her own project. She had written to tell Mr. Blanchard of my illness, but had received no reply. She now offered to write again, if I would promise not to leave her before my recovery was complete. My impatience acknowledged no restraint. Another ship in port gave me another chance of leaving for Madeira. Another examination of Mr. Blanchard's letter of invitation assured me that I should find him still in the island, if I seized my opportunity on the spot. In defiance of my mother's entreaties I insisted on taking my passage in the second ship—and this time, when the ship sailed, I was on board.

"The change did me good; the sea air made a man of me again. After an unusually rapid voyage I found myself at the end of my pilgrimage. On a fine still evening which I can never forget, I stood alone on the shore, with her likeness in my bosom, and saw the white walls of the house where I knew that she lived.

"I strolled round the outer limits of the grounds to compose myself before I went in. Venturing through a gate and a shrubbery, I looked into the garden, and saw a lady there, loitering alone on the lawn. She turned her face toward me—and I beheld the original of my portrait, the fulfillment of my dream! It is useless, and worse than useless, to write of it now. Let me only say that every promise which the likeness had made to my fancy the living woman kept to my eyes, in the moment when they first looked on her. Let me say this—and no more.

"I was too violently agitated to trust myself in her presence. I drew back, undiscovered; and making my way to the front door of the house, asked for her father first. Mr. Blanchard had retired to his room, and could see nobody. Upon that I took courage, and asked for Miss Blanchard. The servant smiled. 'My young lady is not Miss Blanchard any longer, Sir,' he said. 'She is married.' Those words would have struck some men, in my position, to the earth. They fired my hot blood, and I seized the servant by the throat, in a frenzy of rage. 'It's a lie,' I broke out, speaking to him as if he had been one of the slaves on my own estate. 'It's the truth,' said the man, struggling with me; 'her husband is in the house at this moment.' 'Who is he, you scoundrel?' The servant answered by repeating my own name, to my own face: 'Allan Armadale.'

"You can now guess the truth. Fergus Ingleby was the outlawed son, whose name and whose inheritance I had taken. And Fergus Ingleby was even with me for depriving him of his birth-right.

"Some account of the manner in which the deception had been carried out is necessary to explain—I don't say to justify—the share I took in the events that followed my arrival at Madeira.

“By Ingleby's own confession he had come to Barbadoes—knowing of his father's death and of my succession to the estates—with the settled purpose of plundering and injuring me. My rash confidence put such an opportunity into his hands as he could never have hoped for. He had waited to possess himself of the letter which my mother wrote to Mr. Blanchard at the outset of my illness—had then caused his own dismissal from his situation—and had sailed for Madeira in the very ship that was to have sailed with me. Arrived at the island, he had waited again till the vessel was away once more on her voyage, and had then presented himself at Mr. Blanchard's—not in the assumed name by which I shall continue to speak of him here—but in the name which was as certainly his as mine, ‘Allan Armadale.’ The fraud at the outset presented few difficulties. He had only an ailing old man (who had not seen my mother for half a lifetime) and an innocent unsuspecting girl (who had never seen her at all) to deal with; and he had learned enough in my service to answer the few questions that were put to him as readily as I might have answered them myself. His looks and manners, his winning ways with women, his quickness and cunning, did the rest. While I was still on my sick bed he had won Miss Blanchard's affections. While I was dreaming over the likeness in the first days of my convalescence he had secured Mr. Blanchard's consent to the celebration of the marriage before he and his daughter left the island.

“Thus far Mr. Blanchard's infirmity of sight had helped the deception. He had been content to send messages to my mother, and to receive the messages which were duly invented in return. But when the suitor was accepted, and the wedding-day was appointed, he felt it due to his old friend to write to her, asking her formal consent, and inviting her to the marriage. He could only complete part of the letter himself; the rest was finished, under his dictation, by Miss Blanchard. There was no chance of being beforehand with the post-office this time; and Ingleby, sure of his place in the heart of his victim, waylaid her as she came out of her father's room with the letter, and privately told her the truth. She was still under age, and the position was a serious one. If the letter was posted, no resource would be left but to wait and be parted forever, or to elope under circumstances which made detection almost a certainty. The destination of any ship which took them away would be known beforehand; and the fast-sailing yacht in which Mr. Blanchard had come to Madeira was waiting in the harbor to take him back to England. The only other alternative was to continue the deception by suppressing the letter, and to confess the truth when they were securely married. What arts of persuasion Ingleby used—what base advantage he might previously have taken of her love and her trust in him to degrade Miss Blanchard to his own level—I can not say. He did degrade her. The letter never went to its destination; and, with the daughter's privity and consent, the father's confidence was abused to the very last.

“The one precaution now left to take was to fabricate the answer from my mother which Mr. Blanchard expected, and which would arrive in due course of post before the day appointed for the marriage. Ingleby had my mother's stolen letter with him; but he was without the imitative dexterity which would have enabled him to make use of it for a forgery of her handwriting. Miss Blanchard, who had consented passively to the deception, refused to take any active share in the fraud practiced on her father. In this difficulty Ingleby found an instrument ready to his hand in an orphan girl of barely twelve years old, a marvel of precocious ability, whom Miss Blanchard had taken a romantic fancy to befriend, and whom she had brought away with her from England to be trained as her maid. That girl's wicked dexterity removed the one serious obstacle left to the success of the fraud. I saw the imitation of my mother's writing which she had produced under Ingleby's instructions, and (if the shameful truth must be told) with her young mistress's knowledge—and I believe I should have been deceived by it myself. I saw the girl afterward—and my blood curdled at the sight of her. If she is alive now, woe to the people who trust her! No creature more innately deceitful and more innately pitiless ever walked this earth.

“The forged letter paved the way securely for the marriage; and when I reached the house they were (as the servant had truly told me) man and wife. My arrival on the scene simply precipitated the confession which they had both agreed to make. Ingleby's own lips shamelessly acknowledged the truth. He had nothing to lose by speaking out—he was married, and his wife's fortune was beyond her father's control. I pass over all that followed—my interview with the daughter, and my interview with the father—to come to results. For two days the efforts of the wife, and the efforts of the clergyman who had celebrated the marriage, were successful in keeping Ingleby and myself apart. On the third day I set my trap more successfully, and I and the man who had mortally injured me met together alone, face to face.

“Remember how my confidence had been abused; remember how the one good purpose of my life had been thwarted; remember the violent passions rooted deep in my nature, and never yet controlled—and then imagine for yourself what passed between us. All I need tell here is the end. He was a taller and a stronger man than I, and he took his brute's advantage with a brute's ferocity. He struck me.

“Think of the injuries I had received at that man's hands, and then think of his setting his mark on my face by a blow!

“I went to an English officer who had been my fellow-passenger on the voyage from Barba-does. I told him the truth, and he agreed with me that a meeting was inevitable. Dueling had its received formalities and its established laws in those days; and he began to speak of them. I stopped him. 'I will take a pistol in my right hand,' I said, 'and he shall take a pistol in his: I will take one end of a handkerchief in my left hand, and he shall take the other end in his; and across that handkerchief the duel shall be fought.' The officer got up, and looked at me as if I had personally insulted him. 'You are asking me to be present at a murder and a suicide,' he said; 'I decline to serve you.' He left the room. As soon as he was gone I wrote down the words I had said to the officer, and sent them by a messenger to Ingleby. While I was waiting for an answer I sat down before the glass and looked at his mark on my face. 'Many a man has had blood on his hands and blood on his conscience,' I thought, 'for less than this.'

"The messenger came back with Ingleby's answer. It appointed a meeting for three o'clock the next day, at a lonely place in the interior of the island. I had resolved what to do if he refused; his letter released me from the horror of my own resolution. I felt grateful to him—yes, absolutely grateful to him—for writing it.

"The next day I went to the place. He was not there. I waited two hours, and he never came. At last the truth dawned on me. 'Once a coward, always a coward,' I thought. I went back to Mr. Blanchard's house. Before I got there a sudden misgiving seized me, and I turned aside to the harbor. I was right; the harbor was the place to go to. A ship sailing for Lisbon that afternoon had offered him the opportunity of taking a passage for himself and his wife, and escaping me. His answer to my challenge had served its purpose of sending me out of the way into the interior of the island. Once more I had trusted in Fergus Ingleby, and once more those sharp wits of his had been too much for me.

"I asked my informant if Mr. Blanchard was aware as yet of his daughter's departure. He had discovered it, but not until the ship had sailed. This time I took a lesson in cunning from Ingleby. Instead of showing myself at Mr. Blanchard's house, I went first and looked at Mr. Blanchard's yacht.

"The vessel told me what the vessel's master might have concealed—the truth. I found her in the confusion of a sudden preparation for sea. All the crew were on board, with the exception of some few who had been allowed their leave on shore, and who were away in the interior of the island, nobody knew where. When I discovered that the sailing-master was trying to supply their places with the best men he could pick up at a moment's notice, my resolution was instantly taken. I knew the duties on board a yacht well enough, having had a vessel of my own, and having sailed her myself. Hurrying into the town, I changed my dress for a sailor's coat and hat, and, returning to the harbor, I offered myself as one of the volunteer crew. I don't know what the sailing-master saw in my face. My answers to his questions satisfied him, and yet he looked at me and hesitated. But hands were scarce, and it ended in my being taken on board. An hour later Mr. Blanchard joined us, and was assisted into the cabin, suffering pitiably in mind and body both. An hour after that we were at sea, with a starless night overhead, and a fresh breeze behind us.

"As I had surmised, we were in pursuit of the vessel in which Ingleby and his wife had left the island that afternoon. The ship was French, and was employed in the timber-trade: her name was La Grace de Dieu. Nothing more was known of her than that she was bound for Lisbon; that she had been driven out of her course; and that she had touched at Madeira, short of men and short of provisions. The last want had been supplied, but not the first. Sailors distrusted the sea-worthiness of the ship, and disliked the look of the vagabond crew. When those two serious facts had been communicated to Mr. Blanchard, the hard words he had spoken to his child in the first shock of discovering that she had helped to deceive him, smote him to the heart. He instantly determined to give his daughter a refuge on board his own vessel, and to quiet her by keeping her villain of a husband out of the way of all harm at my hands. The yacht sailed three feet and more to the ship's one. There was no doubt of our overtaking La Grace de Dieu; the only fear was that we might pass her in the darkness.

"After we had been some little time out the wind suddenly dropped, and there fell on us an airless, sultry calm. When the order came to get the top-masts on deck, and to shift the large sails, we all knew what to expect. In little better than an hour more the storm was upon us, the thunder was pealing over our heads, and the yacht was running for it. She was a powerful schooner-rigged vessel of three hundred tons, as strong as wood and iron could make her; she was handled by a sailing-master who thoroughly understood his work, and she behaved nobly. As the new morning came, the fury of the wind, blowing still from the southwest quarter, subsided a little, and the sea was less heavy. Just before daybreak we heard faintly, through the howling of the gale, the report of a gun. The men, collected anxiously on deck, looked at each other and said, 'There she is!'

"With the daybreak we saw the vessel, and the timber ship it was. She lay wallowing in the trough of the sea, her foremast and her mainmast both gone—a water-logged wreck. The yacht carried three boats; one amidships, and two slung to davits on the quarters; and the sailing-master seeing signs of the storm renewing its fury before long, determined on lowering the quarter-boats while the lull lasted. Few as the people were on board the wreck, they were too many for one boat, and the risk of trying two boats at once was thought less, in the critical state of the weather, than the risk of making two separate trips from the yacht to the ship. There might be time to make one trip in safety, but no man could look at the heavens and say there would be time enough for two.

"The boats were manned by volunteers from the crew, I being in the second of the two. When the first boat was got alongside of the timber ship—a service of difficulty and danger which no words can describe—all the men on board made a rush to leave the wreck together. If the boat had not been pulled off again before the whole of them had crowded in, the lives of all must have been sacrificed. As our boat approached the vessel in its turn, we arranged that four of us should get on board—two (I being one of them) to see to the safety of Mr. Blanchard's daughter, and two to beat back the cowardly remnant of the crew, if they tried to crowd in first. The other three—the coxswain and two oarsmen—were left in the boat to keep her from being crushed by the ship. What the others saw when they first boarded La Grace de Dieu, I don't know: what I saw was the woman whom I had lost, the woman vilely stolen from me, lying in a swoon on the deck. We lowered her, insensible, into the boat. The remnant of the crew—five in number—were compelled by main force to follow her in an orderly manner, one by one, and minute by minute, as the chance offered for safely taking them in. I was the last who left; and, at the next roll of the ship toward us, the empty length of the deck, without a living creature on it from stem to stern, told the boat's crew that their work was done. With the louder and louder howling of the fast-rising tempest to warn them, they rowed for their lives back to the yacht.

"A succession of heavy squalls had brought round the course of the new storm that was coming from the south to the north; and the sailing-master, watching his opportunity, had wore the yacht, to be ready for it. Before the last of our men had got on board again it burst on us with the fury of a hurricane. Our boat was swamped, but not a life was lost. Once more we ran before it, due south, at the mercy of the wind. I was on deck with the rest, watching the one rag of sail we could venture to set, and waiting to supply its place with another, if it blew out of the bolt ropes, when the mate came close to me, and shouted in my ear through the thunder of the storm, 'She has come to her senses in the cabin, and has asked for her husband. Where is he?' Not a man on board knew. The yacht was searched from one end to another without finding him. The men were mustered in defiance of the weather—he was not among them. The crews of the two boats were questioned. All the first crew could say, was that they had pulled away from the wreck when the rush into their boat took place, and that they knew nothing of who they let in or who they kept out. All the second crew could say was, that they had brought back to the yacht every living soul left by the first boat on the deck of the timber ship. There was no blaming any body; but at the same time there was no resisting the fact that the man was missing.

"All through that day the storm, raging unabatedly, never gave us even the shadow of a chance of returning and searching the wreck. The one hope for the yacht was to scud. Toward evening the gale, after having carried us to the southward of Madeira, began at last to break—the wind shifted again—and allowed us to bear up for the island. Early the next morning we got back into port. Mr. Blanchard and his daughter were taken ashore; the sailing-master accompanying them, and warning us that he should have something to say on his return which would nearly concern the whole crew.

"We were mustered on deck and addressed by the sailing-master as soon as he came on board again. He had Mr. Blanchard's orders to go back at once to the timber ship and to search for the missing man. We were bound to do this for his sake and for the sake of his wife, whose reason was despaired of by the doctors if something was not done to quiet her. We might be almost sure of finding the vessel still afloat, for her lading of timber would keep her above water as long as her hull held together. If the man was on board—living or dead—he must be found and brought back. And if the weather continued to moderate there was no reason why the men, with proper assistance, should not bring the ship back too, and (their master being quite willing) earn their share of the salvage with the officers of the yacht.

"Upon this the crew gave three cheers, and set to work forthwith to get the schooner to sea again. I was the only one of them who drew back from the enterprise. I told them the storm had upset me—I was ill, and wanted rest. They all looked me in the face as I passed through them on my way out of the yacht, but not a man of them spoke to me.

"I waited through that day at a tavern on the port for the first news from the wreck. It was brought toward nightfall by one of the pilot boats which had taken part in the enterprise for saving the abandoned ship. La Grace de Dieu had been discovered still floating, and the body of Ingleby had been found on board drowned in the cabin. At dawn the next morning the dead man was brought back by the yacht; and on the same day the funeral took place in the Protestant cemetery."

"Stop!" said the voice from the bed, before the reader could turn to a new leaf and begin the next paragraph.

There was a change in the room, and there were changes in the audience since Mr. Neal had last looked up from the narrative. A ray of sunshine was crossing the death-bed; and the child, overcome by drowsiness, lay peacefully asleep in the golden light. The father's countenance had altered visibly. Forced into action by the tortured mind, the muscles of the lower face, which had never moved yet, were moving distortedly now. Warned by the damps gathering heavily on his forehead the doctor had risen to revive the sinking man. On the other side of the bed the wife's chair stood empty. At the moment when her husband had interrupted the reading she had drawn back behind the bed-head out of his sight. Supporting herself against the wall she stood there in hiding, her eyes fastened in hungering suspense on the manuscript in Mr. Neal's hand.

In a minute more the silence was broken again by Mr. Armadale.

"Where is she?" he asked, looking angrily at his wife's empty chair. The doctor pointed to the place. She had no choice but to come forward. She came slowly and stood before him.

"You promised to go when I told you," he said. "Go now."

Mr. Neal tried hard to control his hand as it kept his place between the leaves of the manuscript, but it trembled in spite of him. A suspicion which had been slowly forcing itself on his mind while he was reading became a certainty when he heard those words. From one revelation to another the letter had gone on until it had now reached the brink of a last disclosure to come. At that brink the dying man had predetermined to silence the reader's voice before he had permitted his wife to hear the narrative read. There was the secret which the son was to know in after-years, and which the mother was never to approach. From that resolution his wife's tenderest pleadings had never moved him an inch—and now, from his own lips, his wife knew it.

She made him no answer. She stood there and looked at him; looked her last entreaty—perhaps her last farewell. His eyes gave her back no answering glance: they wandered from her mercilessly to the sleeping boy. She turned speechless from the bed. Without a look at the child—without a word to the two strangers breathlessly watching her—she kept the promise she had given, and in dead silence left the room.

There was something in the manner of her departure which shook the self-possession of both the men who witnessed it. When the door closed on her they recoiled instinctively from advancing farther in the dark. The doctor's reluctance was the first to express itself. He attempted to obtain the patient's permission to withdraw until the letter was completed. The patient refused.

Mr. Neal spoke next at greater length and to more serious purpose.

"The doctor is accustomed in his profession," he began, "and I am accustomed in mine, to have the secrets of others placed in our keeping. But it is my duty, before we go farther, to ask if you really understand the extraordinary position which we now occupy toward one another. You have just excluded Mrs. Armadale, before our own eyes, from a place in your confidence. And you are now offering that same place to two men who are total strangers to you."

"Yes," said Mr. Armadale—"because you are strangers."

Few as the words were, the inference to be drawn from them was not of a nature to set distrust at rest. Mr. Neal put it plainly into words.

"You are in urgent need of my help and of the doctor's help," he said. "Am I to understand (so long as you secure our assistance) that the impression which the closing passages of this letter may produce on us is a matter of indifference to you?"

"Yes. I don't spare you. I don't spare myself. I do spare my wife."

"You force me to a conclusion, Sir, which is a very serious one," said Mr. Neal. "If I am to finish this letter under your dictation, I must claim permission—having read aloud the greater part of it already—to read aloud what remains, in the hearing of this gentleman, as a witness."

"Read it."

Gravely doubting, the doctor resumed his chair. Gravely doubting, Mr. Neal turned the leaf, and read the next words:

"There is more to tell before I can leave the dead man to his rest. I have described the finding of his body. But I have not described the circumstances under which he met his death.

"He was known to have been on deck when the yacht's boats were seen approaching the wreck; and he was afterward missed in the confusion caused by the panic of the crew. At that time the water was five feet deep in the cabin, and was rising fast. There was little doubt of his having gone down into that water of his own accord. The discovery of his wife's jewel-box, close under him, on the floor, explained his presence in the cabin. He was known to have seen help approaching, and it was quite likely that he had thereupon gone below to make an effort at saving the box. It was less probable—though it might still have been inferred—that his death was the result of some accident in diving, which had for the moment deprived him of his senses. But a discovery made by the yacht's crew pointed straight to a conclusion which struck the men, one and all, with the same horror. When the course of their search brought them to the cabin, they found the scuttle bolted, and the door locked on the outside. Had some one closed the cabin, not knowing he was there? Setting the panic-stricken condition of the crew out of the question, there was no motive for closing the cabin before leaving the wreck. But one other conclusion remained. Had some murderous hand purposely locked the man in, and left him to drown as the water rose over him?

"Yes. A murderous hand had locked him in and left him to drown. That hand was mine."

The Scotchman started up from the table; the doctor shrank from the bedside. The two looked at the dying wretch, mastered by the same loathing, chilled by the same dread. He lay there, with his child's head on his breast; abandoned by the sympathies of man, accursed by the justice of God—he lay there, in the isolation of Cain, and looked back at them.

At the moment when the two men rose to their feet the door leading into the next room was shaken heavily on the outer side, and a sound like the sound of a fall, striking dull on their ears, silenced them both. Standing nearest to the door, the doctor opened it, passed through, and closed it instantly. Mr. Neal turned his back on the bed, and waited the event in silence. The sound, which had failed to awaken the child, had failed also to attract the father's notice. His own words had taken him far from all that was passing at his death-bed. His helpless body was back on the wreck, and the ghost of his lifeless hand was turning the lock of the cabin door.

A bell rang in the next room—eager voices talked; hurried footsteps moved in it—an interval passed, and the doctor returned. "Was she listening?" whispered Mr. Neal, in German. "The women are restoring her," the doctor whispered back. "She has heard it all. In God's name, what are we to do next?" Before it was possible to reply Mr. Armadale spoke. The doctor's return had roused him to a sense of present things.

"Go on," he said, as if nothing had happened.

"I refuse to meddle further with your infamous secret," returned Mr. Neal. "You are a murderer on your own confession. If that letter is to be finished, don't ask me to hold the pen for you."

"You gave me your promise," was the reply, spoken with the same immovable self-possession. "You must write for me, or break your word."

For the moment Mr. Neal was silenced. There the man lay—sheltered from the execration of his fellow-creatures under the shadow of Death—beyond the reach of all human condemnation, beyond the dread of all mortal laws; sensitive to nothing but his one last resolution to finish the letter addressed to his son.

Mr. Neal drew the doctor aside. "A word with you," he said, in German. "Do you persist in asserting that he may be speechless before we can send to Stuttgart?"

"Look at his lips," said the doctor, "and judge for yourself."

His lips answered for him: the reading of the narrative had left its mark on them already. A distortion at the corners of his mouth, which had been barely noticeable when Mr. Neal entered the room, was plainly visible now. His slow articulation labored more and more painfully with every word he uttered. The position was emphatically a terrible one. After a moment more of hesitation Mr. Neal made a last attempt to withdraw from it.

"Now my eyes are open," he said, sternly, "do you dare hold me to an engagement which you forced on me blindfold?"

"No," answered Mr. Armadale. "I leave you to break your word."

The look which accompanied that reply stung the Scotchman's pride to the quick. When he spoke next, he spoke seated in his former place at the table.

"No man ever yet said of me that I broke my word," he retorted, angrily; "and not even you shall say it of me now. Mind this! If you hold me to my promise I hold you to my condition. I have reserved my freedom of action, and I warn you I will use it at my own sole discretion as soon as I am released from the sight of you."

"Remember he is dying," pleaded the doctor, gently.

"Take your place, Sir," said Mr. Neal, pointing to the empty chair. "What remains to be read I will only read in your hearing. What remains to be written I will only write in your presence. You brought me here. I have a right to insist—and I do insist—on your remaining as a witness to the last."

The doctor accepted his position without remonstrance. Mr. Neal returned to the manuscript, and read what remained of it uninterrupted to the end:

"Without a word in my own defense I have acknowledged my guilt. Without a word in my own defense I will reveal how the crime was committed.

"No thought of him was in my mind when I saw his wife insensible on the deck of the timber ship. I did my part in lowering her safely into the boat. Then, and not till then, I felt the thought of him coming back. In the confusion that prevailed while the men of the yacht were forcing the men of the ship to wait their time I had an opportunity of searching for him unobserved. I stepped back from the bulwark, not knowing whether he was away in the first boat, or whether he was still on board—I stepped back, and saw him mount the cabin stairs empty-handed, with the water dripping from him. After looking eagerly toward the boat (without noticing me), he saw there was time to spare before the crew were taken off. 'Once more!' he said to himself—and disappeared again, to make a last effort at recovering the jewel-box. The devil at my elbow whispered, 'Don't shoot him like a man: drown him like a dog!' He was under water when I bolted the scuttle. But his head rose to the surface before I could close the cabin door. I looked at him, and he looked at me—and I locked the door in his face. The next minute I was back among the last men left on deck. The minute after it was too late to repent. The storm was threatening us with destruction, and the boat's crew were pulling for their lives from the ship.

"My son! I have pursued you from my grave with a confession which my love might have spared you. Read on, and you will know why.

"I will say nothing of my sufferings; I will plead for no mercy to my memory. There is a strange sinking at my heart, a strange trembling in my hand, while I write these lines, which warns me to hasten to the end. I left the island without daring to look for the last time at the woman whom I had lost so miserably, whom I had injured so vilely. When I left the whole weight of the suspicion roused by the manner of Ingleby's death rested on the crew of the French vessel. No motive for the supposed murder could be brought home to any of them—but they were known to be, for the most part, outlawed ruffians capable of any crime, and they were suspected and examined accordingly. It was not till afterward that I heard by accident of the suspicion shifting round at last to me. The widow alone recognized the vague description given of the strange man who had made one of the yacht's crew, and who had disappeared the day afterward. The widow alone knew, from that time forth, why her husband had been murdered, and who had done the deed. When she made that discovery a false report of my death had been previously circulated in the island. Perhaps I was indebted to the report for my immunity from all legal proceedings—perhaps (no eye but Ingleby's having seen me lock the cabin door) there was not evidence enough to justify an inquiry—perhaps the widow shrank from the disclosures which must have followed a public charge against me, based on her own bare suspicion of the truth. However it might be, the crime which I had committed unseen has remained a crime unpunished from that time to this.

"I left Madeira for the West Indies in disguise. The first news that met me when the ship touched at Barbadoes was the news of my mother's death. I had no heart to return to the old scenes. The prospect of living at home in solitude, with the torment of my own guilty remembrances gnawing at me day and night, was more than I had the courage to confront. Without landing, or discovering myself to any one on shore, I went on as far as the ship would take me—to the island of Trinidad.

"At that place I first saw your mother. It was my duty to tell her the truth—and I treacherously kept my secret. It was my duty to spare her the hopeless sacrifice of her freedom and her happiness to such an existence as mine—and I did her the injury of marrying her. If she is alive when you read this, grant her the mercy of still concealing the truth. The one atonement I can make to her is to keep her unsuspecting to the last of the man she has married. Pity her, as I have pitied her. Let this letter be a sacred confidence between father and son.

"The time when you were born was the time when my health began to give way. Some months afterward, in the first days of my recovery, you were brought to me, and I was told that you had been christened during my illness. Your mother had done as other loving mothers do—she had christened her first-born by his father's name. You, too, were Allan Armadale. Even in that early time—even while I was happily ignorant of what I have discovered since—my mind misgave me when I looked at you and thought of that fatal name.

"As soon as I could be moved my presence was required at my estates in Barbadoes. It crossed my mind—wild as the idea may appear to you—to renounce the condition which compelled my son as well as myself to take the Armadale name, or lose the succession to the Armadale property. But, even in those days, the rumor of a contemplated emancipation of the slaves—the emancipation which is now close at hand—was spreading widely in the colony. No man could tell how the value of West Indian property might be affected if that threatened change ever took place. No man could tell—if I gave you back my own paternal name, and left you without other provision in the future than my own paternal estate—how you might one day miss the broad Armadale acres, or to what future penury I might be blindly condemning your mother and yourself. Mark how the fatalities gathered one on the other! Mark how your Christian name came to you, how your surname held to you, in spite of me!

"My health had improved in my old home; but it was for a time only. I sank again, and the doctors ordered me to Europe. Avoiding England (why, you may guess), I took my passage, with you and your mother, for France. From France we passed into Italy. We lived here; we lived there. It was useless. Death had got me; and Death followed me, go where I might. I bore it, for I had an alleviation to turn to which I had not deserved. You may shrink in horror from the very memory of me now. In those days you comforted me. The only warmth I still felt at my heart was the warmth you brought to it. My last glimpses of happiness in this world were the glimpses given me by my infant son.

"We removed from Italy, and went next to Lausanne—the place from which I am now writing to you. The post of this morning has brought me news, later and fuller than any I had received thus far, of the widow of the murdered man. The letter lies before me while I write. It comes from a friend of my early days, who has seen her, and spoken to her—who has been the first to inform her that the report of my death in Madeira was false. He writes, at a loss to account for the violent agitation which she showed on hearing that I was still alive, that I was married, and that I had an infant son. He asks me if I can explain it. He speaks in terms of sympathy for her—a young and beautiful woman, buried in the retirement of a fishing village on the Devonshire coast; her father dead; her family estranged from her, in merciless disapproval of her marriage. He writes words which might have cut me to the heart but for a closing passage in his letter, which seized my whole attention the instant I came to it, and which has forced from me the narrative which these pages contain.

"I now know what never even entered my mind as a suspicion till the letter reached me.

I now know that the widow of the man whose death lies at my door has borne a posthumous child. That child is a boy—a year older than my own son. Secure in her belief in my death his mother has done what my son's mother did: she has christened her child by his father's name. Again, in the second generation, there are two Allan Armadales as there were in the first. After working its deadly mischief with the fathers the fatal resemblance of names has descended to work its deadly mischief with the sons.

"Guiltless minds may see nothing thus far but the result of a series of events which could lead no other way. I—with that man's life to answer for—I, going down into my grave, with my crime unpunished and unatoned, see what no guiltless minds can discern. I see danger in the future, begotten of the danger in the past—treachery that is the offspring of his treachery, and crime that is the child of my crime. Is the dread that now shakes me to the soul a phantom raised by the superstition of a dying man? I look into the Book which all Christendom venerates, and the Book tells me that the sin of the father shall be visited on the child. I look out into the world, and I see the living witnesses round me to that terrible truth. I see the vices which have contaminated the father descending and contaminating the child; I see the shame which has disgraced the father's name descending and disgracing the child's. I look in on myself—and I see My Crime ripening again for the future in the self-same circumstance which first sowed the seeds of it in the past, and descending, in inherited contamination of Evil, from me to my son."

At those lines the writing ended. There the stroke had struck him, and the pen had dropped from his hand.

He knew the place; he remembered the words. At the instant when the reader's voice stopped he looked eagerly at the doctor. "I have got what comes next in my mind," he said, with slower and slower articulation. "Help me to speak it."

The doctor administered a stimulant, and signed to Mr. Neal to give him time. After a little delay the flame of the sinking spirit leaped up in his eyes once more. Resolutely struggling with his failing speech, he summoned the Scotchman to take the pen; and pronounced the closing sentences of the narrative, as his memory gave them back to him, one by one, in these words:

"Despise my dying conviction if you will—but grant me, I solemnly implore you, one last request. My son! the only hope I have left for you hangs on a Great Doubt—the doubt whether we are, or are not, the masters of our own destinies. It may be that mortal free-will can conquer mortal fate; and that going, as we all do, inevitably to death, we go inevitably to nothing that is before death. If this be so, indeed, respect—though you respect nothing else

—the warning which I give you from my grave. Never, to your dying day, let any living soul approach you who is associated, directly or indirectly, with the crime which your father has committed. Avoid the widow of the man I killed—if the widow still lives. Avoid the maid whose wicked hand smoothed the way to the marriage—if the maid is still in her service. And more than all, avoid the man who bears the same name as your own. Offend your best benefactor, if that benefactor's influence has connected you one with the other. Desert the woman who loves you, if that woman is a link between you and him. Hide yourself from him under an assumed name. Put the mountains and the seas between you. Be ungrateful; be unforgiving; be all that is most repellant to your own gentler nature rather than live under the same roof and breathe the same air with that man. Never let the two Allan Armadales meet in this world: never, never, never!

"There lies the way by which you may escape—if any way there be. Take it, if you prize your own innocence and your own happiness, through all your life to come!

"I have done. If I could have trusted any weaker influence than the influence of this confession to incline you to my will, I would have spared you the disclosure which these pages contain. You are lying on my breast, sleeping the innocent sleep of a child, while a stranger's hand writes these words for you as they fall from my lips. Think what the strength of my conviction must be, when I can find the courage, on my death-bed, to darken all your young life at its outset with the shadow of your father's crime. Think—and be warned. Think—and forgive me if you can."

There it ended. Those were the father's last words to the son.

Inexorably faithful to his forced duty, Mr. Neal laid aside the pen, and read over aloud the lines he had just written. "Is there more to add!" he asked, with his pitilessly steady voice. There was no more to add.

Mr. Neal folded the manuscript, inclosed it in a sheet of paper, and sealed it with Mr. Armadale's own seal. "The address," he said, with his merciless business formality. "To Allan Armadale, Junior," he wrote, as the words were dictated from the bed. "Care of Godfrey Hammick, Esq., Offices of Messrs. Hammick and Ridge, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London." Having written the address, he waited and considered for a moment. "Is your executor to open this?" he asked.

"No! he is to give it to my son when my son is of an age to understand it."

"In that case," pursued Mr. Neal, with all his wits in remorseless working order, "I will add a dated note to the address, repeating your own words as you have just spoken them, and explaining the circumstances under which my handwriting appears on the document." He wrote the note in the briefest and plainest terms —read it over aloud as he had read over what went before—signed his name and address at the end, and made the doctor sign next, as witness of the proceedings, and as medical evidence of the condition in which Mr. Armadale then lay. This done, he placed the letter in a second inclosure, sealed it as before, and directed it to Mr. Hammick, with the superscription of “private” added to the address.

“Do you insist on my posting this?” he asked, rising with the letter in his hand.

“Give him time to think,” said the doctor. “For the child’s sake give him time to think. A minute may change him.”

“I will give him five minutes,” answered Mr. Neal, placing his watch on the table, implacably just to the very last.

They waited, both looking attentively at Mr. Armadale. The signs of change which had appeared in him already were multiplying fast. The movement which continued mental agitation had communicated to the muscles of his face was beginning, under the same dangerous influence, to spread downward. His once helpless hands lay still no longer; they struggled pitifully on the bed-clothes. At sight of that warning token the doctor turned with a gesture of alarm, and beckoned Mr. Neal to come nearer. “Put the question at once,” he said; “if you let the five minutes pass you may be too late.”

Mr. Neal approached the bed. He, too, noticed the movement of the hands. “Is that a bad sign?” he asked.

The doctor bent his head gravely. “Put your question at once,” he repeated, “or you may be too late.”

Mr. Neal held the letter before the eyes of the dying man. “Do you know what this is?”

“My letter.”

“Do you insist on my posting it?”

He mastered his failing speech for the last time, and gave the answer.

“Yes!”

Mr. Neal moved to the door with the letter in his hand. The German followed him a few steps, opened his lips to plead for a longer delay, met the Scotchman’s inexorable eye, and drew back again in silence. The door closed and parted them without a word having passed on either side.

The doctor went back to the bed, and whispered to the sinking man, “Let me call him back; there is time to stop him yet!” It was useless. No answer came: nothing showed that he heeded, or even heard. His eyes wandered from the child, rested for a moment on his own struggling hand, and looked up entreatingly in the compassionate face that bent over him. The doctor lifted the hand—paused—followed the father’s longing eyes back to the child—and, interpreting his last wish, moved the hand gently toward the boy’s head. The hand touched it, and trembled violently. In another instant the trembling seized on the arm, and spread over the whole upper part of the body. The face turned from pale to red; from red to purple; from purple to pale again. Then the toiling hands lay still, and the shifting color changed no more.

The window of the next room was open when the doctor entered it from the death-chamber with the child in his arms. He looked out as he passed by, and saw Mr. Neal in the street below, slowly returning to the inn.

“Where is the letter?” he asked.

Three words sufficed for the Scotchman’s answer—“In the post.”

THE END OF THE FIRST BOOK.

THE BAY FIGHT.

(Mobile Bay, August 5, 1864.)

BY THE AUTHOR OF “LYRICS OF A DAY,” “THE RIVER FIGHT,” ETC.

“On the forecastle, Ulf the Red
Watched the lashing of the ships—
‘If the Serpent lie so far ahead,
We shall have hard work of it here,’
Said he.”

THREE days through sapphire seas we sailed,
The steady Trade blew strong and free,
The Northern Light his banners paled,
The Ocean Stream our channels wet,
We rounded low Canaveral’s lee,
And passed the isles of emerald set
In blue Bahama’s turquoise sea.

By reef and shoal obscurely mapped,
And hauntings of the gray sea-wolf,
The palmy Western Key lay lapped
In the warm washing of the Gulf.

But weary to the hearts of all
The burning glare, the barren reach
Of Santa Rosa’s withered beach,
And Pensacola’s ruined wall.

And weary was the long patrol,
The thousand miles of shapeless strand,
From Brazos to San Blas that roll
Their drifting dunes of desert sand.

Yet, coast-wise as we cruised or lay,
The land-breeze still at nightfall bore,
By beach and fortress-guarded bay,
Sweet odors from the enemy’s shore,

Fresh from the forest solitudes,
Unchallenged of his sentry lines—
The bursting of his cypress buds,
And the warm fragrance of his pines.

Ah, never braver bark and crew,
Nor bolder Flag a foe to dare,
Had left a wake on ocean blue
Since Lion-Heart sailed Trenc-le-mer!

But little gain by that dark ground
Was ours, save, sometime, freer breath
For friend or brother strangely found,
’Scaped from the drear domain of death.

And little venture for the bold,
Or laurel for our valiant Chief,
Save some blockaded British thief,
Full fraught with murder in his hold,

Caught unawares at ebb or flood—
Or dull bombardment, day by day,
With fort and earth-work, far away,
Low couched in sullen leagues of mud.

A weary time—but to the strong
The day at last, as ever, came;
And the volcano, laid so long,
Leaped forth in thunder and in flame!

“Man your starboard battery!”
Kimberly shouted—
The ship, with her hearts of oak,
Was going, mid roar and smoke,
On to victory!
None of us doubted,
No, not our dying—
Farragut's Flag was flying!

Gaines growled low on our left,
Morgan roared on our right—
Before us, gloomy and fell,
With breath like the fume of hell,
Lay the Dragon of iron shell,
Driven at last to the fight!

Ha, old ship! do they thrill,
The brave two hundred scars
You got in the River-Wars?
That were leeches with clamorous skill
(Surgery savage and hard,) Splinted with bolt and beam,
Probed in scarfing and seam,
Rudely linted and tarred
With oakum and boiling pitch,
And sutured with splice and hitch,
At the Brooklyn Navy-Yard!

Our lofty spars were down,
To bide the battle's frown,
(Went of old renown)—
But every ship was drest
In her bravest and her best,
As if for a July day;
Sixty flags and three,
As we floated up the bay—
Every peak and mast-head flew
The brave Red, White, and Blue—
We were eighteen ships that day.

With hawsers strong and taut,
The weaker lashed to port,
On we sailed, two by two—
That if either a bolt should feel
Crash through caldron or wheel,
Fin of bronze or sinew of steel,
Her mate might bear her through.

Forging boldly ahead,
The great Flag-Ship led,
Grandest of sights!
On her lofty mizen flew
Our Leader's dauntless Blue,
That had waved o'er twenty fights—
So we went, with the first of the tide,
Slowly, mid the roar
Of the rebel guns ashore,
And the thunder of each full broadside.

Ah, how poor the prate
Of statute and state,
We once held with these fellows—
Here, on the flood's pale-green,
Hark how he bellows,
Each bluff old Sea-Lawyer!
Talk to them, Dahlgren,
Parrott, and Sawyer!

On, in the whirling shade
Of the cannon's sulphury breath,
We drew to the Line of Death
That our devilish Foe had laid—
Meshed in a horrible net,
And baited villainous well,
Right in our path were set
Three hundred traps of hell!

And there, O sight forlorn!
There, while the cannon
Hurtled and thundered—
(Ah what ill raven Flapped o'er the ship that morn!)—
Caught by the under-death,
In the drawing of a breath,
Down went dauntless Craven,
He and his hundred!

A moment we saw her turret,
A little heel she gave,
And a thin white spray went o'er her,
Like the crest of a breaking wave—
In that great iron coffin,
The channel for their grave,
The fort their monument,
(Seen afar in the offing,)
Ten fathom deep lie Craven
And the bravest of our brave.

Then, in that deadly track,
A little the ships held back,
Closing up in their stations—
There are minutes that fix the fate
Of battles and of nations,
(Christening the generations)—
When valor were all too late,
If a moment's doubt be harbored—
From the main-top, bold and brief,
Came the word of our grand old Chief—
“Go on!”—’twas all he said—
Our helm was put to starboard,
And the Hartford passed ahead.

Ahead lay the Tennessee,
On our starboard bow he lay,
With his mail-clad consorts three,
(The rest had run up the Bay)—
There he was, belching flame from his bow,
And the steam from his throat's abyss
Was a Dragon's maddened hiss—
In sooth a most cursed craft!—
In a sullen ring, at bay,
By the Middle Ground they lay,
Raking us, fore and aft.

Trust me, our berth was hot,
Ah, wickedly well they shot—
How their death-bolts howled and stung!
And the water-batteries played
With their deadly cannonade
Till the air around us rung;
So the battle raged and roared—
Ah, had you been aboard
To have seen the fight we made!

How they leaped, the tongues of flame,
From the cannon's fiery lip!
How the broadsides, deck and frame,
Shook the great ship!

And how the enemy's shell
Came crashing, heavy and oft,
Clouds of splinters flying aloft
And falling in oaken showers—
But ah, the pluck of the crew!
Had you stood on that deck of ours,
You had seen what men may do.

Still, as the fray grew louder,
Boldly they worked and well—
Steadily came the powder,
Steadily came the shell.
And if tackle or truck found hurt,
Quickly they cleared the wreck—
And the dead were laid to port,
All a-row, on our deck.

Never a nerve that failed,
Never a cheek that paled,
Not a tinge of gloom or pallor—
There was bold Kentucky's grit,
And the old Virginian valor,
And the daring Yankee wit.

There were blue eyes from turfy Shannon,
There were black orbs from palmy Niger—
But there, alongside the cannon,
Each man fought like a tiger!

A little, once, it looked ill,
Our consort began to burn—
They quenched the flames with a will,
But our men were falling still,
And still the fleet was astern.

Right abreast of the Fort
In an awful shroud they lay,
Broadsides thundering away,
And lightning from every port—
Scene of glory and dread!
A storm-cloud all aglow
With flashes of fiery red—
The thunder raging below,
And the forest of flags o'erhead!

So grand the hurly and roar,
So fiercely their broadsides blazed,
The regiments fighting ashore
Forgot to fire as they gazed.

There, to silence the Foe,
Moving grimly and slow,
They loomed in that deadly wreath,
Where the darkest batteries frowned—
Death in the air all round,
And the black torpedoes beneath!

And now, as we looked ahead,
All for'ard, the long white deck
Was growing a strange dull red—
But soon, as once and agen
Fore and aft we sped,
(The firing to guide or check),
You could hardly choose but tread
On the ghastly human wreck (Dreadful gobbet and shred
That a minute ago were men!)

Red, from main-mast to bitts!
Red, on bulwark and wale—
Red, by combing and hatch—
Red, o'er netting and rail!

And ever, with steady con,
The ship forged slowly by—
And ever the crew fought on,
And their cheers rang loud and high.

Grand was the sight to see
How by their guns they stood,
Right in front of our dead
Fighting square abreast—
Each brawny arm and chest
All spotted with black and red,
Chrism of fire and blood!

Worth our watch, dull and sterile,
Worth all the weary time—
Worth the woe and the peril,
To stand in that strait sublime!

Fear? A forgotten form!
Death? A dream of the eyes!
We were atoms in God's great storm
That roared through the angry skies.

One only doubt was ours,
One only dread we knew—
Could the day that dawned so well
Go down for the Darker Powers?
Would the fleet get through?
And ever the shot and shell
Came with the howl of hell,
The splinter-clouds rose and fell,
And the long line of corpses grew—
Would the fleet win through?

They are men that never will fail
(How aforetime they've fought!)
But Murder may yet prevail—
They may sink as Craven sank.
Therewith one hard fierce thought,
Burning on heart and lip,
Ran like fire through the ship—
Fight her, to the last plank!

A dimmer Renown might strike
If Death lay square alongside—
But the Old Flag has no like,
She must fight, whatever betide—
When the War is a tale of old,
And this day's story is told,
They shall hear how the Hartford died!

But as we ranged ahead,
And the leading ships worked in,
Losing their hope to win
The enemy turned and fled—
And one seeks a shallow reach,
And another, winged in her flight,
Our mate, brave Jouett, brings in—
And one, all torn in the fight,
Runs for a wreck on the beach,
Where her flames soon fire the night.

And the Ram, when well up the Bay,
And we looked that our stems should meet,
(He had us fair for a prey,)
Shifting his helm midway,
Sheered off, and ran for the fleet—
There, without skulking or sham,
He fought them, gun for gun,
And ever he sought to ram,
But could finish never a one.

From the first of the iron shower
Till we sent our parting shell,
'Twas just one savage hour
Of the roar and the rage of hell.

With the lessening smoke and thunder,
Our glasses around we aim—
What is that burning yonder?
Our Philippi—aground and in flame!

Below, 'twas still all a-roar,
As the ships went by the shore,
But the fire of the Fort had slack'd, (So fierce their volleys had been)—
And now, with a mighty din,
The whole fleet came grandly in,
Though sorely battered and wracked.

So, up the Bay we ran,
The Flag to port and ahead—
And a pitying rain began
To wash the lips of our dead.

A league from the Fort we lay,
And deemed that the end must lag—
When lo! looking down the Bay,
There flaunted the Rebel Rag—
The Ram is again underway,
And heading dead for the Flag!

Steering up with the stream,
Boldly his course he lay,
Though the fleet all answered his fire,
And, as he still drew nigher,
Ever on bow and beam
Our Monitors pounded away—
How the Chicasaw hammered away!

Quickly breasting the wave,
Eager the prize to win,
First of us all the brave
Monongahela went in Under full head of steam—
Twice she struck him abeam,
Till her stem was a sorry work.
(She might have run on a rag!)
The Lackawana hit fair,
He flung her aside like cork,
And still he held for the Flag.

High in the mizen shroud,
(Lest the smoke his sight o'erwhelm.)
Our Admiral's voice rang loud,
"Hard-a-starboard your helm!
Starboard! and run him down!"
Starboard it was—and so,
Like a black squall's lifting frown,
Our mighty bow bore down
On the iron beak of the Foe.

We stood on the deck together,
Men that had looked on death
In battle and stormy weather—
Yet a little we held our breath,
When, with the hush of death,
The great, ships drew together.

Our Captain strode to the bow,
Drayton, courtly and wise,
Kindly cynic, and wise,
(You hardly had known him now,
The flame of fight in his eyes!)—
His brave heart eager to feel
How the oak would tell on the steel!

But, as the space grew short,
A little he seemed to shun us,
Out peered a form grim and lanky,
And a voice yelled—"Hard-a-port!
Hard-a-port!—here's the damned Yankee Coming right down on us!"

He sheered, but the ships ran foul
With a gnarring shudder and growl—
He gave us a deadly gun;
But, as he passed in his pride,
(Rasping right alongside!)

The Old Flag, in thunder-tones,
Poured in her port broadside,
Rattling his iron hide,
And cracking his timber bones!

Just then, at speed on the Foe,
With her bow all weathered and brown,
The great Lackawana came down
Full tilt, for another blow—
We were forging ahead,
She reversed—but, for all our pains,
Rammed the old Hartford, instead,
Just for'ard the mizen chains!

Ah! how the masts did buckle and bend,
And the stout hull ring and reel,
As she took us right on end!
(Vain were engine and wheel,
She was under full steam)—
With the roar of a thunder-stroke
Her two thousand tons of oak Brought up on us, right abeam!

A wreck, as it looked, we lay—(Rib and plank-shear gave way To the stroke of that giant wedge!)
Here, after all, we go—
The old ship is gone!—ah, no,
But cut to the water's edge.

Never mind then—at him again!
His flurry now can't last long;
He'll never again see land—
Try that on him, Marchand!
On him again, brave Strong!

Heading square at the hulk,
Full on his beam we bore;
But the spine of the huge Sea-Hog Lay on the tide like a log,
He vomited flame no more.

By this, he had found it hot—
Half the fleet, in an angry ring,
Closed round the hideous Thing,
Hammering with solid shot,
And bearing down, bow on bow—
He has but a minute to choose;
Life or renown?—which now
Will the Rebel Admiral lose?

Cruel, haughty, and cold,
He ever was strong and bold—
Shall he shrink from a wooden stem?
He will think of that brave band
He sank in the Cumberland—
Aye, he will sink like them.

Nothing left but to fight
Boldly his last sea-fight!
Can he strike? By Heaven, 'tis true!
Down comes the traitor Blue,
And up goes the captive White!

Up went the White! Ah then,
The hurrahs that, once and agen,
Rang from three thousand men,
All flushed and savage with fight!
Our dead lay cold and stark,
But our dying, down in the dark,
Answered as best they might—

Lifting their poor lost arms,
And cheering for God and Right!

Ended the mighty noise,
Thunder of forts and ships.
Down we went to the hold—
O, our dear dying boys!
How we pressed their poor brave lips,
(Ah, so pallid and cold!)
And held their hands to the last (Those that had hands to hold).

Still thee, O woman heart!
(So strong an hour ago)—
If the idle tears must start,
'Tis not in vain they flow.

They died, our children dear,
On the drear berth deck they died—
Do not think of them here—
Even now their footsteps near
The immortal, tender sphere—(Land of love and cheer!
Home of the Crucified!)

And the glorious deed survives.
Our threescore, quiet and cold,
Lie thus, for a myriad lives
And treasure-millions untold—(Labor of poor men's lives,
Hunger of weans and wives,
Such is war-wasted gold.)

Our ship and her fame to-day
Shall float on the storied Stream,
When mast and shroud have crumbled away,
And her long white deck is a dream.

One daring leap in the dark,
Three mortal hours, at the most—
And hell lies stiff and stark
On a hundred leagues of coast.

For the mighty Gulf is ours—
The Bay is lost and won,
An Empire is lost and won!
Land, if thou yet hast flowers,
Twine them in one more wreath
Of tenderest white and red,
(Twin buds of glory and death!)
For the brows of our brave dead—
For thy Navy's noblest Son.

Joy, O Land, for thy sons,
Victors by flood and field!
The traitor walls and guns
Have nothing left but to yield—
(Even now they surrender!)

And the ships shall sail once more,
And the cloud of war sweep on
To break on the cruel shore—
But Craven is gone,
He and his hundred are gone.

The flags flutter up and down,
At sunrise and twilight dim,
The cannons menace and frown—
But never again for him,
Him and the hundred.

U.S. Flag-Ship Hartford, Mobile Bay, August, 1864.

The Dahlgrens are dumb,
Dumb are the mortars—
Never more shall the drum
Beat to colors and quarters—
The great guns are silent.

O brave heart and loyal!
Let all your colors dip—
Mourn him, proud Ship!
From main deck to royal.
God rest our Captain,
Rest our lost hundred.

Droop, flag and pennant!
What is your pride for?
Heaven, that he died for,
Rest our Lieutenant,
Rest our brave threescore.

O Mother Land! this weary life
We led, we lead, is 'long of thee;
Thine the strong agony of strife,
And thine the lonely sea.

Thine the long decks all slaughter-sprent,
The weary rows of cots that lie
With wrecks of strong men, marred and rent,
'Neath Pensacola's sky.

And thine the iron caves and dens
Wherein the flame our war-fleet drives;
The fiery vaults, whose breath is men's
Most dear and precious lives.

Ah, ever, when with storm sublime
Dread Nature clears our murky air,
Thus in the crash of falling crime
Some lesser guilt must share.

Full red the furnace fires must glow
That melt the ore of mortal kind:
The Mills of God are grinding slow,
But ah, how close they grind!

To-day the Dahlgren and the drum
Are dread Apostles of his Name;
His Kingdom here can only come
By chrism of blood and flame.

Be strong; already slants the gold
Athwart these wild and stormy skies;
From out this blackened waste, behold,
What happy homes shall rise!

But see thou well no traitor gloze,
No striking hands with Death and Shame,
Betray the sacred blood that flows
So freely for thy name.

And never fear a victor foe—
Thy children's hearts are strong and high;
Nor mourn too fondly—well they know
On deck or field to die.

Nor shalt thou want one willing breath,
Though, ever smiling round the brave,
The blue sea bear us on to death,
The green were one wide grave.

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

IN FOUR BOOKS.—BOOK THE SECOND. BIRDS OF A FEATHER.

CHAPTER IV.

CUPID PROMPTED.

TO use the cold language of the world, Mrs. Alfred Lammle rapidly improved the acquaintance of Miss Podsnap. To use the warm language of Mrs. Lammle, she and her sweet Georgiana soon became one: in heart, in mind, in sentiment, in soul.

Whenever Georgiana could escape from the thralldom of Podsnappery; could throw off the bed-clothes of the custard-colored phaeton, and get up; could shrink out of the range of her mother's rocking, and (so to speak) rescue her poor little frosty toes from being rocked over; she repaired to her friend, Mrs. Alfred Lammle. Mrs. Podsnap by no means objected. As a conscientiously "splendid woman," accustomed to overhear herself so denominated by elderly osteologists pursuing their studies in dinner society, Mrs. Podsnap could dispense with her daughter. Mr. Podsnap, for his part, on being informed where Georgiana was, swelled with patronage of the Lammles. That they, when unable to lay hold of him, should respectfully grasp at the hem of his mantle; that they, when they could not bask in the glory of him the sun, should take up with the pale reflected light of the watery young moon his daughter; appeared quite natural, becoming, and proper. It gave him a better opinion of the discretion of the Lammles than he had heretofore held, as showing that they appreciated the value of the connection. So, Georgiana repairing to her friend, Mr. Podsnap went out to dinner, and to dinner, and yet to dinner, arm in arm with Mrs. Podsnap: settling his obstinate head in his cravat and shirt-collar, much as if he were performing on the Pandean pipes, in his own honor, the triumphal march, See the conquering Podsnap comes, Sound the trumpets, beat the drums!

It was a trait in Mr. Podsnap's character (and in one form or other it will be generally seen to pervade the depths and shallows of Podsnappery), that he could not endure a hint of disparagement of any friend or acquaintance of his. "How dare you?" he would seem to say, in such a case. "What do you mean? I have licensed this person. This person has taken out my certificate. Through this person you strike at me, Podsnap the Great. And it is not that I particularly care for the person's dignity, but that I do most particularly care for Podsnap's." Hence, if any one in his presence had presumed to doubt the responsibility of the Lammles, he would have been mightily huffed. Not that any one did, for Veneering, M.P., was always the authority for their being very rich, and perhaps believed it. As indeed he might, if he chose, for any thing he knew of the matter.

Mr. and Mrs. Lammle's house in Sackville Street, Piccadilly, was but a temporary residence. It had done well enough, they informed their friends, for Mr. Lammle when a bachelor, but it would not do now. So they were always looking at palatial residences in the best situations, and always very nearly taking or buying one, but never quite concluding the bargain. Hereby they made for themselves a shining little reputation apart. People said, on seeing a vacant palatial residence, "The very thing for the Lammles!" and wrote to the Lammles about it, and the Lammles always went to look at it, but unfortunately it never exactly answered. In short, they suffered so many disappointments that they began to think it would be necessary to build a palatial residence. And hereby they made another shining reputation; many persons of their acquaintance becoming by anticipation dissatisfied with their own houses, and envious of the non-existent Lammle structure.

The handsome fittings and furnishings of the house in Sackville Street were piled thick and high over the skeleton up stairs, and if it ever whispered from under its load of upholstery, "Here I am in the closet!" it was to very few ears, and certainly never to Miss Podsnap's. What Miss Podsnap was particularly charmed with, next to the graces of her friend, was the happiness of her friend's married life. This was frequently their theme of conversation.

"I am sure," said Miss Podsnap, "Mr. Lammle is like a lover. At least I—I should think he was."

"Georgiana, darling!" said Mrs. Lammle, holding up a forefinger, "Take care!"

"Oh my goodness me!" exclaimed Miss Podsnap, reddening. "What have I said now?"

"Alfred, you know," hinted Mrs. Lammle, playfully shaking her head. "You were never to say Mr. Lammle any more, Georgiana."

"Oh! Alfred, then. I am glad it's no worse. I was afraid I had said something shocking. I am always saying something wrong to ma."

"To me, Georgiana dearest?"

"No, not to you; you are not ma. I wish you were."

Mrs. Lammle bestowed a sweet and loving smile upon her friend, which Miss Podsnap returned as she best could. They sat at lunch in Mrs. Lammle's own boudoir.

"And so, dearest Georgiana, Alfred is like your notion of a lover?"

"I don't say that, Sophronia," Georgiana replied, beginning to conceal her elbows. "I haven't any notion of a lover. The dreadful wretches that ma brings up at places to torment me are not lovers. I only mean that Mr.—”

“Again, dearest Georgiana?”

“That Alfred—”

“Sounds much better, darling.”

“—Loves you so. He always treats you with such delicate gallantry and attention. Now, don't he?”

“Truly, my dear,” said Mrs. Lammle, with a rather singular expression crossing her face. “I believe that he loves me fully as much as I love him.”

“Oh, what happiness!” exclaimed Miss Podsnap.

“But do you know, my Georgiana,” Mrs. Lammle resumed presently, “that there is something suspicious in your enthusiastic sympathy with Alfred's tenderness?”

“Good gracious no, I hope not!”

“Doesn't it rather suggest,” said Mrs. Lammle, archly, “that my Georgiana's little heart is—”

“Oh don't!” Miss Podsnap blushing brought her. “Please don't! I assure you, Sophronia, that I only praise Alfred because he is your husband and so fond of you.”

Sophronia's glance was as if a rather new light broke in upon her. It shaded off into a cool smile, as she said, with her eyes upon her lunch, and her eyebrows raised:

“You are quite wrong, my love, in your guess at my meaning. What I insinuated was, that my Georgiana's little heart was growing conscious of a vacancy.”

“No, no, no,” said Georgiana. “I wouldn't have any body say any thing to me in that way for I don't know how many thousand pounds.”

“In what way, my Georgiana?” inquired Mrs. Lammle, still smiling coolly, with her eyes upon her lunch, and her eyebrows raised.

“You know,” returned poor little Miss Podsnap. “I think I should go out of my mind, Sophronia, with vexation and shyness and detestation, if any body did. It's enough for me to see how loving you and your husband are. That's a different thing. I couldn't bear to have any thing of that sort going on with myself. I should beg and pray to—to have the person taken away and trampled upon.”

Ah! here was Alfred. Having stolen in unobserved, he playfully leaned on the back of Sophronia's chair, and, as Miss Podsnap saw him, put one of Sophronia's wandering locks to his lips, and waved a kiss from it toward Miss Podsnap.

“What is this about husbands and detestations?” inquired the captivating Alfred.

“Why, they say,” returned his wife, “that listeners never hear any good of themselves; though you—but pray how long have you been here, Sir?”

“This instant arrived, my own.”

“Then I may go on—though if you had been here but a moment or two sooner, you would have heard your praises sounded by Georgiana.”

“Only, if they were to be called praises at all, which I really don't think they were,” explained Miss Podsnap in a flutter, “for being so devoted to Sophronia.”

“Sophronia!” murmured Alfred. “My life!” and kissed her hand. In return for which she kissed his watch-chain.

“But it was not I who was to be taken away and trampled upon, I hope?” said Alfred, drawing a seat between them.

“Ask Georgiana, my soul,” replied his wife.

Alfred touchingly appealed to Georgiana.

“Oh, it was nobody,” replied Miss Podsnap. “It was nonsense.”

“But if you are determined to know, Mr. Inquisitive Pet, as I suppose you are,” said the happy and fond Sophronia, smiling, “it was any one who should venture to aspire to Georgiana.”

“Sophronia, my love,” remonstrated Mr. Lammle, becoming graver, “you are not serious?”

“Alfred, my love,” returned his wife, “I dare say Georgiana was not, but I am.”

“Now this,” said Mr. Lammle, “shows the accidental combinations that there are in things! Could you believe, my Ownest, that I came in here with the name of an aspirant to our Georgiana on my lips?”

“Of course I could believe, Alfred,” said Mrs. Lammle, “any thing that you told me.”

“You dear one! And I any thing that you told me.”

How delightful those interchanges, and the looks accompanying them! Now, if the skeleton up stairs had taken that opportunity, for instance, of calling out “Here I am, suffocating in the closet!”

“I give you my honor, my dear Sophronia—”

“And I know what that is, love,” said she.

“You do, my darling—that I came into the room all but uttering young Fledgeby's name. Tell Georgiana, dearest, about young Fledgeby.”

“Oh no, don't! Please don't!” cried Miss Podsnap, putting her fingers in her ears. “I'd rather not.”

Mrs. Lammle laughed in her gayest manner, and, removing her Georgiana's unresisting hands, and playfully holding them in her own at arms' length, sometimes near together and sometimes wide apart, went on:

“You must know, you dearly beloved little goose, that once upon a time there was a certain person called young Fledgeby. And this young Fledgeby, who was of an excellent family and rich, was known to two other certain persons, dearly attached to one another and called Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lammle. So this young Fledgeby, being one night at the play, there sees, with Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lammle, a certain heroine called—”

“No, don't say Georgiana Podsnap!” pleaded that young lady almost in tears. “Please don't. Oh do do do say somebody else! Not Georgiana Podsnap. Oh don't, don't, don't!”

"No other," said Mrs. Lammle, laughing airily, and, full of affectionate blandishments, opening and closing Georgiana's arms like a pair of compasses, "than my little Georgiana Podsnap. So this young Fledgeby goes to that Alfred Lammle and says—"

"Oh ple-e-ease don't!" cried Georgiana, as if the supplication were being squeezed out of her by powerful compression. "I so hate him for saying it!"

"For saying what, my dear?" laughed Mrs. Lammle.

"Oh, I don't know what he said," cried Georgiana, wildly, "but I hated him all the same for saying it."

"My dear," said Mrs. Lammle, always laughing in her most captivating way, "the poor young fellow only says that he is stricken all of a heap."

"Oh, what shall I ever do!" interposed Georgiana. "Oh my goodness what a Fool he must be!"

"—And implores to be asked to dinner, and to make a fourth at the play another time. And so he dines to-morrow and goes to the Opera with us. That's all. Except, my dear Georgiana—and what will you think of this!—that he is infinitely shyer than you, and far more afraid of you than you ever were of any one in all your days!"

In perturbation of mind Miss Podsnap still fumed and plucked at her hands a little, but could not help laughing at the notion of any body's being afraid of her. With that advantage, Sophronia flattered her and rallied her more successfully, and then the insinuating Alfred flattered her and rallied her, and promised that at any moment when she might require that service at his hands, he would take young Fledgeby out and trample on him. Thus it remained amicably understood that young Fledgeby was to come to admire, and that Georgiana was to come to be admired; and Georgiana with the entirely new sensation in her breast of having that prospect before her, and with many kisses from her dear Sophronia in present possession, preceded six feet one of discontented footman (an amount of the article that always came for her when she walked home) to her father's dwelling.

The happy pair being left together, Mrs. Lammle said to her husband:

"If I understand this girl, Sir, your dangerous fascinations have produced some effect upon her. I mention the conquest in good time because I apprehend your scheme to be more important to you than your vanity."

There was a mirror on the wall before them, and her eyes just caught him smirking in it. She gave the reflected image a look of the deepest disdain, and the image received it in the glass. Next moment they quietly eyed each other, as if they, the principals, had had no part in that expressive transaction.

It may have been that Mrs. Lammle tried in some manner to excuse her conduct to herself by depreciating the poor little victim of whom she spoke with acrimonious contempt. It may have been too that in this she did not quite succeed, for it is very difficult to resist confidence, and she knew she had Georgiana's.

Nothing more was said between the happy pair. Perhaps conspirators who have once established an understanding, may not be overfond of repeating the terms and objects of their conspiracy. Next day came; came Georgiana; and came Fledgeby.

Georgiana had by this time seen a good deal of the house and its frequenters. As there was a certain handsome room with a billiard-table in it—on the ground-floor, eating out a back-yard—which might have been Mr. Lammle's office, or library, but was called by neither name, but simply Mr. Lammle's room, so it would have been hard for stronger female heads than Georgiana's to determine whether its frequenters were men of pleasure or men of business. Between the room and the men there were strong points of general resemblance. Both were too gaudy, too slangey, too odorous of cigars, and too much given to horse-flesh; the latter characteristic being exemplified in the room by its decorations, and in the men by their conversation. High-stepping horses seemed necessary to all Mr. Lammle's friends—as necessary as their transaction of business together in a gipsy way at untimely hours of the morning and evening, and in rushes and snatches. There were friends who seemed to be always coming and going across the Channel, on errands about the Bourse, and Greek and Spanish and India and Mexican and par and premium and discount and three quarters and seven eighths. There were other friends who seemed to be always lolling and lounging in and out of the City, on questions of the Bourse, and Greek and Spanish and India and Mexican and par and premium and discount and three quarters and seven eighths. They were all feverish, boastful, and indefinitely loose; and they all ate and drank a great deal; and made bets in eating and drinking. They all spoke of sums of money, and only mentioned the sums and left the money to be understood: as "five and forty thousand Tom," or "Two hundred and twenty-two on every individual share in the lot Joe." They seemed to divide the world into two classes of people; people who were making enormous fortunes, and people who were being enormously ruined. They were always in a hurry, and yet seemed to have nothing tangible to do; except a few of them (these, mostly asthmatic and thick-lipped) who were forever demonstrating to the rest, with gold pencil-cases which they could hardly hold because of the big rings on their forefingers, how money was to be made. Lastly, they all swore at their grooms, and the grooms were not quite as respectful or complete as other men's grooms; seeming somehow to fall short of the groom point as their masters fell short of the gentleman point.

Young Fledgeby was none of these. Young Fledgeby had a peachy cheek, or a cheek compounded of the peach and the red red red wall on which it grows, and was an awkward, sandy-haired, small-eyed youth, exceeding slim (his enemies would have said lanky), and prone to self-examination in the articles of whisker and mustache. While feeling for the whisker that he anxiously expected, Fledgeby underwent remarkable fluctuations of spirits, ranging along the whole scale from confidence to despair. There were times when he started, as exclaiming "By Jupiter here it is at last!" There were other times when, being equally depressed, he would be seen to shake his head, and give up hope. To see him at those periods leaning on a chimney-piece, like as on an urn containing the ashes of his ambition, with the cheek that would not sprout, upon the hand on which that cheek had forced conviction, was a distressing sight.

Not so was Fledgeby seen on this occasion. Arrayed in superb raiment, with his opera hat under his arm, he concluded his self-examination hopefully, awaited the arrival of Miss Podsnap, and talked small-talk with Mrs. Lammle. In facetious homage to the smallness of his talk, and the jerky nature of his manners, Fledgeby's familiars had agreed to confer upon him (behind his back) the honorary title of Fascination Fledgeby.

"Warm weather, Mrs. Lammle," said Fascination Fledgeby. Mrs. Lammle thought it scarcely as warm as it had been yesterday. "Perhaps not," said Fascination Fledgeby, with great quickness of repartee; "but I expect it will be devilish warm to-morrow."

He threw off another little scintillation. "Been out to-day, Mrs. Lammle?"

Mrs. Lammle answered, for a short drive.

"Some people," said Fascination Fledgeby, "are accustomed to take long drives; but it generally appears to me that if they make 'em too long, they overdo it."

Being in such feather, he might have surpassed himself in his next sally, had not Miss Podsnap been announced. Mrs. Lammle flew to embrace her darling little Georgy, and when the first transports were over, presented Mr. Fledgeby. Mr. Lammle came on the scene last, for he was always late, and so were the frequenters always late; all hands being bound to be made late, by private information about the Bourse, and Greek and Spanish and India and Mexican and par and premium and discount and three quarters and seven eighths.

A handsome little dinner was served immediately, and Mr. Lammle sat sparkling at his end of the table, with his servant behind his chair, and his ever-lingering doubts upon the subject of his wages behind himself. Mr. Lammle's utmost powers of sparkling were in requisition to-day, for Fascination Fledgeby and Georgiana not only struck each other speechless, but struck each other into astonishing attitudes; Georgiana, as she sat facing Fledgeby, making such efforts to conceal her elbows as were totally incompatible with the use of a knife and fork; and Fledgeby, as he sat facing Georgiana, avoiding her countenance by every possible device, and betraying the discomposure of his mind in feeling for his whiskers with his spoon, his wine-glass, and his bread.

So Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lammle had to prompt, and this is how they prompted.

"Georgiana," said Mr. Lammle, low and smiling, and sparkling all over, like a harlequin; "you are not in your usual spirits. Why are you not in your usual spirits, Georgiana?"

Georgiana faltered that she was much the same as she was in general; she was not aware of being different.

"Not aware of being different!" retorted Mr. Alfred Lammle. "You, my dear Georgiana! who were always so natural and unconstrained with us! who are such a relief from the crowd that are all alike! who are the embodiment of gentleness, simplicity, and reality!"

Miss Podsnap looked at the door, as if she entertained confused thoughts of taking refuge from these compliments in flight.

"Now, I will be judged," said Mr. Lammle, raising his voice a little, "by my friend Fledgeby."

"Oh don't!" Miss Podsnap faintly ejaculated: when Mrs. Lammle took the prompt-book.

"I beg your pardon, Alfred, my dear, but I can not part with Mr. Fledgeby quite yet; you must wait for him a moment. Mr. Fledgeby and I are engaged in a personal discussion."

Fledgeby must have conducted it on his side with immense art, for no appearance of uttering one syllable had escaped him.

"A personal discussion, Sophronia, my love? What discussion? Fledgeby, I am jealous. What discussion, Fledgeby?"

"Shall I tell him, Mr. Fledgeby?" asked Mrs. Lammle.

Trying to look as if he knew any thing about it, Fascination replied, "Yes, tell him."

"We were discussing then," said Mrs. Lammle, "if you must know, Alfred, whether Mr. Fledgeby was in his usual flow of spirits."

"Why, that is the very point, Sophronia, that Georgiana and I were discussing as to herself! What did Fledgeby say?"

"Oh, a likely thing, Sir, that I am going to tell you every thing, and be told nothing! What did Georgiana say?"

"Georgiana said she was doing her usual justice to herself to-day, and I said she was not."

"Precisely," exclaimed Mrs. Lammle, "what I said to Mr. Fledgeby."

Still, it wouldn't do. They would not look at one another. No, not even when the sparkling host proposed that the quartette should take an appropriately sparkling glass of wine. Georgiana looked from her wine-glass at Mr. Lammle and at Mrs. Lammle; but mightn't, couldn't, shouldn't, wouldn't, look at Mr. Fledgeby. Fascination looked from his wine-glass at Mrs. Lammle and at Mr. Lammle; but mightn't, couldn't, shouldn't, wouldn't, look at Georgiana.

More prompting was necessary. Cupid must be brought up to the mark. The manager had put him down in the bill for the part, and he must play it.

"Sophronia, my dear," said Mr. Lammle, "I don't like the color of your dress."

"I appeal," said Mrs. Lammle, "to Mr. Fledgeby."

"And I," said Mr. Lammle, "to Georgiana."

"Georgy, my love," remarked Mrs. Lammle aside to her dear girl, "I rely upon you not to go over to the opposition. Now, Mr. Fledgeby."

Fascination wished to know if the color were not called rose-color? Yes, said Mr. Lammle; actually he knew every thing; it was really rose-color. Fascination took rose-color to mean the color of roses. (In this he was very warmly supported by Mr. and Mrs. Lammle.) Fascination had heard the term Queen of Flowers applied to the Rose. Similarly, it might be said that the dress was the Queen of Dresses. ("Very happy, Fledgeby!" from Mr. Lammle.) Notwithstanding, Fascination's opinion was that we all had our eyes—or at least a large majority of us—and that—and—and his further opinion was several ands, with nothing beyond them.

"Oh, Mr. Fledgeby," said Mrs. Lammle, "to desert me in that way! Oh, Mr. Fledgeby, to abandon my poor dear injured rose and declare for blue!"

"Victory, victory!" cried Mr. Lammle; "your dress is condemned, my dear."

"But what," said Mrs. Lammle, stealing her affectionate hand toward her dear girl's, "what does Georgy say?"

"She says," replied Mr. Lammle, interpreting for her, "that in her eyes you look well in any color, Sophronia, and that if she had expected to be embarrassed by so pretty a compliment as she has received, she would have worn another color herself. Though I tell her, in reply, that it would not have saved her, for whatever color she had worn would have been Fledgeby's color. But what does Fledgeby say?"

"He says," replied Mrs. Lammle, interpreting for him, and patting the back of her dear girl's hand, as if it were Fledgeby who was patting it, "that it was no compliment, but a little natural act of homage that he couldn't resist. And," expressing more feeling as if it were more feeling on the part of Fledgeby, "he is right, he is right!"

Still, no not even now, would they look at one another. Seeming to gnash his sparkling teeth, studs, eyes, and buttons, all at once, Mr. Lammle secretly bent a dark frown on the two, expressive of an intense desire to bring them together by knocking their heads together.

"Have you heard this opera of to-night, Fledgeby?" he asked, stopping very short, to prevent himself from running on into "confound you."

"Why no, not exactly," said Fledgeby. "In fact I don't know a note of it."

"Neither do you know it, Georgy?" said Mrs. Lammle.

"N-no," replied Georgiana, faintly, under the sympathetic coincidence.

"Why, then," said Mrs. Lammle, charmed by the discovery which flowed from the premises, "you neither of you know it! How charming!"

Even the craven Fledgeby felt that the time was now come when he must strike a blow. He struck it by saying, partly to Mrs. Lammle and partly to the circumambient air, "I consider myself very fortunate in being reserved by—"

As he stopped dead, Mr. Lammle, making that gingerous bush of his whiskers to look out of, offered him the word "Destiny."

"No, I wasn't going to say that," said Fledgeby. "I was going to say Fate. I consider it very fortunate that Fate has written in the book of—in the book which is its own property—that I should go to that opera for the first time under the memorable circumstances of going with Miss Podsnap."

To which Georgiana replied, hooking her two little fingers in one another, and addressing the table-cloth, "Thank you, but I generally go with no one but you, Sophronia, and I like that very much."

Content perforce with this success for the time, Mr. Lammle let Miss Podsnap out of the room, as if he were opening her cage door, and Mrs. Lammle followed. Coffee being presently served up stairs, he kept a watch on Fledgeby until Miss Podsnap's cup was empty, and then directed him with his finger (as if that young gentleman were a slow Retriever) to go and fetch it. This feat he performed, not only without failure, but even with the original embellishment of informing Miss Podsnap that green tea was considered bad for the nerves. Though there Miss Podsnap unintentionally threw him out by faltering, "Oh, is it indeed? How does it act?" Which he was not prepared to elucidate.

The carriage announced, Mrs. Lammle said, "Don't mind me, Mr. Fledgeby, my skirts and cloak occupy both my hands, take Miss Podsnap." And he took her, and Mrs. Lammle went next, and Mr. Lammle went last, savagely following his little flock like a drover.

But he was all sparkle and glitter in the box at the Opera, and there he and his dear wife made a conversation between Fledgeby and Georgiana in the following ingenious and skillful manner. They sat in this order: Mrs. Lammle, Fascination Fledgeby, Georgiana, Mr. Lammle. Mrs. Lammle made leading remarks to Fledgeby, only requiring monosyllabic replies. Mr. Lammle did the like with Georgiana. At times Mrs. Lammle would lean forward to address Mr. Lammle to this purpose.

"Alfred, my dear, Mr. Fledgeby very justly says, apropos of the last scene, that true constancy would not require any such stimulant as the stage deems necessary." To which Mr. Lammle would reply, "Ay, Sophronia, my love, but as Georgiana has observed to me, the lady had no sufficient reason to know the state of the gentleman's affections." To which Mrs. Lammle would rejoin, "Very true, Alfred; but Mr. Fledgeby points out," this. To which Alfred would demur: "Undoubtedly, Sophronia, but Georgiana acutely remarks," that. Through this device the two young people conversed at great length and committed themselves to a variety of delicate sentiments, without having once opened their lips save to say yes or no, and even that not to one another.

Fledgeby took his leave of Miss Podsnap at the carriage door, and the Lammles dropped her at her own home, and on the way Mrs. Lammle archly rallied her, in her fond and protecting manner, by saying at intervals, "Oh little Georgiana, little Georgiana!" Which was not much; but the tone added, "You have enslaved your Fledgeby."

And thus the Lammles got home at last, and the lady sat down moody and weary, looking at her dark lord engaged in a deed of violence with a bottle of soda-water as though he were wringing the neck of some unlucky creature and pouring its blood down his throat. As he wiped his dripping whiskers in an ogreish way, he met her eyes, and pausing, said, with no very gentle voice:

"Well?"

"Was such an absolute Booby necessary to the purpose?"

"I know what I am doing. He is no such dolt as you suppose."

"A genius, perhaps?"

"You sneer, perhaps; and you take a lofty air upon yourself, perhaps! But I tell you this:—when that young fellow's interest is concerned, he holds as tight as a horse-leech. When money is in question with that young fellow, he is a match for the Devil."

"Is he a match for you?"

"He is. Almost as good a one as you thought me for you. He has no quality of youth in him, but such as you have seen to-day. Touch him upon money, and you touch no booby then. He really is a dolt, I suppose, in other things; but it answers his one purpose very well."

"Has she money in her own right in any case?"

"Ay! she has money in her own right in any case. You have done so well to-day, Sophronia, that I answer the question, though you know I object to any such questions. You have done so well to-day, Sophronia, that you must be tired. Get to bed."

CHAPTER V.

MERCURY PROMPTING.

FLEDGEBY deserved Mr. Alfred Lammle's eulogium. He was the meanest cur existing, with a single pair of legs. And instinct (a word we all clearly understand) going largely on four legs, and reason always on two, meanness on four legs never attains the perfection of meanness on two.

The father of this young gentleman had been a money-lender, who had transacted professional business with the mother of this young gentleman, when he, the latter, was waiting in the vast dark ante-chambers of the present world to be born. The lady, a widow, being unable to pay the money-lender, married him; and in due course, Fledgeby was summoned out of the vast dark ante-chambers to come and be presented to the Registrar-General. Rather a curious speculation how Fledgeby would otherwise have disposed of his leisure until Doomsday.

Fledgeby's mother offended her family by marrying Fledgeby's father. It is one of the easiest achievements in life to offend your family when your family want to get rid of you. Fledgeby's mother's family had been very much offended with her for being poor, and broke with her for becoming comparatively rich. Fledgeby's mother's family was the Snigsworth family. She had even the high honor to be cousin to Lord Snigsworth—so many times removed that the noble Earl would have had no compunction in removing her one time more and dropping her clean outside the cousinly pale; but cousin for all that.

Among her pre-matrimonial transactions with Fledgeby's father, Fledgeby's mother had raised money of him at a great disadvantage on a certain reversionary interest. The reversion falling in soon after they were married, Fledgeby's father laid hold of the cash for his separate use and benefit. This led to subjective differences of opinion, not to say objective interchanges of bootjacks, backgammon boards, and other domestic missiles, between Fledgeby's father and Fledgeby's mother, and those led to Fledgeby's mother spending as much money as she could, and to Fledgeby's father doing all he couldn't to restrain her. Fledgeby's childhood had been, in consequence, a stormy one; but the winds and the waves had gone down in the grave, and Fledgeby flourished alone.

He lived in chambers in the Albany, did Fledgeby, and maintained a spruce appearance. But his youthful fire was all composed of sparks from the grindstone; and as the sparks flew off, went out, and never warmed any thing, be sure that Fledgeby had his tools at the grindstone, and turned it with a wary eye.

Mr. Alfred Lammle came round to the Albany to breakfast with Fledgeby. Present on the table, one scanty pot of tea, one scanty loaf, two scanty pats of butter, two scanty rashers of bacon, two pitiful eggs, and an abundance of handsome china bought a second-hand bargain.

"What did you think of Georgiana?" asked Mr. Lammle.

"Why, I'll tell you," said Fledgeby, very deliberately.

"Do, my boy."

"You misunderstand me," said Fledgeby.

"I don't mean I'll tell you that. I mean I'll tell you something else."

"Tell me any thing, old fellow!"

"Ah, but there you misunderstand me again," said Fledgeby. "I mean I'll tell you nothing."

Mr. Lammle sparkled at him, but frowned at him too.

"Look here," said Fledgeby. "You're deep and you're ready. Whether I am deep or not, never mind. I am not ready. But I can do one thing, Lammle, I can hold my tongue. And I intend always doing it."

"You are a long-headed fellow, Fledgeby."

"May be, or may not be. If I am a short-tongued fellow, it may amount to the same thing. Now, Lammle, I am never going to answer questions."

"My dear fellow, it was the simplest question in the world."

"Never mind. It seemed so, but things are not always what they seem. I saw a man examined as a witness in Westminster Hall. Questions put to him seemed the simplest in the world, but turned out to be any thing rather than that, after he had answered 'em. Very well. Then he should have held his tongue. If he had held his tongue he would have kept out of scrapes that he got into."

"If I had held my tongue, you would never have seen the subject of my question," remarked Lammle, darkening.

"Now, Lammle," said Fascination Fledgeby, calmly feeling for his whisker, "it won't do. I won't be led on into a discussion. I can't manage a discussion. But I can manage to hold my tongue."

"Can?" Mr. Lammle fell back upon propitiation. "I should think you could! Why, when these fellows of our acquaintance drink and you drink with them, the more talkative they get, the more silent you get. The more they let out, the more you keep in."

"I don't object, Lammle," returned Fledgeby, with an internal chuckle, "to being understood, though I object to being questioned. That certainly is the way I do it."

"And when all the rest of us are discussing our ventures, none of us ever know what a single venture of yours is!"

"And none of you ever will from me, Lammle," replied Fledgeby, with another internal chuckle; "that certainly is the way I do it."

"Why of course it is, I know!" rejoined Lammle, with a flourish of frankness, and a laugh, and stretching out his hands as if to show the universe a remarkable man in Fledgeby. "If I hadn't known it of my Fledgeby, should I have proposed our little compact of advantage to my Fledgeby?"

"Ah!" remarked Fascination, shaking his head slyly. "But I am not to be got at in that way. I am not vain. That sort of vanity don't pay, Lammle. No, no, no. Compliments only make me hold my tongue the more."

Alfred Lammle pushed his plate away (no great sacrifice under the circumstances of there being so little in it), thrust his hands in his pockets, leaned back in his chair, and contemplated Fledgeby in silence. Then he slowly released his left hand from its pocket, and made that bush of his whiskers, still contemplating him in silence. Then he slowly broke silence, and slowly said: "What—the—Dev-il is this fellow about this morning?"

"Now, look here, Lammle," said Fascination Fledgeby, with the meanest of twinkles in his meanest of eyes: which were too near together, by-the-way: "look here, Lammle: I am very well aware that I didn't show to advantage last night, and that you and your wife—who, I consider, is a very clever woman and an agreeable woman—did. I am not calculated to show to advantage under that sort of circumstances. I know very well you two did show to advantage, and managed capitally. But don't you on that account come talking to me as if I were your doll and puppet, because I am not."

"And all this," cried Alfred, after studying with a look the meanness that was fain to have the meanest help, and yet was so mean as to turn upon it: "all this because of one simple natural question!"

"You should have waited till I thought proper to say something about it myself. I don't like your coming over me with your Georgi-anas, as if you was her proprietor and mine too."

"Well, when you are in the gracious mind to say any thing about it of yourself," retorted Lammle, "pray do."

"I have done it. I have said you managed capitally. You and your wife both. If you'll go on managing capitally, I'll go on doing my part. Only don't crow."

"I crow!" exclaimed Lammle, shrugging his shoulders.

"Or," pursued the other—"or take it in your head that people are your puppets because they don't come out to advantage at the particular moments when you do, with the assistance of a very clever and agreeable wife. All the rest keep on doing, and let Mrs. Lammle keep on doing. Now, I have held my tongue when I thought proper, and I have spoken when I thought proper, and there's an end of that. And now the question is," proceeded Fledgeby, with the greatest reluctance, "will you have another egg?"

"No, I won't," said Lammle, shortly.

"Perhaps you're right and will find yourself better without it," replied Fascination, in greatly improved spirits. "To ask you if you'll have another rasher would be unmeaning flattery, for it would make you thirsty all day. Will you have some more bread and butter?"

"No, I won't," repeated Lammle.

"Then I will," said Fascination. And it was not a mere retort for the sound's sake, but was a cheerful cogent consequence of the refusal; for if Lammle had applied himself again to the loaf, it would have been so heavily visited, in Fledgeby's opinion, as to demand abstinence from bread, on his part, for the remainder of that meal at least, if not for the whole of the next.

Whether this young gentleman (for he was but three-and-twenty) combined with the miserly vice of an old man any of the open-handed vices of a young one, was a moot-point; so very honorably did he keep his own counsel. He was sensible of the value of appearances as an investment, and liked to dress well; but he drove a bargain for every movable about him, from the coat on his back to the china on his breakfast-table; and every bargain, by representing somebody's ruin or somebody's loss, acquired a peculiar charm for him. It was a part of his avarice to take, within narrow bounds, long odds at races; if he won, he drove harder bargains; if he lost, he half-starved himself until next time. Why money should be so precious to an Ass too dull and mean to exchange it for any other satisfaction, is strange; but there is no animal so sure to get laden with it as the Ass who sees nothing written on the face of the earth and sky but the three letters L. S. D.—not Luxury, Sensuality, Dissoluteness, which they often stand for, but the three dry letters. Your concentrated Fox is seldom comparable to your concentrated Ass in money-breeding.

Fascination Fledgeby feigned to be a young gentleman living on his means, but was known secretly to be a kind of outlaw in the bill-broking line, and to put money out at high interest in various ways. His circle of familiar acquaintance, from Mr. Lammle round, all had a touch of the outlaw, as to their roving in the merry green-wood of Jobbery Forest, lying on the outskirts of the Share-Market and the Stock Exchange.

"I suppose you, Lammle," said Fledgeby, eating his bread and butter, "always go in for female society?"

"Always," replied Lammle, glooming considerably under his late treatment.

"Came natural to you, eh?" said Fledgeby.

"The sex were pleased to like me, Sir," said Lammle, sulkily, but with the air of a man who had not been able to help himself.

"Made a pretty good thing of marrying, didn't you?" asked Fledgeby.

The other smiled (an ugly smile), and tapped one tap upon his nose.

"My late governor made a mess of it," said Fledgeby. "But Geor— Is the right name Georgina or Georgiana?"

"Georgiana."

"I was thinking yesterday, I didn't know there was such a name. I thought it must end in ina."

"Why?"

"Why, you play—if you can—the Concertina, you know," replied Fledgeby, meditating very slowly. "And you have—when you catch it—the Searlatina. And you can come down from a balloon in a parach— No you can't though. Well, say Georgeute—I mean Georgiana."

VOL. XXX.—No. 175.—H

"You were going to remark of Georgiana—?" Lammle moodily hinted, after waiting in vain.

"I was going to remark of Georgiana, Sir," said Fledgeby, not at all pleased to be reminded of his having forgotten it, "that she don't seem to be violent. Don't seem to be of the pitching-order."

"She has the gentleness of the dove, Mr. Fledgeby."

"Of course you'll say so," replied Fledgeby, sharpening, the moment his interest was touched by another. "But you know, the real look-out is this:—what I say, not what you say. I say—having my late governor and my late mother in my eye—that Georgiana don't seem to be of the pitching-in order."

The respected Mr. Lammle was a bully, by nature and by usual practice. Perceiving, as Fledgeby's affronts cumulated, that conciliation by no means answered the purpose here, he now directed a scowling look into Fledgeby's small eyes for the effect of the opposite treatment. Satisfied by what he saw there, he burst into a violent passion and struck his hand upon the table, making the china ring and dance.

"You are a very offensive fellow, Sir," cried Mr. Lammle, rising. "You are a highly offensive scoundrel. What do you mean by this behavior?"

"I say!" remonstrated Fledgeby. "Don't break out."

"You are a very offensive fellow, Sir," repeated Mr. Lammle. "You are a highly offensive scoundrel!"

"I say, you know!" urged Fledgeby, quailing.

"Why, you coarse and vulgar vagabond!" said Mr. Lammle, looking fiercely about him, "if your servant was here to give me six-pence of your money to get my boots cleaned afterward—for you are not worth the expenditure—I'd kick you."

"No you wouldn't," pleaded Fledgeby. "I am sure you'd think better of it."

"I tell you what, Mr. Fledgeby," said Lammle advancing on him. "Since you presume to contradict me, I'll assert myself a little. Give me your nose!"

Fledgeby covered it with his hand instead, and said, retreating, "I beg you won't!"

"Give me your nose, Sir," repeated Lammle.

Still covering that feature and backing, Mr. Fledgeby reiterated (apparently with a severe cold in his head), "I beg, I beg, you won't."

"And this fellow," exclaimed Lammle, stopping and making the most of his chest—"This fellow presumes on my having selected him out of all the young fellows I know, for an advantageous opportunity! This fellow presumes on my having in my desk round the corner his dirty note of hand for a wretched sum payable on the occurrence of a certain event, which event can only be of my and my wife's bringing about! This fellow, Fledgeby, presumes to be impertinent to me, Lammle. Give me your nose, Sir!"

"No! Stop! I beg your pardon," said Fledgeby, with humility.

"What do you say, Sir?" demanded Mr. Lammle, seeming too furious to understand.

"I beg your pardon," repeated Fledgeby.

"Repeat your words louder, Sir. The just indignation of a gentleman has sent the blood boiling to my head. I don't hear you."

"I say," repeated Fledgeby, with laborious explanatory politeness, "I beg your pardon."

Mr. Lammle paused. "As a man of honor," said he, throwing himself into a chair, "I am disarmed."

Mr. Fledgeby also took a chair, though less demonstratively, and by slow approaches removed his hand from his nose. Some natural diffidence assailed him as to blowing it, so shortly after its having assumed a personal and delicate, not to say public, character; but he overcame his scruples by degrees, and modestly took that liberty under an implied protest.

"Lammle," he said sneakingly, when that was done, "I hope we are friends again?"

"Mr. Fledgeby," returned Lammle, "say no more."

"I must have gone too far in making myself disagreeable," said Fledgeby, "but I never intended it."

"Say no more, say no more!" Mr. Lammle repeated in a magnificent tone. "Give me your"—Fledgeby started—"hand."

They shook hands, and on Mr. Lammle's part, in particular, there ensued great geniality. For he was quite as much of a dastard as the other, and had been in equal danger of falling into the second place for good, when he took heart just in time to act upon the information conveyed to him by Fledgeby's eye.

The breakfast ended in a perfect understanding. Incessant machinations were to be kept at work by Mr. and Mrs. Lammle; love was to be made for Fledgeby, and conquest was to be insured to him; he on his part very humbly admitting his defects as to the softer social arts, and entreating to be backed to the utmost by his two able coadjutors.

Little recked Mr. Podsnap of the traps and toils besetting his Young Person. He regarded her as safe within the Temple of Podsnappery, biding the fullness of time when she, Georgiana, should take him, Fitz-Podsnap, who with all his worldly goods should her endow. It would call a blush into the cheek of his standard Young Person to have any thing to do with such matters save to take as directed, and with worldly goods as per settlement to be endowed. Who giveth this woman to be married to this man? I, Podsnap. Perish the daring thought that any smaller creation should come between!

It was a public holiday, and Fledgeby did not recover his spirits or his usual temperature of nose until the afternoon. Walking into the City in the holiday afternoon, he walked against a living stream setting out of it; and thus, when he turned into the precincts of St. Mary Axe, he found a prevalent repose and quiet there. A yellow overhanging plaster-fronted house at which he stopped was quiet too. The blinds were all drawn down, and the inscription Pubsey and Co. seemed to doze in the counting-house window on the ground-floor giving on the sleepy street.

Fledgeby knocked and rang, and Fledgeby rang and knocked, but no one came. Fledgeby crossed the narrow street and looked up at the house-windows, but nobody looked down at Fledgeby. He got out of temper, crossed the narrow street again, and pulled the house-bell as if it were the house's nose, and he were taking a hint from his late experience. His ear at the keyhole seemed then, at last, to give him assurance that something stirred within. His eye at the keyhole seemed to confirm his ear, for he angrily pulled the house's nose again, and pulled and pulled and continued to pull, until a human nose appeared in the dark doorway.

"Now you, Sir!" cried Fledgeby. "These are nice games!"

He addressed an old Jewish man in an ancient coat, long of skirt, and wide of pocket. A venerable man, bald and shining at the top of his head, and with long gray hair flowing down at its sides and mingling with his beard. A man who with a graceful Eastern action of homage bent his head, and stretched out his hands with the palms downward, as if to deprecate the wrath of a superior.

"What have you been up to?" said Fledgeby, storming at him.

"Generous Christian master," urged the Jewish man, "it being holiday I looked for no one."

"Holiday be blowed!" said Fledgeby, entering. "What have you got to do with holidays? Shut the door."

With his former action the old man obeyed. In the entry hung his rusty large-brimmed low-crowned hat, as long out of date as his coat; in the corner near it stood his staff—no walking-stick but a veritable staff. Fledgeby turned into the counting-house, perched himself on a business stool, and cocked his hat. There were light boxes on shelves in the counting-house, and strings of mock beads hanging up. There were samples of cheap clocks, and samples of cheap vases of flowers. Foreign toys, all.

Perched on the stool with his hat cocked on his head and one of his legs dangling, the youth of Fledgeby hardly contrasted to advantage with the age of the Jewish man as he stood with his bare head bowed, and his eyes (which he only raised in speaking) on the ground. His clothing was worn down to the rusty hue of the hat in the entry, but though he looked shabby he did not look mean. Now, Fledgeby, though not shabby, did look mean.

"You have not told me what you were up to, you, Sir," said Fledgeby, scratching his head with the brim of his hat.

"Sir, I was breathing the air."

"In the cellar, that you didn't hear?"

"On the house-top."

"Upon my soul! That's a way of doing business."

"Sir," the old man represented with a grave and patient air, "there must be two parties to the transaction of business, and the holiday has left me alone."

"Ah! Can't be buyer and seller too. That's what the Jews say; ain't it?"

"At least we say truly, if we say so," answered the old man with a smile.

"Your people need speak the truth sometimes, for they lie enough," remarked Fascination Fledgeby.

"Sir, there is," returned the old man with quiet emphasis, "too much untruth among all denominations of men."

Rather dashed, Fascination Fledgeby took another scratch at his intellectual head with his hat, to gain time for rallying.

"For instance," he resumed, as though it were he who had spoken last, "who but you and I ever heard of a poor Jew?"

"The Jews," said the old man, raising his eyes from the ground with his former smile. "They hear of poor Jews often, and are very good to them."

"Bother that!" returned Fledgeby. "You know what I mean. You'd persuade me if you could that you are a poor Jew. I wish you'd confess how much you really did make out of my late governor. I should have a better opinion of you."

The old man only bent his head, and stretched out his hands as before.

"Don't go on posturing like a Deaf and Dumb School," said the ingenious Fledgeby, "but express yourself like a Christian—or as nearly as you can."

"I had had sickness and misfortunes, and was so poor," said the old man, "as hopelessly to owe the father, principal and interest. The son inheriting, was so merciful as to forgive me both and place me here."

He made a little gesture as though he kissed the hem of an imaginary garment worn by the noble youth before him. It was humbly done, but picturesquely, and was not abasing to the doer.

"You won't say more, I see," said Fledgeby, looking at him as if he would like to try the effect of extracting a double-tooth or two, "and so it's of no use my putting it to you. But confess this, Riah; who believes you to be poor now?"

"No one," said the old man.

"There you're right," assented Fledgeby.

"No one," repeated the old man with a grave slow wave of his head. "All scout it as a fable. Were I to say 'This little fancy business is not mine;'" with a lithe sweep of his easily-turning hand around him, to comprehend the various objects on the shelves; "'it is the little business of a Christian young gentleman who places me, his servant, in trust and charge here, and to whom I am accountable for every single bead,' they would laugh. When, in the larger money-business, I tell the borrowers—"

"I say, old chap!" interposed Fledgeby, "I hope you mind what you do tell 'em?"

"Sir, I tell them no more than I am about to repeat. When I tell them, 'I can not promise this, I can not answer for the other, I must see my principal, I have not the money, I am a poor man and it does not rest with me,' they are so unbelieving and so impatient, that they sometimes curse me in Jehovah's name."

"That's deuced good, that is!" said Fascination Fledgeby.

"And at other times they say, 'Can it never be done without these tricks, Mr. Riah? Come, come, Mr. Riah, we know the arts of your people'—my people!—'If the money is to be lent, fetch it, fetch it; if it is not to be lent, keep it and say so.' They never believe me."

"That's all right," said Fascination Fledgeby.

"They say, 'We know, Mr. Riah, we know. We have but to look at you, and we know.'"

"Oh, a good 'un are you for the post," thought Fledgeby, "and a good 'un was I to mark you out for it! I may be slow, but I am precious sure."

Not a syllable of this reflection shaped itself in any scrap of Mr. Fledgeby's breath, lest it should tend to put his servant's price up. But looking at the old man as he stood quiet with his head bowed and his eyes cast down, he felt that to relinquish an inch of his baldness, an inch of his gray hair, an inch of his coat-skirt, an inch of his hat-brim, an inch of his walking-staff, would be to relinquish hundreds of pounds.

"Look here, Riah," said Fledgeby, mollified by these self-approving considerations. "I want to go a little more into buying-up queer bills. Look out in that direction."

"Sir, it shall be done."

"Casting my eye over the accounts, I find that branch of business pays pretty fairly, and I am game for extending it. I like to know people's affairs likewise. So look out."

"Sir, I will, promptly."

"Put it about in the right quarters, that you'll buy queer bills by the lump—by the pound weight if that's all—supposing you see your way to a fair chance on looking over the parcel. And there's one thing more. Come to me with the books for periodical inspection as usual, at eight on Monday morning."

Riah drew some folding tablets from his breast and noted it down.

"That's all I wanted to say at the present time," continued Fledgeby in a grudging vein, as he got off the stool, "except that I wish you'd take the air where you can hear the bell, or the knocker, either one of the two or both. By-the-by, how do you take the air at the top of the house? Do you stick your head out of a chimney-pot?"

"Sir, there are leads there, and I have made a little garden there."

"To bury your money in, you old dodger?"

"A thumb-nail's space of garden would hold the treasure I bury, master," said Riah. "Twelve shillings a week, even when they are an old man's wages, bury themselves."

"I should like to know what you really are worth," returned Fledgeby, with whom his growing rich on that stipend and gratitude was a very convenient-fiction. "But come! Let's have a look at your garden on the tiles before I go!"

The old man took a step back, and hesitated.

"Truly, Sir, I have company there."

"Have you, by George!" said Fledgeby; "I suppose you happen to know whose premises these are?"

"Sir, they are yours, and I am your servant in them."

"Oh! I thought you might have overlooked that," retorted Fledgeby, with his eyes on Riah's beard as he felt for his own; "having company on my premises, you know!"

"Come up and see the guests, Sir, I hope for your admission that they can do no harm."

Passing him with a courteous reverence, specially unlike any action that Mr. Fledgeby could for his life have imparted to his own head and hands, the old man began to ascend the stairs. As he toiled on before, with his palm upon the stair-rail, and his long black skirt, a very gaberdine, overhanging each successive step, he might have been the leader in some pilgrimage of devotional ascent to a prophet's tomb. Not troubled by any such weak imagining, Fascination Fledgeby merely speculated on the time of life at which his beard had begun, and thought once more what a good 'un he was for the part.

Some final wooden steps conducted them, stooping under a low pent-house roof, to the house-top. Riah stood still, and, turning to his master, pointed out his guests.

Lizzie Hexam and Jenny Wren. For whom, perhaps with some old instinct of his race, the gentle Jew had spread a carpet. Seated on it, against no more romantic object than a blackened chimney-stack over which some humble creeper had been trained, they both pored over one book; both with attentive faces; Jenny with the sharper; Lizzie with the more perplexed. Another little book or two were lying near, and a common basket of common fruit, and another basket full of strings of beads and tinsel scraps. A few boxes of humble flowers and evergreens completed the garden; and the encompassing wilderness of dowager old chimneys twirled their cowl and fluttered their smoke, rather as if they were bridling, and fanning themselves, and looking on in a state of airy surprise.

Taking her eyes off the book, to test her memory of something in it, Lizzie was the first to see herself observed. As she rose, Miss Wren likewise became conscious, and said, irreverently addressing the great chief of the premises: "Whoever you are, I can't get up, because my back's bad and my legs are queer."

"This is my master," said Riah, stepping forward.

("Don't look like any body's master," observed Miss Wren to herself, with a hitch of her chin and eyes.)

"This, Sir," pursued the old man, "is a little dress-maker for little people. Explain to the master, Jenny."

"Dolls; that's all," said Jenny, shortly. "Very difficult to fit too, because their figures are so uncertain. You never know where to expect their waists."

"Her friend," resumed the old man, motioning toward Lizzie; "and as industrious as virtuous. But that they both are. They are busy early and late, Sir, early and late; and in by-times, as on this holiday, they go to book learning."

"Not much good to be got out of that," remarked Fledgeby.

"Depends upon the person!" quoth Miss Wren, snapping him up.

"I made acquaintance with my guests, Sir," pursued the Jew, with an evident purpose of drawing out the dress-maker, "through their coming here to buy of our damage and waste for Miss Jenny's millinery. Our waste goes into the best of company, Sir, on her rosy-cheeked little customers. They wear it in their hair, and on their ball-dresses, and even (so she tells me) are presented at Court with it."

"Ah!" said Fledgeby, on whose intelligence this doll-fancy made rather strong demands; "she's been buying that basketful to-day, I suppose?"

"I suppose she has," Miss Jenny interposed; "and paying for it too, most likely!"

"Let's have a look at it," said the suspicious chief. Riah handed it to him. "How much for this now?"

"Two precious silver shillings," said Miss Wren.

Riah confirmed her with two nods, as Fledgeby looked to him. A nod for each shilling.

"Well," said Fledgeby, poking into the contents of the basket with his forefinger, "the price is not so bad. You have got good measure, Miss What-is-it."

"Try Jenny," suggested that young lady with great calmness.

"You have got good measure, Miss Jenny; but the price is not so bad.—And you," said Fledgeby, turning to the other visitor, "do you buy any thing here, miss?"

"No, Sir."

"Nor sell any thing neither, miss?"

"No, Sir."

Looking askew at the questioner, Jenny stole her hand up to her friend's, and drew her friend down, so that she bent beside her on her knee.

"We are thankful to come here for rest, Sir," said Jenny. "You see, you don't know what the rest of this place is to us; does he, Lizzie? It's the quiet, and the air."

"The quiet!" repeated Fledgeby, with a contemptuous turn of his head toward the City's roar. "And the air!" with a "Poof!" at the smoke.

"Ah!" said Jenny. "But it's so high. And you see the clouds rushing on above the narrow streets, not minding them, and you see the golden arrows pointing at the mountains in the sky from which the wind comes, and you feel as if you were dead."

The little creature looked above her, holding up her slight transparent hand.

"How do you feel when you are dead?" asked Fledgeby, much perplexed.

"Oh, so tranquil!" cried the little creature, smiling. "Oh, so peaceful and so thankful! And you hear the people who are alive, crying, and working, and calling to one another down in the close dark streets, and you seem to pity them so! And such a chain has fallen from you, and such a strange good sorrowful happiness comes upon you!"

Her eyes fell on the old man, who, with his hands folded, quietly looked on.

"Why it was only just now," said the little creature, pointing at him, "that I fancied I saw him come out of his grave! He toiled out at that low door, so bent and worn, and then he took his breath and stood upright, and looked all round him at the sky, and the wind blew upon him, and his life down in the dark was over!—Till he was called back to life," she added, looking round at Fledgeby with that lower look of sharpness. "Why did you call him back?"

"He was long enough coming, any how," grumbled Fledgeby.

"But you are not dead, you know," said Jenny Wren. "Get down to life!"

Mr. Fledgeby seemed to think it rather a good suggestion, and with a nod turned round. As Riah followed to attend him down the stairs, the little creature called out to the Jew in a silvery tone, "Don't be long gone. Come back and be dead!" And still as they went down they heard the little sweet voice, more and more faintly, half calling and half singing, "Come back and be dead, Come back and be dead!"

When they got down into the entry, Fledgeby, pausing under the shadow of the broad old hat, and mechanically poising the staff, said to the old man:

"That's a handsome girl, that one in her senses."

"And as good as handsome," answered Riah.

"At all events," observed Fledgeby, with a dry whistle, "I hope she ain't bad enough to put any chap up to the fastenings, and get the premises broken open. You look out. Keep your weather eye awake, and don't make any more acquaintances, however handsome. Of course you always keep my name to yourself?"

"Sir, assuredly I do."

"If they ask it, say it's Pubsey, or say it's Co, or say it's any thing you like, but what it is."

His grateful servant—in whose race gratitude is deep, strong, and enduring—bowed his head, and actually did now put the hem of his coat to his lips: though so lightly that the wearer knew nothing of it.

Thus, Fascination Fledgeby went his way, exulting in the artful cleverness with which he had turned his thumb down on a Jew, and the old man went his different way up stairs. As he mounted, the call or song began to sound in his ears again, and, looking above, he saw the face of the little creature looking down out of a Glory of her long bright radiant hair, and musically repeating to him, like a vision:

"Come up and be dead! Come up and be dead!"

CHAPTER VI.

A RIDDLE WITHOUT AN ANSWER.

AGAIN Mr. Mortimer Lightwood and Mr. Eugene Wrayburn sat together in the Temple. This evening, however, they were not together in the place of business of the eminent solicitor, but in another dismal set of chambers facing it on the same second-floor; on whose dungeon-like black outer door appeared the legend:

PRIVATE.

MR. EUGENE WRAYBURN.

MR. MORTIMER LIGHTWOOD.

(Mr. Lightwood's Offices opposite.)

Appearances indicated that this establishment was a very recent institution. The white letters of the inscription were extremely white and extremely strong to the sense of smell, the complexion of the tables and chairs was (like Lady Tippins's) a little too blooming to be believed in, and the carpets and floor-cloth seemed to rush at the beholder's face in the unusual prominence of their patterns. But the Temple, accustomed to tone down both the still life and the human-life that has much to do with it, would soon get the better of all that.

"Well!" said Eugene, on one side of the fire, "I feel tolerably comfortable. I hope the upholsterer may do the same."

"Why shouldn't he?" asked Lightwood, from the other side of the fire.

"To be sure," pursued Eugene, reflecting, "he is not in the secret of our pecuniary affairs, so perhaps he may be in an easy frame of mind."

"We shall pay him," said Mortimer.

"Shall we, really?" returned Eugene, indolently surprised. "You don't say so!"

"I mean to pay him, Eugene, for my part," said Mortimer, in a slightly injured tone.

"Ah! I mean to pay him too," retorted Eugene. "But then I mean so much that I—that I don't mean."

"Don't mean?"

"So much that I only mean and shall always only mean and nothing more, my dear Mortimer. It's the same thing."

His friend, lying back in his easy chair, watched him lying back in his easy chair, as he stretched out his legs on the hearth-rug, and said, with the amused look that Eugene Wrayburn could always awaken in him without seeming to try or care:

"Any how, your vagaries have increased the bill."

"Calls the domestic virtues vagaries!" exclaimed Eugene, raising his eyes to the ceiling.

"This very complete little kitchen of ours," said Mortimer, "in which nothing will ever be cooked—"

"My dear, dear Mortimer," returned his friend, lazily lifting his head a little to look at him, "how often have I pointed out to you that its moral influence is the important thing?"

"Its moral influence on this fellow," exclaimed Lightwood, laughing.

"Do me the favor," said Eugene, getting out of his chair with much gravity, "to come and inspect that feature of our establishment which you rashly disparage." With that, taking up a candle, he conducted his chum into the fourth room of the set of chambers—a little narrow room—which was very completely and neatly fitted as a kitchen. "See!" said Eugene, "miniature flour-barrel, rolling-pin, spice-box, shelf of brown jars, chopping-board, coffee-mill, dresser elegantly furnished with crockery, sauce-pans and pans, roasting jack, a charming kettle, an armory of dish-covers. The moral influence of these objects, in forming the domestic virtues, may have an immense influence upon me; not upon you, for you are a hopeless case, but upon me. In fact, I have an idea that I feel the domestic virtues already forming. Do me the favor to step into my bedroom. Secrétaire, you see, and abstruse set of solid mahogany pigeon-holes, one for every letter of the alphabet. To what use do I devote them? I receive a bill—say from Jones. I docket it neatly at the secrétaire, JONES, and I put it into pigeon-hole J. It's the next thing to a receipt, and is quite as satisfactory to me. And I very much wish, Mortimer," sitting on his bed, with the air of a philosopher lecturing a disciple, "that my example might induce you to cultivate habits of punctuality and method; and, by means of the moral influences with which I have surrounded you, to encourage the formation of the domestic virtues."

Mortimer laughed again, with his usual commentaries of "How can you be so ridiculous, Eugene!" and "What an absurd fellow you are!" but when his laugh was out, there was something serious, if not anxious, in his face. Despite that pernicious assumption of lassitude and indifference, which had become his second nature, he was strongly attached to his friend. He had founded himself upon Eugene when they were yet boys at school; and at this hour imitated him no less, admired him no less, loved him no less, than in those departed days.

"Eugene," said he, "if I could find you in earnest for a minute, I would try to say an earnest word to you."

"An earnest word?" repeated Eugene. "The moral influences are beginning to work. Say on."

"Well, I will," returned the other, "though you are not earnest yet."

"In this desire for earnestness," murmured Eugene, with the air of one who was meditating deeply, "I trace the happy influences of the little flour-barrel and the coffee-mill. Gratifying."

"Eugene," resumed Mortimer, disregarding the light interruption, and laying a hand upon Eugene's shoulder, as he, Mortimer, stood before him seated on his bed, "you are withholding something from me."

Eugene looked at him, but said nothing.

"All this past summer you have been withholding something from me. Before we entered on our boating vacation, you were as bent upon it as I have seen you upon any thing since we first rowed together. But you cared very little for it when it came, often found it a tie and a drag upon you, and were constantly away. Now it was well enough half a dozen times, a dozen times, twenty times, to say to me in your own odd manner, which I know so well and like so much, that your disappearances were precautions against our boring one another; but of course after a short while I began to know that they covered something. I don't ask what it is, as you have not told me; but the fact is so. Say, is it not?"

"I give you my word of honor, Mortimer," returned Eugene, after a serious pause of a few moments, "that I don't know."

"Don't know, Eugene?"

"Upon my soul, don't know. I know less about myself than about most people in the world, and I don't know."

"You have some design in your mind?"

"Have I? I don't think I have."

"At any rate, you have some subject of interest there which used not to be there?"

"I really can't say," replied Eugene, shaking his head blankly, after pausing again to reconsider. "At times I have thought yes; at other times I have thought no. Now I have been inclined to pursue such a subject; now I have felt that it was absurd, and that it tired and embarrassed me. Absolutely, I can't say. Frankly and faithfully, I would if I could."

So replying, he clapped a hand, in his turn, on his friend's shoulder, as he rose from his seat upon the bed, and said:

"You must take your friend as he is. You know what I am, my dear Mortimer. You know how dreadfully susceptible I am to boredom. You know that when I became enough of a man to find myself an embodied conundrum, I bored myself to the last degree by trying to find out what I meant. You know that at length I gave it up, and declined to guess any more. Then how can I possibly give you the answer that I have not discovered? The old nursery form runs, 'Riddle-me-riddle-me-ree, p'raps you can't tell me what this may be?' My reply runs, 'No. Upon my life, I can't.'"

So much of what was fantastically true to his own knowledge of this utterly careless Eugene, mingled with the answer, that Mortimer could not receive it as a mere evasion. Besides, it was given with an engaging air of openness, and of special exemption of the one friend he valued, from his reckless indifference.

"Come, dear boy!" said Eugene. "Let us try the effect of smoking. If it enlightens me at all on this question, I will impart unreservedly."

They returned to the room they had come from, and, finding it heated, opened a window. Having lighted their cigars, they leaned out of this window, smoking, and looking down at the moonlight, as it shone into the court below.

"No enlightenment," resumed Eugene, after certain minutes of silence. "I feel sincerely apologetic, my dear Mortimer, but nothing comes."

"If nothing comes," returned Mortimer, "nothing can come from it. So I shall hope that this may hold good throughout, and that there may be nothing on foot. Nothing injurious to you, Eugene, or—"

Eugene stayed him for a moment with his hand on his arm, while he took a piece of earth from an old flower-pot on the window-sill and dextrously shot it at a little point of light opposite; having done which to his satisfaction, he said, "Or?"

"Or injurious to any one else."

"How," said Eugene, taking another little piece of earth, and shooting it with great precision at the former mark, "how injurious to any one else?"

"I don't know."

"And," said Eugene, taking, as he said the word, another shot, "to whom else?"

"I don't know."

Checking himself with another piece of earth in his hand, Eugene looked at his friend inquiringly and a little suspiciously. There was no concealed or half-expressed meaning in his face.

"Two belated wanderers in the mazes of the law," said Eugene, attracted by the sound of footsteps, and glancing down as he spoke, "stray into the court. They examine the door-posts of number one, seeking the name they want. Not finding it at number one, they come to number two. On the hat of wanderer number two, the shorter one, I drop this pellet. Hitting him on the hat, I smoke serenely, and become absorbed in contemplation of the sky."

Both the wanderers looked up toward the window; but after interchanging a mutter or two, soon applied themselves to the door-posts below. There they seemed to discover what they wanted, for they disappeared from view by entering at the doorway. "When they emerge," said Eugene, "you shall see me bring them both down;" and so prepared two pellets for the purpose.

He had not reckoned on their seeking his name, or Lightwood's. But either the one or the other would seem to be in question, for now there came a knock at the door. "I am on duty to-night," said Mortimer; "stay you where you are, Eugene." Requiring no persuasion, he staid there, smoking quietly, and not at all curious to know who knocked, until Mortimer spoke to him from within the room, and touched him. Then, drawing in his head, he found the visitors to be young Charley Hexam and the schoolmaster; both standing facing him, and both recognized at a glance.

"You recollect this young fellow, Eugene?" said Mortimer.

"Let me look at him," returned Wrayburn, coolly. "Oh yes, yes. I recollect him!"

He had not been about to repeat that former action of taking him by the chin, but the boy had suspected him of it, and had thrown up his arm with an angry start. Laughingly, Wrayburn looked to Lightwood for an explanation of this odd visit.

"He says he has something to say."

"Surely it must be to you, Mortimer."

"So I thought, but he says no. He says it is to you."

"Yes, I do say so," interposed the boy. "And I mean to say what I want to say, too, Mr. Eugene Wrayburn!"

Passing him with his eyes as if there were nothing where he stood, Eugene looked on to Bradley Headstone. With consummate indolence he turned to Mortimer, inquiring: "And who may this other person be?"

"I am Charles Hexam's friend," said Bradley; "I am Charles Hexam's schoolmaster."

"My good Sir, you should teach your pupils better manners," returned Eugene.

Composedly smoking, he leaned an elbow on the chimney-piece, at the side of the fire, and looked at the schoolmaster. It was a cruel look, in its cold disdain of him, as a creature of no worth. The schoolmaster looked at him, and that, too, was a cruel look, though of the different kind, that it had a raging jealousy and fiery wrath in it.

Very remarkably, neither Eugene Wrayburn nor Bradley Headstone looked at all at the boy. Through the ensuing dialogue those two, no matter who spoke, or whom was addressed, looked at each other. There was some secret, sure perception between them, which set them against one another in all ways.

"In some high respects, Mr. Eugene Wrayburn," said Bradley, answering him with pale and quivering lips, "the natural feelings of my pupils are stronger than my teaching."

"In most respects, I dare say," replied Eugene, enjoying his cigar, "though whether high or low is of no importance. You have my name very correctly. Pray what is yours?"

"It can not concern you much to know, but—"

"True," interposed Eugene, striking sharply and cutting him short at his mistake, "it does not concern me at all to know. I can say Schoolmaster, which is a most respectable title. You are right, Schoolmaster."

It was not the dulllest part of this goad in its galling of Bradley Headstone, that he had made it himself in a moment of incautious anger. He tried to set his lips so as to prevent their quivering, but they quivered fast.

"Mr. Eugene Wrayburn," said the boy, "I want a word with you. I have wanted it so much that we have looked out your address in the book; and we have been to your office, and we have come from your office here."

"You have given yourself much trouble, Schoolmaster," observed Eugene, blowing the feathery ash from his cigar. "I hope it may prove remunerative."

"And I am glad to speak," pursued the boy, "in presence of Mr. Lightwood, because it was through Mr. Lightwood that you ever saw my sister."

For a mere moment Wrayburn turned his eyes aside from the schoolmaster to note the effect of the last word on Mortimer, who, standing on the opposite side of the fire, as soon as the word was spoken turned his face toward the fire and looked down into it.

"Similarly, it was through Mr. Lightwood that you ever saw her again, for you were with him on the night when my father was found, and so I found you with her on the next day. Since then you have seen my sister often. You have seen my sister oftener and oftener. And I want to know why?"

"Was this worth while, Schoolmaster?" murmured Eugene, with the air of a disinterested adviser. "So much trouble for nothing? You should know best, but I think not."

"I don't know, Mr. Wrayburn," answered Bradley, with his passion rising, "why you address me—"

"Don't you?" said Eugene. "Then I won't."

He said it so tauntingly in his perfect placidity, that the respectable right-hand clutching the respectable hair-guard of the respectable watch could have wound it round his throat and strangled him with it. Not another word did Eugene deem it worth while to utter, but stood leaning his head upon his hand, smoking, and looking imperturbably at the chafing Bradley Headstone with his clutching right-hand, until Bradley was well-nigh mad.

"Mr. Wrayburn," proceeded the boy, "we not only know this that I have charged upon you, but we know more. It has not yet come to my sister's knowledge that we have found it out, but we have. We had a plan, Mr. Headstone and I, for my sister's education, and for its being advised and overlooked by Mr. Headstone, who is a much more competent authority, whatever you may pretend to think, as you smoke, than you could produce, if you tried. Then, what do we find? What do we find, Mr. Lightwood? Why, we find that my sister is already being taught without our knowing it. We find that while my sister gives an unwilling and cold ear to our schemes for her advantage—I, her brother, and Mr. Headstone, the most competent authority, as his certificates would easily prove, that could be produced—she is willfully and willingly profiting by other schemes. Ay, and taking pains too, for I know what such pains are. And so does Mr. Headstone! Well! Somebody pays for this, is a thought that naturally occurs to us; who pays? We apply ourselves to find out, Mr. Lightwood, and we find that your friend, this Mr. Eugene Wrayburn, here, pays. Then I ask him what right has he to do it, and what does he mean by it, and how comes he to be taking such a liberty without my consent, when I am raising myself in the scale of society by my own exertions and Mr. Headstone's aid, and have no right to have any darkness cast upon my prospects, or any imputation upon my respectability through my sister?"

The boyish weakness of this speech, combined with its great selfishness, made it a poor one indeed. And yet Bradley Headstone, used to the little audience of a school, and unused to the larger ways of men, showed a kind of exultation in it.

"Now I tell Mr. Eugene Wrayburn," pursued the boy, forced into the use of the third person by the hopelessness of addressing him in the first, "that I object to his having any acquaintance at all with my sister, and that I request him to drop it altogether. He is not to take it into his head that I am afraid of my sister's caring for him—"

(As the boy sneered, the Master sneered, and Eugene blew off the feathery ash again.)

"—But I object to it, and that's enough. I am more important to my sister than he thinks. As I raise myself, I intend to raise her; she knows that, and she has to look to me for her prospects. Now I understand all this very well, and so does Mr. Headstone. My sister is an excellent girl, but she has some romantic notions; not about such things as your Mr. Eugene Wrayburns, but about the death of my father and other matters of that sort. Mr. Wrayburn encourages those notions to make himself of importance, and so she thinks she ought to be grateful to him, and perhaps even likes to be. Now I don't choose her to be grateful to him, or to be grateful to any body but me, except Mr. Headstone. And I tell Mr. Wrayburn that if he don't take heed of what I say, it will be worse for her. Let him turn that over in his memory, and make sure of it. Worse for her!"

A pause ensued, in which the schoolmaster looked very awkward.

"May I suggest, Schoolmaster," said Eugene, removing his fast-waning cigar from his lips to glance at it, "that you can now take your pupil away."

"And Mr. Lightwood," added the boy, with a burning face, under the flaming aggravation of getting no sort of answer or attention, "I hope you'll take notice of what I have said to your friend, and of what your friend has heard me say, word by word, whatever he pretends to the contrary. You are bound to take notice of it, Mr. Lightwood, for, as I have already mentioned, you first brought your friend into my sister's company, and but for you we never should have seen him. Lord knows none of us ever wanted him, any more than any of us will ever miss him. Now, Mr. Headstone, as Mr. Eugene Wrayburn has been obliged to hear what I had to say, and couldn't help himself, and as I have said it out to the last word, we have done all we wanted to do, and may go."

"Go down stairs, and leave me a moment, Hexam," he returned. The boy complying with an indignant look and as much noise as he could make, swung out of the room; and Lightwood went to the window, and leaned there, looking out.

"You think me of no more value than the dirt under your feet," said Bradley to Eugene, speaking in a carefully weighed and measured tone, or he could not have spoken at all.

"I assure you, Schoolmaster," replied Eugene, "I don't think about you."

"That's not true," returned the other; "you know better."

"That's coarse," Eugene retorted; "but you don't know better."

"Mr. Wrayburn, at least I know very well that it would be idle to set myself against you in insolent words or overbearing manners. That lad who has just gone out could put you to shame in half a dozen branches of knowledge in half an hour, but you can throw him aside like an inferior. You can do as much by me, I have no doubt, beforehand."

"Possibly," remarked Eugene.

"But I am more than a lad," said Bradley, with his clutching hand, "and I WILL be heard, Sir."

"As a schoolmaster," said Eugene, "you are always being heard. That ought to content you."

"But it does not content me," replied the other, white with passion. "Do you suppose that a man, in forming himself for the duties I discharge, and in watching and repressing himself daily to discharge them well, dismisses a man's nature?"

"I suppose you," said Eugene, "judging from what I see as I look at you, to be rather too passionate for a good schoolmaster." As he spoke, he tossed away the end of his cigar.

"Passionate with you, Sir, I admit I am. Passionate with you, Sir, I respect myself for being. But I have not Devils for my pupils."

"For your Teachers, I should rather say," replied Eugene.

"Mr. Wrayburn."

"Schoolmaster."

"Sir, my name is Bradley Headstone."

"As you justly said, my good Sir, your name can not concern me. Now, what more?"

"This more. Oh, what a misfortune is mine," cried Bradley, breaking off to wipe the starting perspiration from his face as he shook from head to foot, "that I can not so control myself as to appear a stronger creature than this, when a man who has not felt in all his life what I have felt in a day can so command himself!" He said it in a very agony, and even followed it with an errant motion of his hands as if he could have torn himself.

Eugene Wrayburn looked on at him, as if he found him beginning to be rather an entertaining study.

"Mr. Wrayburn, I desire to say something to you on my own part."

"Come, come, Schoolmaster," returned Eugene, with a languid approach to impatience as the other again struggled with himself; "say what you have to say. And let me remind you that the door is standing open, and your young friend waiting for you on the stairs."

"When I accompanied that youth here, Sir, I did so with the purpose of adding, as a man whom you should not be permitted to put aside, in case you put him aside as a boy, that his instinct is correct and right." Thus Bradley Headstone, with great effort and difficulty.

"Is that all?" asked Eugene.

"No, Sir," said the other, flushed and fierce. "I strongly support him in his disapproval of your visits to his sister, and in his objection to your officiousness—and worse—in what you have taken upon yourself to do for her."

"Is that all?" asked Eugene.

"No, Sir. I determined to tell you that you are not justified in these proceedings, and that they are injurious to his sister."

"Are you her schoolmaster as well as her brother's?—Or perhaps you would like to be?" said Eugene.

It was a stab that the blood followed, in its rush to Bradley Headstone's face, as swiftly as if it had been dealt with a dagger. "What do you mean by that?" was as much as he could utter.

"A natural ambition enough," said Eugene, coolly. "Far be it from me to say otherwise. The sister—who is something too much upon your lips, perhaps—is so very different from all the associations to which she has been used, and from all the low obscure people about her, that it is a very natural ambition."

"Do you throw my obscurity in my teeth, Mr. Wrayburn?"

"That can hardly be, for I know nothing concerning it, Schoolmaster, and seek to know nothing."

"You reproach me with my origin," said Bradley Headstone; "you cast insinuations at my bringing-up. But I tell you, Sir, I have worked my way onward, out of both and in spite of both, and have a right to be considered a better man than you, with better reasons for being proud."

"How I can reproach you with what is not within my knowledge, or how I can cast stones that were never in my hand, is a problem for the ingenuity of a schoolmaster to prove," returned Eugene. "Is that all?"

"No, Sir. If you suppose that boy—"

"Who really will be tired of waiting," said Eugene, politely.

"If you suppose that boy to be friendless, Mr. Wrayburn, you deceive yourself. I am his friend, and you shall find me so."

"And you will find him on the stairs," remarked Eugene.

"You may have promised yourself, Sir, that you could do what you chose here, because you had to deal with a mere boy, inexperienced, friendless, and unassisted. But I give you warning that this mean calculation is wrong. You have to do with a man also. You have to do with me. I will support him, and, if need be, require reparation for him. My hand and heart are in this cause, and are open to him."

"And—quite a coincidence—the door is open," remarked Eugene.

"I scorn your shifty evasions, and I scorn you," said the schoolmaster. "In the meanness of your nature you revile me with the meanness of my birth. I hold you in contempt for it. But if you don't profit by this visit, and act accordingly, you will find me as bitterly in earnest against you as I could be if I deemed you worth a second thought on my own account."

With a consciously bad grace and stiff manner, as Wrayburn looked so easily and calmly on, he went out with these words, and the heavy door closed like a furnace-door upon his red and white heats of rage.

"A curious monomaniac," said Eugene. "The man seems to believe that every body was acquainted with his mother!"

Mortimer Lightwood being still at the window, to which he had in delicacy withdrawn, Eugene called to him, and he fell to slowly pacing the room.

"My dear fellow," said Eugene, as he lighted another cigar, "I fear my unexpected visitors have been troublesome. If as a set-off (excuse the legal phrase from a barrister-at-law) you would like to ask Tippins to tea, I pledge myself to make love to her."

"Eugene, Eugene, Eugene," replied Mortimer, still pacing the room, "I am sorry for this. And to think that I have been so blind!"

"How blind, dear boy?" inquired his unmoved friend.

"What were your words that night at the river-side public house?" said Lightwood, stopping. "What was it that you asked me? Did I feel like a dark combination of traitor and pickpocket when I thought of that girl?"

"I seem to remember the expression," said Eugene.

"How do you feel when you think of her just now?"

His friend made no direct reply, but observed, after a few whiffs of his cigar, "Don't mistake the situation. There is no better girl in all this London than Lizzie Hexam. There is no better among my people at home; no better among your people."

"Granted. What follows?"

"There," said Eugene, looking after him dubiously as he paced away to the other end of the room, "you put me again upon guessing the riddle that I have given up."

"Eugene, do you design to capture and desert this girl?"

"My dear fellow, no."

"Do you design to marry her?"

"My dear fellow, no."

"Do you design to pursue her?"

"My dear fellow, I don't design any thing. I have no design whatever. I am incapable of designs. If I conceived a design I should speedily abandon it, exhausted by the operation."

"Oh Eugene, Eugene!"

"My dear Mortimer, not that tone of melancholy reproach, I entreat. What can I do more than tell you all I know, and acknowledge my ignorance of all I don't know! How does that little old song go, which, under pretense of being cheerful, is by far the most lugubrious I ever heard in my life?

'Away with melancholy,
Nor doleful changes ring
On life and human folly,
But merrily, merrily sing
Fal la!"

Don't let us sing Fal la, my dear Mortimer (which is comparatively unmeaning), but let us sing that we give up guessing the riddle altogether."

"Are you in communication with this girl, Eugene, and is what these people say true?"

"I concede both admissions to my honorable and learned friend."

"Then what is to come of it? What are you doing? Where are you going?"

"My dear Mortimer, one would think the schoolmaster had left behind him a catechising infection. You are ruffled by the want of another cigar. Take one of these, I entreat. Light it at mine, which is in perfect order. So! Now do me the justice to observe that I am doing all I can toward self-improvement, and that you have a light thrown on those household implements which, when you only saw them as in a glass darkly, you were hastily—I must say hastily—inclined to depreciate. Sensible of my deficiencies, I have surrounded myself with moral influences expressly meant to promote the formation of the domestic virtues. To those influences, and to the improving society of my friend from boyhood, commend me with your best wishes."

"Ah, Eugene!" said Lightwood, affectionately, now standing near him, so that they both stood in one little cloud of smoke; "I would that you answered my three questions! What is to come of it? What are you doing? Where are you going?"

"And my dear Mortimer," returned Eugene, lightly fanning away the smoke with his hand for the better exposition of his frankness of face and manner, "believe me, I would answer them instantly if I could. But to enable me to do so, I must first have found out the troublesome conundrum long abandoned. Here it is. Eugene Wrayburn." Tapping his forehead and breast. "Riddle-me, riddle-me-ree, perhaps you can't tell me what this may be?—No, upon my life, I can't. I give it up!"

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

THE present Number being the first of a Volume is issued earlier than usual. Our Record closes on the 21st of October, embracing the events of the preceding three weeks.

The approaching Presidential election, which will be decided before this Number is issued, and political speculations connected with it, has taken precedence in public interest even of the important military events of the time. State elections were held in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana on the 11th of October. Special importance was attached to these on account of the indications furnished by them of the probable result of the approaching Presidential election. Both parties at first claimed what was equivalent to a decided victory in all of these States. The precise actual result is still in doubt, owing to the delay occasioned by the counting of the vote of the soldiers. In Pennsylvania the election was for Members of Congress. The home vote was very close; but the probability is that upon this vote the Democrats have a small aggregate majority, which it is supposed will be considerably counterbalanced by the soldiers' vote; the probability is that the Union party has gained from two to four members of Congress.—In Ohio the election was also for Members of Congress. The Union majority upon the home vote was large (probably about 30,000), though much less than at the previous election, and this will be increased by the soldiers' vote. They also gain several Members of Congress.—In Indiana the election was for Governor and Members of Congress. Here, contrary to expectation, the Democrats suffered a decided defeat. Governor Morton, the Union candidate, being re-elected by a majority of probably 20,000, the party also gaining several Members of Congress. In this State the soldiers absent from their homes do not vote.

An election was held in Maryland, on the 12th of October, to decide upon the adoption of a new Constitution providing for the abolition of Slavery. The vote was light, owing in a measure to the requirement of an oath of loyalty from voters. There was, probably, a small majority against the Constitution on the home vote; but this is presumed to be overcome by the soldiers' vote.

Toward the close of September Jefferson Davis made a journey to Georgia. In the course of this he made several speeches upon the posture of affairs. The most elaborate of these was delivered at Macon on the 23d of September. He said that it would have gladdened his heart to have met his auditors in prosperity instead of adversity. Still, though misfortune had befallen the Confederates from Decatur to Jonesborough, the cause was not lost. Sooner or later Sherman must retreat, and then he would meet the fate that befell Napoleon in the retreat from Moscow. He had been accused of abandoning Georgia to her fate. The man who made this charge was a scoundrel. [This was understood to refer to Governor Brown of Georgia.] He knew the deep disgrace felt by Georgia at the army falling back from Dalton to the interior of the State; but he was not one who felt that Atlanta was lost when the army crossed the Chattahoochee, and he had put a man at the head of the army who would strike a manly blow for the city. It did not become him to revert to disaster. Hood's army must be replenished. "Let," he said, "the old men remain at home and make bread; but should they know of any young man keeping away from the service, who can not be made to go any other way, let them write to the Executive. You have not many men left between the ages of eighteen and forty-five. The boys are, as rapidly as they become old enough, going to the field. It is not proper," he continued, "to speak of the number of men in the field; but this I will say—that two-thirds of our men are absent, some sick, some wounded, but most of them absent without leave." We had been asked to send reinforcements from Virginia to Georgia; but the disparity in numbers was as great in Virginia as in Georgia. The army under Early had been sent to the Valley of the Shenandoah, instead of to Georgia, because the enemy had penetrated to Lynchburg; and now (that is, at the close of September), if Early was withdrawn, there was nothing to prevent the Federal troops from putting a complete cordon of men around Richmond. He had counseled with General Lee upon all these points; his mind had roamed over the whole field, and his conclusion was that "if one half of the men now absent from the field would return to duty, we can defeat the enemy. With that hope I am now going to the front. I may not realize this hope; but I know that there are men there who have looked death too often in the face to despond now." This speech was repeated in substance at several other places.

An order of the Confederate War Office, dated October 5, directs that all details heretofore granted to persons between the ages of eighteen and forty-five shall be revoked, and that all persons detailed, together with those who hold temporary furloughs and exemptions, shall assemble at the several camps of instruction, and will be at once assigned among the armies for service; but men now actively engaged in producing or collecting munitions and supplies will for the present be continued in these employments. The heads of Departments are directed within twenty days to furnish lists of all detailed men in the several States, specifying those whose services are absolutely indispensable for Government work or business; all not so specified to be forthwith assigned to the army; and all men found for light duty who do not at once report to the camps of instruction to be assigned to the active force.

By various laws now existing in the Confederacy all free negroes between the ages of 18 and 45 are made liable to perform military duty upon fortifications and in Government works. The Secretary of War is also empowered to employ in a similar manner 20,000 slaves, the owners to be paid in case of their escape or death. If they can not be hired they may be impressed. The Southern papers urge that these laws shall be carried into immediate execution. The Richmond Enquirer of October 6 also urges that free negroes and slaves shall be employed as soldiers. It recommends that the Confederate Congress shall purchase 250,000 negroes, present them with their freedom, grant them the privilege of remaining in the States, and arm, equip, drill, and fight them. It says that these freedmen could be depended upon not only for ordinary services, but for the hardest fighting.—A letter from Henry W. Allen, Governor of Louisiana, to Mr. Seddon, the Confederate Secretary of War, dated September 26, has been captured, in which he urges the employment of negroes as soldiers. He says: "The time has come for us to put into the army every able-bodied negro man as a soldier. This should be done immediately.... We have learned from dear-bought experience that negroes can be taught to fight, and that all who leave us are made to fight against us. I would free all able to bear arms, and put them into the field at once. They will make much better soldiers with us than against us, and swell the now depleted ranks of our armies."

The existence of an organized conspiracy in the Western and Northwestern States, with accomplices in other portions of the country, has been for some months known to the Government. Some of the conspirators have been arrested, and the results of their trial have been summed up by Mr. Holt, the Judge-Advocate. The essential points are that a secret society has been formed, known by different names in different localities. Its "temples," or "lodges," are numerous scattered through the States of Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Missouri, and Kentucky, and less frequently in many other States—every State, it is said, being represented. Its first "Supreme Commander" was P. C. Wright, the acting editor of a newspaper in New York called the Daily News, the ostensible editor of which is Benjamin Wood, a member of the Federal Congress. Wright was arrested and imprisoned in Fort Lafayette. He was, according to Judge Holt, succeeded by Clement L. Vallandigham, of Ohio. The number of members is variously stated at from 300,000 to 1,000,000; Vallandigham claimed in a public speech that there were 500,000. This society, or order, is in close affiliation with the Confederate leaders. Its organization is military, and the members are in possession of a large number of arms. Its leading principles are the right of slavery; the absolute sovereignty of the States; the right of secession of a State; and the right of resistance to Federal authority. Its specific objects at present are to aid soldiers to desert; to protect deserters; to discourage enlistments; to resist the draft; to circulate disloyal publications; to give intelligence to the enemy; to aid recruiting for the enemy; to furnish them with arms and ammunition; to co-operate with them in raids; to destroy Government property; to harass Union men in the Border States; and finally to establish a North-western Confederacy. Judge Holt furnishes an immense mass of evidence in support of these allegations.

It has been affirmed that many of the leading men of Georgia, including Governor Brown and Alexander H. Stephens, were in favor of that State withdrawing from the Confederacy and making a separate peace; and that negotiations to that effect had been opened with General Sherman. The Governor has authorized the publication of a statement explanatory of his position in the matter. He says that a Mr. King brought to him a message from General Sherman to the effect that he would be pleased to confer with him and others upon the state of the country, with a view to a settlement of the difficulties, and would give him a pass through the Federal lines, going and returning, for that purpose. To this the Governor replied that he as Governor of a State, and General Sherman as a commander of an army in the field, had no authority to enter upon negotiations for peace. Georgia might perhaps be overrun, but could not be subjugated, and would never treat with a conqueror upon her soil. That while Georgia possessed the sovereign power to act separately, her faith had been pledged by implication to her Southern sisters, and she would not exercise this power without their consent and co-operation. She had entered into the contest knowing all the responsibilities which it involved, and would never withdraw from it with dishonor. "She will never," he says, "make separate terms with the enemy, which may free her territory from invasion and leave her confederates in the lurch. Whatever may be the opinion of her people as to the injustice done her by the Confederate Administration, she will triumph with her confederate sisters, or she will sink with them in common ruin.... the independent expression of condemnation of the measures of the Administration is one thing, and disloyalty to our sacred cause is another and quite a different thing." If Mr. Lincoln would stop the war, let him, says Governor Brown, recognize the sovereignty of the States, and leave to each to determine for herself whether she will return to the old Union or remain in her present league. If Presidents Lincoln and Davis would agree to stop the war, and leave the settlement of the question to the ballot-box instead of the battle-field, bloodshed would cease, and prosperity be restored. If not, the war would last for years, and neither General Sherman nor the Governor of Georgia could control this issue however they might deplore it. But, he concludes, if those who have the Constitutional power of negotiation refuse to recognize the sovereignty of the States, then, all the States, north and south, in their official capacity, may be justified in taking the matter into their own hands, and settling the question in their own way.—Alexander H. Stephens has also published a letter setting forth his views on the state of affairs. He says, in substance, that he sees no way in which he can do any thing to bring about peace. The only solution for present and prospective troubles is "the simple recognition of the fundamental principle of the sovereignty—the ultimate absolute sovereignty—of the States." The idea that the old Union, or any Union between sovereign States, can be maintained by force is preposterous; the subjugation of the people of the South by those of the North would involve the overthrow of the liberties of both sections. The platform of the Chicago Convention presented a ray of light. Its prominent idea was the suspension of hostilities in order that a Convention of the States might be held. To such a Convention, as a peaceful conference between equal and sovereign powers, he would have no objection. The authorities at Richmond and Washington might agree upon such a Convention; but he should be opposed to leaving the questions at issue to such a body; they might agree upon a plan of adjustment to be valid only when ratified by the States, and binding only upon such as ratify it.

On September 24, Sheridan had driven Early out of the Shenandoah Valley. It had taken him less than a single week to accomplish this important result, during which time he had gained two decisive victories at Winchester and at Fisher's Hill. Sheridan's main army halted at Harrisonburg. Here the enemy had left 800 of their wounded, who fell into the hands of the Federal commander. From this point cavalry expeditions were dispatched to various points: to Port Republic, where seventy-five wagons and four caissons were destroyed; to Staunton, where were destroyed large quantities of Confederate war-material; and to Waynesborough, on the railroad from Staunton to Gordonsville, where the iron railroad-bridge across South River was demolished, and a large portion of the road torn up. No attempt was made against Lynchburg, nor was Early pursued toward Richmond. Sheridan had determined to destroy all the grain and other provision in the southern portion of the Valley; also, in Luray and Fort Valleys, and then to retreat. This determination was no doubt influenced by the length of his line of communication and the frequent attacks of guerrillas in his rear. On the 7th of October Sheridan's command had fallen back from Harrisonburg, nearly thirty miles, to Woodstock, having completed the work of devastation in the Valley above that point. The destruction of property involved the ruin of two thousand barns filled with wheat, hay, and farming implements; of seventy mills filled with flour and wheat, and the capture of over four thousand head of stock, besides a number of horses. Upon Sheridan's retreat he was followed by the Confederate army considerably reinforced, and placed, it was said, under new leadership, Longstreet having superseded Early. The cavalry under Rosser had the advance. This column Sheridan attacked with his cavalry October 9, and gained a victory, capturing eleven guns and forty-seven wagons. Over three hundred prisoners were taken, and Rosser was driven "on the jump 26 miles, through Mount Jackson and across the north fork of the Shenandoah." From Woodstock Sheridan fell back beyond Strasburg to Cedar Creek. Here he was attacked by General Early, whose entire army had been brought up, on the 19th of October, precisely one month after the battle of Winchester. The attack was made before daylight. Sheridan himself was fifteen miles away at Winchester. At first every thing promised a great success to the enemy. The Federal line ran nearly north and south, on the mountain ridge northeast of Strasburg, the left being held by the Eighth Corps. The left flank of this Corps was turned and the line thrown into confusion. The Federals abandoned their position and were driven four miles, losing 20 pieces of artillery. Sheridan arrived on the field before noon and re-formed the line, when he was again attacked by Early at 1 o'clock P.M. The attack was repulsed. At 3 P.M. Sheridan attacked the enemy "with great vigor, driving and routing the enemy, capturing 50 pieces of artillery and very many prisoners." The enemy lost heavily in trains, some of which they were obliged to burn.

After Sheridan's victories over Early in the latter part of September General Grant determined to press Lee's army in their intrenchments covering Richmond and Petersburg. His movements were directed against either flank of the enemy. During the night of the 28th the Tenth and Eighteenth corps, by different crossings, were transferred to the north side of the James River. The Eighteenth Corps, under General Ord, advanced along the Varina Road the next morning and carried the outer line of works below Chapin's Farm. Fort Harrison, mounted with heavy artillery and occupying a commanding position below Fort Darling, constituted the main defense at this point. It was not, however, well manned, and before reinforcements could be brought up resistance had become useless. Two or three hundred prisoners were taken and sixteen guns. General Ord was slightly wounded and compelled to leave the field, his command devolving on General Godfrey Weitzel. General Stannard also was wounded, and General Burnham killed. Simultaneously with this advance the Tenth Corps, General Birney, moved on the Kingsland Road. At the junction of this road with the Newmarket Road the enemy was met and the works at Newmarket Heights were carried. An unsuccessful attack was made on Fort Gilmer, at Laurel Hill, four or five miles nearer Richmond on the Newmarket Road. On the same day, and while the fighting was going on at Laurel Hill, General Kautz led his cavalry along the road as far as to the toll-gate, two miles from Richmond. It was found by this reconnaissance that there were no formidable defenses until within four miles of the city. Conscious of their weakness at this point the Confederates attacked on the 30th, and endeavored to penetrate the Federal lines near the junction of the two Corps. Two assaults were made, at a great sacrifice of life on the part of the assailants, but with no success.

While Lee was massing his forces on his left, on the 30th, Meade, with the Fifth and Ninth corps, advanced from his position on the Weldon Railroad. He first encountered the enemy at Peeble's Farm, a short distance west of the Weldon Railroad. The Confederate position was carried, the enemy falling back to his fortifications covering the Southside Railroad. Here the battle was renewed, but with ill-success. A brilliant charge made upon the works failed; and as the Fifth and Ninth corps withdrew the Confederates made a counter-charge, and penetrating the Federal lines, took a large number of prisoners. An unsuccessful attack was made the next day on Ayre's division of the Fifth Corps; and in the afternoon Hampton's cavalry, engaging Gregg's, was driven back.

Returning to the north side of the James we find matters remaining as we left them, until October 7, when the Confederates made another attack, this time on the extreme right, on the Darbytown Road, held by Terry's division, with Kautz's cavalry some distance in advance. Kautz, outnumbered, was soon compelled to withdraw, in doing which he lost eight guns. The enemy followed, and advancing through the woods attempted to flank Terry's right. Two assaults were made, in which the enemy's loss was estimated at 1000. Kautz's loss had been nearly 300. Terry, being protected, suffered but slightly, maintaining his position and driving the Confederates from the field.

At the close of September the Confederate General Price entered Missouri with an army variously estimated in strength, but probably numbering nearly 20,000 men. On the 27th the main body of Price's army was in the vicinity of Fredericktown, in the southwestern part of the State. He has carefully avoided a battle, except on a small scale and against separate detachments of the Federal forces in Southern Missouri. One of these detachments was situated at Pilot Knob, near Ironton, at the junction of the railroad leading from Fredericktown with the Iron Mountain Railroad. General Ewing was in command of the small garrison at this point. The position is similar to that at Harper's Ferry, being commanded by mountains on every side. At first Price attempted to advance up the valley and carry the place by assault, and was severely repulsed. But when he took to the mountain-sides Ewing abandoned his position and fell back toward Rolla. It was a running fight, and Ewing was nearly surrounded, when, by the help of forces sent to his assistance, he escaped, and continued his march to Rolla without difficulty. The Federal commander, General Rosecrans, has concentrated all his available force at Jefferson City. October 7, Price made a demonstration against this place, but this was only a feint to enable his forces to cross the Osage River. In a proclamation to the people of the State Price has declared his intention to remain among them.

Since General Sherman took possession of Atlanta every possible effort has been made by Hood and Forrest to so interrupt his communications as to render it necessary for him to retreat. So far as these attempts have been developed they appear to have utterly failed of their object. About the same time that Price entered Missouri, Forrest crossed the Tennessee and took Athens, in Northern Alabama, securing the garrison of 500 men, together with 300 sent on to their support. This town was situated on the railroad from Nashville to Decatur, which was considerably injured by the raiders, numbering nearly 7000, who immediately moved against Pulaski, seventy-five miles south of Nashville. To this point Rousseau advanced and offered battle, which Forrest declined, moving eastward to attack the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, which Rousseau took measures to guard by moving his army to Tullahoma. There Forrest again avoided battle, returning westward to complete his work on the other road. In the mean time the Tennessee was rising, and Sherman had dispatched General Thomas to attend to Forrest, who now retraced his route across the swollen river.

On the 19th of September Hood began to move his army from the Macon to the West Point Railroad. This was but preliminary to another movement which he soon afterward made, cutting loose from his communications, crossing the Chattahoochee, and interposing his army between General Sherman and Chattanooga. He followed very much the same route which Sherman had taken in approaching Atlanta. Crossing the Chattahoochee October 2, he moved on Dallas. Sherman had to build new bridges over the Chattahoochee before he could follow the enemy; his preparations were completed by the 4th, and he then crossed the greater portion of his army, leaving a small garrison at Atlanta. General Corse, with the Fourth Division of the Fifteenth Corps had been sent to Rome. As soon as Sherman knew that Hood was moving on Dallas, and that Allatoona would be attacked, he ordered Corse to the latter place. Here a million and a half of rations had been stored. French's Division of Stewart's Corps was sent to attack the position. By the 6th Sherman had reached Kenesaw with his main column. He was not in time, however, to reach Allatoona before it had been attacked and the battle decided, though he witnessed the conflict from Kenesaw. The position was successfully held by Corse, who lost 700 out of about 1700. The Confederate loss was 200 killed and over 1000 wounded and prisoners. The enemy had taken Big Shanty and Ackworth, south of Allatoona, and destroyed a few miles of the road. Upon Sherman's arrival on his flank and rear, however, Hood began to retreat toward the southwest.

For many months past considerable numbers of Confederates have been collected in Canada and the adjacent British Provinces, who have formed several plots for raids upon our Northern borders. A number of these have been frustrated by the action of the British authorities, and by information furnished by them. But two, at least, have been carried into partial effect. A few weeks ago a party organized in Canada crossed to the American side, and captured two small steamers on Lake Erie, which were burned, the actual perpetrators making their escape into Canada. A more daring enterprise was undertaken during October in Vermont. About the 10th a considerable number of strangers were observed at the hotels in the village of St. Albans, about fifteen miles from the Canada line. Their numbers gradually increased, but as there appeared to be no connection between these persons, no special attention was excited. On the 19th these strangers began a sudden onslaught. A part of them rushed to each of the three banks, presented pistols, overpowered the officers, and plundered the contents of the safes, amounting to a large sum. This accomplished, they rushed into the streets, firing at the passers-by, killing and wounding several. A portion of them hurried to the livery and other stables and seized horses, upon which the whole gang were soon mounted and on their way back to Canada. The whole affair lasted only half an hour; and the citizens were so completely taken by surprise that no immediate resistance was offered. Parties were, however, soon started in pursuit, following the marauders into Canada, where a number of them were captured, the Canadian authorities aiding.

For some time a project of a consolidated Government over and union between the British possessions in North America has been entertained, with the approval of the Home Government. A Convention of delegates from the several provinces, to consider this question, was convened at Quebec on the 10th of October; and a general plan was subsequently agreed upon. Its leading features are that the chief powers of the Government will be committed to the Central legislative body. This will consist of two Houses. The Upper, composed of 76 members, to be selected by the Crown from the members of the existing provincial Upper Houses. Of these, Upper and Lower Canada are to have 24 each, Nova Scotia 11, New Brunswick 10, Newfoundland 4, Prince Edward's Island 3. In the Lower House the Representatives are to be apportioned periodically according to population. It was left to the Imperial Parliament to decide whether the Governor-General should be elected or appointed by the Crown. The question of the adoption of this plan is to be left to the decision of the existing Provincial Parliaments, not to the people of the Provinces.

Editor's Easy Chair.

IT was a strange chance which rolled the Easy Chair, the other evening, into an opera-house. It was strange, because in the midst of a terrible war, involving such vital interests to the country and to every citizen, it seems as if the popular mind and heart must be too tensely strung to permit such diversion of attention as an opera. But there it was, exactly as it used to be. There were the bright rows of pretty women and men; the white and fanciful opera-cloaks—the gay rich dresses—the floating ribbons—the marvelous chevelures—the pearl-gray, the dove, and “tan” gloves, holding the jeweled fans and the beautiful bouquets—the smile, the sparkle, the grace, the superb and irresistible dandyism that we all know so well in the days of golden youth—they were all there, and the warm atmosphere was sweet with the thick odor of heliotrope, the very scent of haute société.

The house was full: the opera was “Faust,” and by one of the exquisite felicities of the stage, the hero, a mild, ineffective gentleman sang his ditties and passionate bursts in Italian, while the poor Gretchen vowed and rouladed in the German tongue. Certainly nothing is more comical than the careful gravity with which people of the highest civilization look on at the absurd incongruities of the stage. After the polyglot love-making, Gretchen goes up steps and enters a house. Presently she opens a window at which she evidently could not appear as she does breast high, without having her feet in the cellar. The Italian Faust rushes, ascends three steps leading to the window, which could not by any possibility appropriately be found there, and reclines his head upon the bosom of the fond maid. We all look on and applaud with “sensation.” We ought all to insist that ladies in the play shall stand upon the floor, and that the floor in a stately mansion shall not be two feet below the front door-sill. We ought to demand, further, that Faust shall woo Gretchen in their mother tongue; but we, the ludicrous public, who snarl at the carpenter and shoemaker, if the fitness of things is not observed; we, the shrewd critics, who pillory the luckless painter who dresses a gentleman of the Restoration in the ruff of James First’s court, gaze calmly on at the most unnecessary and ridiculous anachronisms and impossibilities, and smite our perfumed gloves in approbation. It is no excuse to say that the whole thing is absurd; that people do not carry on the business of life in song, nor expire in recitative. That is true, but even fairy tales have their consistency. Every part is adapted to every other, and, in the key, the whole is harmonious. Hermann, for instance, the basso, who sang Mephistophiles, would have been quite perfect if he had only remembered this. But he forgot that Mephisto is a sly and subtle devil. He caricatured him. He made him a buffoon and repulsive. Such extravagance could not have imposed upon Faust or Martha; yet we all agreed that it was very fine, and amiably applauded what no opera-goer of sense could seriously approve.

You see it is clear that the strangeness of the scene and the circumstances of the time had made the Easy Chair hypercritical, perhaps. But no; it was only that there comes a time in theatre-going when the boxes are more interesting than the stage. The mimic life fades before the real. In the midst of the finest phrases of the impassioned Herr Faust, what if your truant eyes stray across the parquette and see a slight pale figure, and recognize one of the bravest and most daring Generals, whose dashing assaults upon the enemy’s works carried dismay and victory day after day? Herr Faust trills on, but you see the sombre field, and the desperate battle, and the glorious cause. Gretchen musically sighs, but you see the brave boys lying where they fell—you hear the deep sullen roar of the cannonade—you catch far away through the tumult of war the fierce shout of victory. And there sits the slight pale figure with eyes languidly fixed upon the stage; his heart musing upon other scenes; himself the unconscious hero of a living drama.

Or, if you choose to lift your eyes, you see that woman with the sweet fair face, composed, not sad, turned with placid interest toward the loves of Gretchen and Faust. She sees the eager delight of the meeting; she hears the ardent vow; she knows the rapture of the embrace. With placid interest she watches all—she, and the sedate husband by her side. And yet when her eyes wander it is to see that man in the parquette below her on the other side, who between the acts rises with the rest and surveys the house, and looks at her as at all the others. At this distance you can not say if any softer color steals into that placid face; you can not tell if his survey lingers longer upon her than upon the rest. Yet she was Gretchen once, and he was Faust. There is no moonlight romance, no garden ecstasy, poorly feigned upon the stage, that is not burned with eternal fire into their memories. Night after night they come. They do not especially like this music. They are not infatuated with these singers. They have seats for the season; she with her husband, he in the chairs by the orchestra. She has a pleasant home and sweet children and a kind mate, and is not unhappy. He is at ease in his fortunes, and content. They do not come here that they may see each other. They meet elsewhere as all acquaintances meet. They cherish no morbid repining, no sentimental regret. But every night there is an opera, and the theme of every opera is love; and once, ah! once, she was Gretchen and he was Faust.

Do you see? These are three out of the three thousand. There is nothing to mark them from the rest. Look at them all, and remember that all have their history; and that it is known, as this one is, to some other old Easy Chair, sitting in the parquette and spying round the house. “All the world’s a stage, and men and women merely players.” Is it quite so? Are these players? The young pale General there, the placid woman, the man in the orchestra stall, have they been playing only? There are scars upon that young soldier’s flesh; in the most secret drawer of that woman’s home there is a dry, yellow flower; the man in the orchestra stall could show you a tress of golden hair. If they are players, who is in earnest?

In these bright autumn days we have been seeing and sharing, all of us, the most imposing spectacle that history offers. A great nation, torn by civil war, goes quietly to the polls and casts the ballot which is to determine its destiny. There have been threats and rumors and suspicions. Evil-disposed journals, desiring what they dare not counsel, have insinuated the inevitability of tumult and vital disorder. But all such incitements, while they may, and often do lead, as they are intended, to riots and mobs, are not likely to lead to more, simply because they always have the French Revolution in mind, while Americans are not Frenchmen, nor the year 1864 in America what 1793 was in France.

The most solemn humbug that does duty as a profound historical reflection is, that history repeats itself. History does no such thing. History affords no illustration of this most pompous and absurd remark. Neither French, English, nor American history repeats itself, nor that of Greece, or India, or Rome. Because there have always been civil wars in every form of society, to say that our war shows that our republic is a failure, or that it merely repeats the story of other republics, is as conspicuous folly as to say that Mr. Lincoln repeats Aristides, or General M'Clellan Alcibiades. They are all of them men, and men of different qualities; they are men with certain resemblances, also, but the time, the country, the circumstances, make them entirely different men.

Charles First lost his head in a revolution in England: Louis Sixteenth in a revolution in France. But because these two facts are similar, was the French Revolution a repetition of that of England? On the contrary, they were as different as the countries and the characters of the people—as different as an Independent from a sans-culotte—as different as Oliver Cromwell from Robespierre.

So the reasoning which assumes that the only party sure of safety in a civil war is the middle party, is equally fallacious. The Presbyterians were the middle party of the English rebellion of 1695. The Girondists of the French Revolution of 1793. But they were both of them parties which did not understand the movements in which they were enveloped, and therefore could not control them. A civil war is a contest between two fervent tendencies, and one or the other inevitably colors the final event. There may be reactions as there were in England, and as there have been in France. But the supreme royal prerogative was lost forever in England in the civil war. The Cavaliers, that is to say, were ultimately defeated; and the King by the grace of God disappeared forever from France in the following century.

The master passions of human nature are indeed always the same; but they are affected by the conditions of civilization. And it is exactly because civilization is never stationary, but always progressive, that history neither does nor can repeat itself. A reign of terror, for instance, is inconceivable in the free States of this country for two reasons: first, because the general intelligence and national character, which is not Celtic, forbid it; and, second, because experience shows it to have been impracticable. It has been really tried and failed. The spirit which generated the rebellion would have produced terrorism, had it been possible; but it could not.

Of course riots and bloody trouble are always possible in great heterogeneous communities like ours. The Catholic riots in Philadelphia some years ago; the draft riots in New York last year, like the Gordon riots in London at the close of the last century, are illustrations of the way in which popular rage vents itself. And yet in all these cases it is not what are called "the people," but the leaders who are truly guilty. It is those who inflame the passions of ignorance, who, under cover of warnings from history, endeavor to incite mobs and to create disorder, it is these—newspapers and orators—who are truly guilty, and whom a just and generous people will hold pilloried in their eternal scorn.

HOWEVER bright, it has been a cold and cruel autumn, and the old discussion of the Indian Summer has not failed. There are men to be found, apparently in full mental health, who assert and tenaciously maintain that the rich yellow days of October are the Indian Summer. Deluded by the tender warmth and soft haze, they feel a spring of emotion responsive to something peculiar and lovely in the season, and heedlessly declare that it is the exquisite moment of the year which typifies the sweet regrets of age, and which we call the Indian Summer.

But they forget that the French call the same season the Summer of St. Martin, and that Martinmas is in early November. Nor have they probably heard Daniel Webster discuss the subject. But when the Easy Chair was a mere foot-stool it remembers seeing Mr. Webster, who had come to a country town in New England to conduct a famous cause in the court, in company with Rufus Choate. It was in the autumn, and the little town was agog with the presence of the great man. He staid at the house of a worthy citizen, and every day there arrived from the city baskets of gorgeous flowers and magnificent fruits, little compliments that he paid the hostess. There was an Oriental profusion in his gratitude, a kind of sublime recklessness, which was characteristic of him. Nor was it unpleasant until it was considered with reference to the possibility of somebody's suffering at last for his grand bounty. Webster spent like a monarch, but he had not a monarch's revenues. And in the contemplation of all such careers, where the men themselves seem to be of the most truly generous mould, as in the case of Sheridan, it is not possible to forget the poor woman or poor man, who can ill bear it, and upon whom the loss must finally fall. The rich and noble gifts of that autumn week were doubtless paid for by somebody, so that we need waste no sympathy but indulge our fullest admiration of the lordly style in which the presents came.

But such had been the adulation offered him that Mr. Webster always moved and spoke as he looked, like an acknowledged king of men. What dun could dare the latent lightnings of his eye? There was a great deal of morose remark at the pecuniary assistance he received from friends. But in itself, if he were man of character enough to control himself, that was not wrong. The admirers of so conspicuous a leader delight always to show their admiration. The British people give peerages and estates. Marlborough receives Blenheim, Nelson is made a baron. The funds that were privately subscribed for Mr. Webster were only our way of doing the same thing. There is no evidence that he viewed them, nor need any one else, as retainers. They came from men who sympathized with him after his mind was made up on great public questions.

But we were speaking of the Indian Summer.

In that autumn week he talked a great deal of many subjects, showing a pleasant knowledge of them, and the hearty interest in them which belonged to a warm, large, full-blooded nature. Webster was one of the men in whom there is a great deal of human nature. There was nothing mean or thin in his enjoyment. His delight in certain aspects and conditions of nature was unquestionable.

He "loved" fishing and chowder with a generous love. He breathed the fresh air with the eagerness of a boy. He knew birds, although rather as game, and beasts and fishes. There was much of the tough, breezy, New Hampshire granite in his composition, and it never disappeared.

Thus he knew all the theories of the Indian Summer and many of the traditions. His own conviction was that the season took its name from the camp-fires of the Indians hunting. The early settlers were forced to some plain explanation, and they were satisfied with that. The name was pleasant and peculiar, and so grew into easy use. As yet Evangeline was not. If it had been, Daniel Webster, in his round, ponderous voice, would have rolled out the beautiful lines:

"Then followed that beautiful season,
Called by the pious Acadian peasants the Summer of All-Saints!
Filled was the air with a dreamy and magical light;
and the landscape
Lay as if new created in all the freshness of childhood.
Peace seemed to reign upon earth, and the restless heart of the ocean
Was for a moment consoled. All sounds were in harmony blended.
Voices of children at play, the crowing of cocks in the farm-yards,
Whir of wings in the drowsy air, and the cooing of pigeons,
All were subdued and low as the murmurs of love, and the great sun
Looked with the eye of love through the golden vapors around him;
While arrayed in its robes of russet and scarlet and yellow,
Bright with the sheen of the dew, each glittering tree of the forest Flashed like the plane-tree the Persian adorned with mantles and jewels."

A FAMOUS English author, who began to write seventy years ago, before Scott, Byron, Campbell, and Southey, has just died in Florence. The author of the "Imaginary Conversations," Walter Savage Landor, will always hold a place in English literature both for the vigor of his thought, the nervous purity of his style, and the ardor of his imagination. Fiery is the word for Landor. After he was eighty years old he was found guilty of a libel upon a lady, his neighbor, and sentenced to pay a thousand pounds damages. Instantly he spurned the soil of England with his flying feet, and hastened back to the olive groves of Fiesole, where so many of his years had been passed; and there, on the 17th of September, nearly ninety years old, the fiery old man died.

No one who ever personally met him—which was not the good fortune of this Easy Chair—will ever forget him. Indeed the impression he made upon those who saw much of him was so profound that it vivified all their stories of him, so that the listener seemed both to see and hear him. Rich, gifted, of the most various, accurate, and profound scholarship, boundlessly wayward and imperious, he flashed and stormed through a life, the circumstances of which were tranquil and retired.

He went to Oxford as a boy; chose a literary life, supported by an income granted by his father; went to Paris, and, upon his father's death, sold a large part of the landed estate that had been in the Landor family for seven hundred years, and withdrew to the Continent. In 1808 he raised a troop of volunteers and joined the Spanish patriots against Napoleon. When King Ferdinand was restored, and after the fall of Napoleon, he retired to Fiesole, near Florence, and passed the most of his life there. It was during his Italian residence that he wrote most of his works, the chief of which is the "Imaginary Conversations of Literary Men and Statesmen." But he wrote almost to the end of his life: his latest work being "The last Fruit off an old Tree."

Landor was a republican of the school of Algon Sidney. His liberal sympathies were always ardent if not always wise; and to find the second volume of his most dainty and exquisite "Pericles and Aspasia" dedicated to General Jackson produces an emotion like that of hearing the same doughty personage dubbed LL.D. by Harvard University. It is thus that Landor apostrophizes Jackson:

"How rare the sight, how grand!
Behold the golden scales of Justice stand
Self-balanced in a mailed hand!

Following the calm Deliverer of Mankind,
In thee again we find
This spectacle renew'd.
Glory although there be
To leave thy country free,
Glory had reacht not there her plenitude.

Up, every son of Afric soil!
Ye worn and weary, hoist the sail!
For your own glebes and garners toil
With easy plow and lightsome flail:
A father's home ye never knew,
A father's home your sons shall have from you."

The five volumes of the "Imaginary Conversations" were also dedicated to political heroes. The first to Major-General Stopford, Adjutant-General in the army of Colombia. The second to the Spanish patriot, General Espoz y Mina. The third to Bolivar the Liberator. The fourth to General Sir Robert Wilson, and the fifth to the Earl of Guildford, who founded a University in the Ionian islands. Yet with all this enthusiasm for liberals in politics Landor was, it is said, faithful in his friendship for Louis Napoleon to the last. An irascible, imperious, brilliant, accomplished man, with a trained mind and untrained character, he fascinated old and young, and will be always a favorite author with those who like him at all. Doubtless elaborate justice will be done to his remarkable powers by the British Reviews.

Editor's Drawer.

ANOTHER new volume of the Monthly opens with the Number you are reading now. In spite of war the past year has been one of the brightest the Drawer has ever had. The camp and the field, the ship and the shore, have all sent their humors here, and we have told them to our friends the land over. And has it not been a cheery spot in the waste and fret and sadness that such times bring, when you have sat down of an evening and looked for a little while on the bright side of things? Not a word has been in the Drawer to give pain to any living soul; that is saying much for the Drawer, and let him dispute it who can.

How many lonely hours it has helped away! How many social hours it has gladdened in the home-circle, with wife and children laughing gayly over the pleasant things that come out when the Drawer is opened!

It would be hard to say how many. But the Publishers wish the Drawer readers to know that the circulation of the Magazine was greater the last year than it has been at any time within the last four years. And it is growing all the time as the area of freedom, intelligence, civilization, and order extends under the Star-Spangled Banner.

Long may it wave! and may the Drawer ever be the peculiar institution of the National Magazine!

Now is the very month to subscribe for Harper's Monthly, and to form clubs; the terms are stated on the cover of this Number, which you would do well to read as soon as you have finished the Drawer.

THE author of the spirited poem, "The Bay Fight," in a former part of this Number, sends the following by way of note:

"No one can be better aware than the writer of these verses of their many defects, considered artistically or conventionally. Any merit they may have is photographic, the piece having been written mostly on board ship, directly after the action, and even some little during the continuance of it, interlined with more formal and technical notes. It is difficult for any words to do justice to the splendid qualities displayed by the officers and men of the Hartford. Her gun-deck, during the height of the action, was a scene of the most terrible and magnificent that can be imagined. The men, nothing dismayed by the slaughter in their midst, fought with a brilliant elan and fury that only required proper direction; and the officers displayed that tempered coolness and enthusiasm which best presides over victory.

"The fortitude and heroism of the wounded and dying were wonderful. It may seem incredible, but it is true, that men dreadfully mutilated and wounded to the death shared in the exultation of their comrades, and tried to join the cheering, and said, 'Thank God!' 'Now I can die!' and the like. During the long and terrible hours of anguish and waiting for amputation which succeeded the fight, I did not hear a single cry or groan; only sometimes—and very rarely—a slight moaning.

"By those guns, and on that dismal berth-deck, soaked with blood, died heroes—nameless except on the ship's-roll—as true and valiant as any who live in history. Let us be just in this matter. The officer, besides duty and love of country, has a hundred incentives—as honor, promotion, pay, social and professional position—which should make it impossible for him to do otherwise than well. Poor Jack, with little enough of the latter, fights as well and dies as bravely. I know no more touching sight than to see him, with his hard hands and his bare feet—allowed, this once, on the sacred quarter-deck—lying cold and white on the planks he defended so nobly! And here I can not but remember, with high respect, the admirable skill, the patience, kindness, and efficiency of our medical corps: of Fleet-Surgeon PALMER, Doctors LANSDALE, GIBSON, and COMMONS, and one or two volunteers from other vessels. It is an honor to have known such men.

"That I have not recorded the many scenes of valor, heroism, and endurance which occurred on the other ships is simply because I did not witness them personally. If all worthy of mention had been told, this piece would have expanded into something, in length at least, very like an epic."

SOME time since a very large Irishman came into the Paterson post-office and addressed the postmaster with:

"Is there any litters for me, sure?"

"What is your name?" inquired the official.

"Oh, bedad, that's no matther. Is there any thing for me?"

"But what is your name? I must know that first."

"That's none of your business! It's a littler I'm afther, and not for to be telling my name."

After some trouble and explanation he gave his name as Michael Flannigan, but on looking over the letters none were found for Flannigan. The Irishman started for the door, and on reaching the steps was heard to say, "Och, be jabbers, and didn't I fool the feller good!"

He had given a false name, and gone off without seeing how he had fooled himself. Very Irish that.

THE two following are from the camp of the Fortieth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, stationed near Memphis, Tennessee:

Old Governor H—, of G—, L— County, Wisconsin, has already figured in your pages. Many are the laughable stories told of him. I remember seeing him once in a state of mind usually called wrath. The circumstances were as follows: The Governor, returning home from a tour to the northern part of the State, put up for the night at a hotel in the flourishing and beautiful village of Princeton, situated on the Fox River. The next morning, after arriving at home, he discovered that he had left his trunk at the hotel, twenty miles away. He just then saw one of his neighbors going to Princeton, and in his most pompous style requested him "to call at the hotel and see if there was not a little trunk there belonging to him." "Yes, with pleasure," replied the kind and obliging neighbor. When ready to return he found his wagon heavily loaded; the trunk proved to be a large and well-filled traveling trunk, quite heavy, and it was quite certain, on the principle of antecedent probabilities, that he would never get a cent for his trouble; so, seeing that it was safe at the hotel, he drove home. As he approached the residence of the Governor, the latter went out and opened the gate, expecting the trunk would be taken in and left at the door. The farmer told him he was not coming in. "But," says the Governor, "did you not get my trunk?" "No; you didn't ask me to get it." "Did not? What would you call it I asked you?" thundered the exasperated Governor. "Why, you asked me to look and see if it was there. I did so, and you will find it safe there any day by just driving over to Princeton. Good-day, Governor, good-day!"

Suffice it to say the Governor didn't ask that neighbor to do any more errands for him.

I WAS much amused at one of the orders given the other morning as the "sick call" was sounded, and the hearty disgust exhibited by one of the surgeons who happened to be within hearing distance. Said the sergeant, "Fall in, you sick men; fall in, and go up to the hospital and get your regular poison."

THE Thirty-sixth Illinois Volunteers furnishes the next:

After we had flanked Johnston's army from Dallas, it was, contrary to the usual custom, the fortune of the First Brigade—Sheridan's old Division—to be left behind the army a few days, as a guard for an ambulance train. One day two of our men—one of them Jack Tyrrell, Commissary of our Brigade—went out to take a bath beyond and in sight of our picket line, in a small bayou, which temerity was observed by some of Ferguson's cavalry hovering in the vicinity, who detached two men, armed with sabres and carbines, to bring them in. Being without arms they were surprised, and started off, en deshabelle, in the very face of the pickets, who dared not fire for fear of injuring the prisoners.

Each rebel started in a different direction with his charge. After going a short distance Tyrrell dodged to one side, exposing his captor to our pickets, who gave him a volley but missed, on which the Johnny, out of spite, returned the shot; when Tyrrell, taking advantage of his empty carbine, sprang and caught him by his abundant whiskers and dragged him from his horse. Here a short struggle ensued, in which the "Chivalry" had to give way to Northern muscle, although they were both good types of their countries, and Johnny, minus his gun and sabre, was marched to the picket lines by his escort, who guided him by walking behind him with one hand in each side of his whiskers. It is useless to say that he was received by the pickets with considerable merriment.

The other reb, on seeing his comrade's fate, and hearing the whirr of a few random shots, fled, and left his charge to come back at his will.

THE gravity of military orders does not often admit of the use of elaborate rhetorical figures. The following, however, appears to be an exception; and because it is a veritable order, is no reason why it should not have a place in the Editor's Drawer. The Fourth of July bird "ain't dead yet:"

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE DISTRICT.

COLUMBUS, KENTUCKY, July 2, 1864.

General Orders, No. 41.

Independence day, recurring, finds the independent portion of our people dealing with their perpetual enemies, the would-be owners of mankind, as our forefathers did.

For the glory of the day, for primitive and present success as well as that we mean to achieve, let the laws of chemistry utter nature's loudest peal of joy and determination.

On the ensuing anniversary the customary salute of 34 guns will be fired from every post in the District.

By order of Brig.-Gen. H. PRINCE.

GEO. S. RUSSELL, Capt. and A. A. A. Genl.

ONE of the Drawer's army correspondents sends the three following:

In passing the quarters of a Colonel of a hundred days' regiment we saw a sentry pacing his "beat" in front of said quarters; he was a noble fellow, well-clothed, tall, and an intelligent-looking man. We remarked to a companion that a regiment of such soldiers would be of some service to the Government at the expiration of three hundred days, if properly drilled in the mean time; and just as we had finished the remark the sentry leaves his beat, goes to the opening of the tent, and calls out, "John, give me a chew of tobacco!" Whereat there appeared at the entrance a person with eagles on the shoulders, and gave the sentry the required chew.

ON the arrival of one of the hundred days' regiments at Point of Rocks, Virginia, several of the men came over to our regiment, which was bivouacked near their camp, and wanted to purchase some butter. "Why," said they, "we han't had no butter these three days!" The laugh that rang out from throats that had not tasted butter for nearly three years can better be imagined than described.

SOME years ago, in the early settlement of Southwest Missouri, the merchants of the village of S— were annoyed considerably by a German shopkeeper, on one of the principal corners, selling articles at a much less price than his fellow-tradesmen. They bore it for a while, but soon "Dutchy" had a large and increasing custom; and the others, finding their custom on the decrease, began to create the impression that "Dutchy" got his goods and wares unfairly. He seemed to care nothing for the insinuations, but kept on the even tenor of his way, until one day a merchant met him on the street in a crowd, and insinuated that "Dutchy" must have got his goods very cheap; whereupon he burst out with,

"I has partners in New York, Philadelphia, and St. Louis, vot steals mine goods! Can you get 'em cheaper as dat, say?"

He was never troubled about underselling again.

A FEW years ago there was a great furor in Northwestern Illinois concerning Berkshire porkers. Two farmers, neighbors, near C—, invested fifty dollars each, and procured a couple of very fine specimens, with the intention of raising many others, but unfortunately the hogs were both attacked with a malady of which they were not likely to recover. One of the farmers, who was familiarly known as Jim, had heard that arsenic administered in small doses would cure his costly animal. So, purchasing an ounce, he administered it, but lo! his hog died very suddenly. In a day or two the other happened in the drug shop, and was speaking of his hog, and complaining of its malady, when the clerk remarked that Jim had bought arsenic for his hog, but he did not remember what quantity. At that moment, seeing him outside, he called the other's attention. He rushed out, and up to Jim, shouting, "Hullo, Jim! how much arsenic did you give your hog?"

"An ounce!" answered Jim, and went on.

A few days afterward the two met, and the purchaser of arsenic saluted the former with,

"Say, Jim! that arsenic I gave my hog killed it."

"So it did mine!" answered Jim.

FROM Paducah, Kentucky, the Drawer gets the following:

On the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, near the Tennessee line, there lived a merchant who also kept the post-office, and of an evening his store would be full of his customers, eager to hear him read the news. While reading the paper to them one evening he came to a paragraph as follows:

"Owing to the large number of emigrants traveling Westward, corn will probably command a very high price."

One old gentleman at this point interrupted him, and wanted to know what emigrant meant. The merchant stopped reading, and after studying for some time, answered, "Well, my friend, to tell you the truth, I don't know, but I believe they are an animal somewhere between a 'possum and a coon—any how, they're death on corn!"

A PENNSYLVANIA correspondent furnishes us with the following incident, which transpired under his nose:

In the quiet little town of C— there lived an eccentric old genius by the name of S—, who was noted for his many peculiarities and gross mutilation of the English language in general. On one occasion, when the village was crowded with people from all parts of the county (a political gathering, perhaps), the old man was busily serving those that came from a distance, and could not be accommodated at the hotels, with pies, cakes, etc., which he peddled through town in an old wagon, much to their joy and satisfaction. While driving up street, and attempting to "turn a corner," he accidentally upset, scattering the "pizen things" in every imaginable direction. The town at that period reveled in a superabundance of hogs, and a goodly number being near by rushed for the wagon, and commenced making fearful destruction among the delicacies. The old man, paralyzed with fright, ran down street with uplifted hands, crying, "Insistance! insistance! Every pie with a pig in its mouth, and the fence running round the corner!"

H—— had a large, ugly, yellow, big-headed, half-starved dog, which no amount of food at home would half fill up, and it became necessary that something should be done to "feed" him. Accordingly H——, with the dog close at his heels, went to market, marched up to a butcher's stall, and taking up a nice large beef-steak held it up just in the dog's reach, and, apparently examining it, asked the price of such a "steak as that." The dog, wondering at his master's unusual generosity, and not wanting to be behind-hand in his part of the performance, grabbed the steak and ran. H——, of course, looked after him in perfect astonishment, while the infuriated butcher yelled, "Who ish dat dog? Mishter, I vish, ven you looks at my meat, you no holds it up so dogsh can shteat it!" H—— felt very sorry, and didn't own "dat dog" till he got out of the angry butcher's sight.

OSSIAN E. DODGE—every body knows Dodge, notwithstanding he has always boasted that he never was "steamboated"—has at last had an opportunity to "invest." Lately traveling on a professional tour through Northern California, he visited a small mining camp in Siskiyou County, called Humbug, where dwells a practical joker, enjoying the dignity of the office of Justice of the Peace, and generally known as Judge Durand. In this auriferous region quartz excitements have become almost daily occurrences, and the result is, Humbug quartz leads have obtained quite a notoriety.

The "Judge" and the "boys" having heard of Dodge's joking proclivities, determined to catch him, if possible, and for that purpose procured a specimen of quartz rock containing a large amount of mica, which, to the uninitiated, had every appearance of pure gold. On his arrival the Judge was introduced to him, and soon after the subject of quartz and quartz mining came up. The Judge stated that he was himself interested in quartz operations, and further, that he and his partner had that very day struck what they believed to be the richest lead on the creek; and thereupon produced and exhibited to Dodge and the by-standers a specimen taken from the lead. The boys, being posted, suddenly became excited, and rushed out of the house to stake off claims, while the Judge blustered and threatened to shoot any man who jumped his claim. Dodge desired to become the possessor of so rich a specimen, but the Judge told him that he would first have to consult his partner. Thus matters remained until the next morning, when Dodge getting into his buggy to leave, the Judge approached him bearing the coveted specimen, which he presented in behalf of the boys, who were highly pleased with his concert, accompanied with a neat little speech. Dodge then rose up in his buggy, took off his hat, and replied in this manner:

"Gentlemen of Humbug, for this magnificent gift words can not express my heart-felt thanks. I shall always keep it as a memento of the hospitality and kindness you have shown me. I shall long remember you—and your beautiful town, let it no longer be called Humbug; it is indeed a misnomer, as I hold in my hand unmistakable evidence of that fact."

Dodge took his precious specimen to Yreka, and upon exhibiting it to some of his friends there (and telling from whose hands he received it), was gravely advised to sell out his interest in that lead at the earliest opportunity.

THE same correspondent sends us a court item:

At a late term of the District Court held in this county, in a certain case then pending, a subpoena duces tecum was issued for one Green. The clerk had written the words "Duces Tecum" therein, and delivered the same to a deputy-sheriff, who afterward returned it, stating that he had subpoenaed Green, but couldn't find that other fellow, Duces Tecum; didn't know where he lived, and nobody could tell him!

OUR "darling Lillie," of three years, while trying to get on her stockings one day, discovered a few hairs on her legs, when she exclaimed, "Mother, I think I shall be an angel soon, the feathers are beginning to grow!"

OUR regiment (Twenty-fifth Indiana) having re-enlisted, after enjoying their veteran furlough at home, were ordered to Decatur, Alabama, where we were joined by the detachment of boys who did not re-enlist, and who are distinguished from the veterans by the name of "Rounders." Soon after one of the men was brought before the Colonel for some misdemeanor. The Colonel, who, by-the-way, is noted for his ready means of disposing of such offenders, asked him if he was a Rounder. The offender answered in the negative. "Then," said the Colonel, "I will make you one. Just walk round that stump about two hours."

FROM a valued correspondent in Germany we have several very amusing stories, which are all the better for being told in a tongue which is not the writer's vernacular. But he shall tell them in his own way:

Some time ago a French juggler, who had for a whole week entertained the inhabitants of a small German town, and had astonished the natives with his amazing and numberless sleights, was at once, as it seemed, completely discountenanced and beat down by an announcement which was circulated through the town to the effect that seven Indian brothers would exhibit the following feats: The youngest, with a lighted candle in each hand, would jump down the throat of his senior brother, who, also armed with two candles, would jump down the throat of the next, and so on till there was only one left; and this was to make an end of all by jumping into his own throat! The performance was to take place at the usual hour, at the same hotel, and in the same hall in which the French conjuror had, with so much success, exhibited his own feats; and he himself came in as a common spectator, openly confessing that the announced tour de force was entirely beyond his power of conception, and he was curious to witness it, to see whether he could make out the artifice of it. The price of the places had been raised double of usual; however, the hall was early crowded. The spectators had been waiting a long time, and were growing impatient, when it was announced that the seven Indians had disappeared; whether they had swallowed one another no one could say; but they were nowhere to be found, and the money received had disappeared with them. The disappointment was great and general, as may easily be imagined, but soon gave place to a different feeling. The disappointed crowd, who had swallowed the hoax, seemed determined to vent their spleen on the benches and furniture; when the French conjuror, who was among them, kindly offered to entertain them gratis for that evening, to thank them for their former favors. The offer was gratefully accepted; the evening was spent agreeably, and the disappointment almost forgotten. The French conjuror went away the next morning, and it was only when he was gone that the good people were informed, through him, that he had reserved them his very best trick for the last.

AN officer of very small stature but very hasty temper was one day vehemently scolding at the first soldier of his company, a man of uncommon size. The soldier for some time endured patiently and even unconcernedly the storm of vituperations rising up to him from his diminutive chief. Finding, however, that, instead of abating, the rage of his officer went on increasing, he quietly said to his next man, "John, go and fetch him a stool; I believe he wants to give me a box on the ear."

A SIMPLE bumpkin came into a grocer's shop in a village of Germany, where he was well known for his simplicity, just as the shopkeeper was measuring a pint of olive-oil for a customer, who immediately went away with it.

"What sort of stuff is that you have just been measuring there, Mr. G——?" asked he.

"What! Johnny, don't you know? Why, you foolish fellow, that is Champagne wine."

"Ah! is it? I didn't think Champagne was so."

"Do you like Champagne, Johnny?"

"I'm sure I don't know, Sir; I never drank any in my life."

"Will you have a glass of it?"

"Oh! thank you; you are very kind."

The grocer filled a large tumbler with oil and gave it to him. He drank it.

"Well, how do you like it, Johnny?"

"Why, I believe it is very good; indeed I do; but I think it is a little too rich for poor people only used to plain living."

AN Irishman was standing on the border of a copse with an old, rusty, broken piece of a firelock in his hands, and his eyes most intently and insidiously fixed on a particular spot. A neighbor of his happening to pass there asked him what he was about.

"Hush!" said Pat; "a rabbit is coming out there presently, and I'll pepper it, I tell you."

"What! pepper it with that thing! why, you fool, your gun is quite out of order! and, be Jabers, it has not even got a cock, I see!"

"Pst! my darling, the rabbit don't know that!"

THERE are a good many concerns just like the one shown up by our Drawer correspondent:

About thirty years ago a family of some four brothers were engaged in business in Dayton, Ohio. Their name was Lockwood. They were chiefly distinguished for their skill in getting into debt and their adroitness in avoiding payment. Debts were usually contracted in the name of one or two of the family, and when payment was urged the property would be claimed by the others. In this manner their business was conducted for a long time successfully, upon the principle of permutation of numbers.

It so happened that the landlord of the principal and only tavern of the village was recently elected Justice of the Peace, and, having once personally suffered from the legerdmain of the Lockwoods, said he could fix them. A creditor came with a claim for collection. The squire took it, docketed the case, and issued his summons against the "Lockwood concern;" rendered judgment and issued execution against the "Lockwood concern," directing the constable to levy on any thing he could find belonging to any of them. The constable accordingly levied on a horse found in the possession of John Lockwood, sold it, and paid the debt. John Lockwood was a one-horse lawyer himself, in addition to his connection with the rest of them, and feeling deeply aggrieved carried the case on error to the Common Pleas, and finally to the Supreme Court.

The case was ultimately disposed of by the late Judge Pease, who was distinguished as well for his appreciation of the ludicrous as for his judicial learning and abilities. He stopped at the hotel of the aforesaid Justice of the Peace. The Justice, feeling a deep interest in his own decision, had a long interview with the Judge in his room, showing him his docket and explaining the tricks of the Lockwoods and the difficulties of their creditors.

The next morning after court convened the case was called. John Lockwood responded for plaintiff in error.

"For whom do you appear?" inquired Judge Pease.

"I appear in my own behalf, your Honor."

"You do not then appear for plaintiff in error?" inquired the Judge.

"Well, no—yes—that is, I appear for myself. My name is John Lockwood. I am the party injured by the judgment. My horse was taken by execution in the case, and I ask for a reversal of the judgment." He was proceeding to argue the case when the Judge cut the matter short by remarking,

"Your name does not appear as a party in the case. Your name is John Lockwood. This judgment is against 'the Lockwood concern.' No one but a party to the record can complain of it. The Court will affirm the judgment."

So at least one debt was collected against this mysterious firm by a master-piece of jurisprudence.

A FEW years later another incident occurred at the same place in the line of the law.

Sam Penniwell was celebrated for never failing to collect a claim intrusted to his care for that purpose. He was elected constable, and soon after entering upon the duties of his office received an execution against the keeper of a small tavern in a village near Norwalk. It so happened that this tavern-keeper was never known to pay a debt on honor or on execution. He was in fact irresponsible, and had for years smiled on constables who had executions against him. When Penniwell went for him it was putting Hercules to his task. This new constable went with his execution on an evening when a ball was in progress at the tavern of said landlord. In the midst of the dance Penniwell appeared, writ in hand, and proclaimed that by virtue of said execution he levied on that ball. He stationed himself at the door and commenced receiving the bills from the dancers, to which the musicians as well as the landlord stoutly objected, on the ground that it was a partnership enterprise, and that the musicians were to get their pay from the dancers, according to the number of "couples" present. The constable held on to his levy, saying he was bound to have the landlord's interest in the ball, at the same time quieting the musicians by assuring them that he would not interfere with their rights. How he did it is best shown by his return, which is a model of brevity. It is as follows:

"Received the within writ on the date thereof. I proceeded to the premises of said defendant and levied on one ball, subject to the fiddlers' lien. Debt and costs made in full. This writ is therefore returned fully satisfied.
S. PENNIWELL, Constable."

FROM Colorado we have the two that follow:

Golden City is the capital of our young and prosperous Territory, where the Legislature meets and promptly adjourns to Denver, which is somewhat larger and more densely populated. Hon. W. A. H. Loveland, who, by-the-way, is one of nature's noblemen, resides here, owns the store, built a big road, runs for the Legislature with a certainty of success which is astonishing to all opposition, and is the father of two pretty fast boys, aged severally about five and a half and eight years. The youngest of these inherits his sire's name, and is called Billy for short. Last year the family returned "to the States," and all except the father wintered at Brighton, Illinois. Now be it remembered these youths, the two boys, were quite young when they came here; churches here are less numerous than preachers; and, moreover, it is no fool of an undertaking to bring up a child in the way he should go in a new mining country. At Brighton the watchful mother proposed to turn over a new leaf and take her boys to a real church. Accordingly they were taken out on the first Sabbath. The house was full. The usual services gone through with, then came the sermon, which was quite lengthy, and caused Billy to become very uneasy, and clamber about upon the pew. Finally the sermon ended, and then came a hymn, and after that a prayer and benediction, which proved too much for little Billy, who, perched on the top of the pew, called out in a voice loud enough to be heard all over the house, "Mother, what in the world's coming next?"

PROFESSOR GOLDRICK, local editor of the Rocky Mountain News, in Denver, is a talented gentleman of Hibernian extraction, whose powers of description are so ample as frequently to amount to hyperbole. Last May, when Denver was inundated by the great Cherry Creek deluge, the Professor was on hand to witness the great calamity and furnish the press with an account of its horrors. Some few days after a gentleman from Santa Fé, a member of General Carlton's staff, came to Denver on business, and strolled out with Goldrick to see for himself if things had been so terrible as the published account stated. While walking along the margin of the furious current the Professor said:

"Oh, Sir, you never beheld the like of it! The Niagara, either above or below the falls, is no more to it than the glass of water one takes after his gin cock-tail is to the ocean itself. There was frightful times right ferninst me, with houses and trees tumbling each over the other, and dozens of dead people going by every minute, all crying out for help, and not one of us could do 'em any good!"

Captain Cutler returned to Santa Fé convinced that the Cherry Creek flood had been an awful affair.

THE following extract from the London Weekly Times of September 25 is a melancholy example of the effects of permitting children to play with fire-arms. The precocious infant who died at the age of fifteen minutes only adds another to the already extensive list of deaths from similar causes:

"The coroner having briefly addressed the jury on their melancholy duty, and pointed out to them what he considered was the verdict they should return, the jury unanimously recorded their verdict that the deceased died from the accidental discharge of his own gun, after living a quarter of an hour. They also appended an expression of sympathy for the family of the deceased in their bereavement, which was a loss to both his family and to the whole country."

A LITTLE girl who made very frequent use of the word guess was one day reproved for it by her teacher. "Don't say guess, Mary," said Miss —; "say presume." Presently afterward one of Mary's little mates coming up to her remarked,

"I think your cape is very pretty, and my mother wants your mother to lend her the pattern, because she is going to make me one like it."

"My mother has no pattern," was the prompt reply; "she cut it by presume."

ONE of the hardy sons of the Far West sends the following:

Our town boasts of a painter who lately brought a bill "for work done" to a customer of his. He, on looking over the bill, found one item stating three coats of paint on doors, and knowing no door in his house had received three coats of paint, asked our painter to explain; who did so by stating that two coats on outside and one inside made the three coats of paint!

A JEWISH reader of the Drawer, who sells jewelry, writes to us:

DEAR DRAWER,—I see that you have contributions in your Drawer from all sorts of people, and have even lately had one from a druggist. But I have seen "nary a one" yet from a watch-maker, and I glory in being the first of that honest species of mechanics to send you some good ones.

Some of the soldiers in and about Memphis have been rather taken in by some of the not over-scrupulous store-keepers in that city, and, as a necessary conclusion, have set the majority of them down as a parcel of swindling Jews. Some of them, however, have rather mixed notions as to what sort of a being constitutes a Jew. I keep a jewelry store in Memphis, and have much dealing with soldiers. Few of those that I have come in contact with have ever discovered the fact of my being a Jew. A captain who pretends to have great faith in me came to my store some time ago, and begged me to go with him and look at a certain gold chain which he wanted to purchase, and which the little "Irish Jew" around the corner kept for sale. "You know," said he, "I can't believe what that Irish Jew tells me, and I wish you would go with me and look at the chain, and tell me whether it is good gold or not." The idea of mistaking poor Paddy—who, to my certain knowledge, goes to the "praste" as regularly as he goes to his meals—for a Jew, and then coming to me, a Jew, with the above request, had something so ridiculous in it, that I experienced hard work in keeping my risibles down. I told my friend the captain, however, that he was quite right—that Irish Jews were least of any to be trusted. I went with him, looked at the chain, and on my recommendation he purchased it.

A chaplain of an Illinois regiment, in speaking to me of two brothers, remarked that one of them was a Jew, and a mean man; and "the other not a Jew, and a perfect gentleman!" Some soldiers congregated in my store the other day, got to speaking as to the best way of discovering whether a man was a Jew or not. One of them stoutly asserted that every Dutchman was a Jew. Others made observations equally wise. But one of them finally capped the climax by asserting that every man who fell on the original price he asked for an article was a Jew!

These are some of their bulls. But there is some genuine wit among the boys.

An Irish soldier belonging to the Seventh Indiana Cavalry brought me an old brass watch to fix, which looked as though the boys had been playing football with it in camp. It was well worth ten dollars to repair it, and I asked him whether he wanted it fixed at that figure. "Och and sure I will," was the reply; "if you'll agree to take the watch as part pay."

Two soldiers belonging to the Second Iowa Cavalry came into my store the other day. One of them wanted to buy a silver lever watch, while the other only meant to act as an additional judge. I showed them a silver lever watch, telling them at the same time that it had thirteen jewels. "Do you think," asked the would-be purchaser of his friend, "do you think that watch has thirteen jewels?" "Thirteen jewels!" replied that worthy, winking hard at me; "of course it has, and there are holes punched for more!"

"PAT," our man of all work, has recently come over, and one day I gave him an ear of corn to eat. He evidently liked it very much, but I guess he was eating it for the first time; for after he had eaten all that was on the cob, he passed it up to me again, and said, "Will ye plase put some more pase on my stick!"

HERE is an instance of remarkable presence of mind in a considerate husband:

A lady who had been traveling during the past summer, on her return home wrote to a distant friend an account of her journey, and, among other things, of the following adventure: "I concluded my various exploits by suddenly visiting old Neptune's bed at the bottom of the ocean. Not of my own free-will, however. I was forcibly thrown from the deck of the ship, as we were out on a fishing excursion. As usual, my good-man was after me in a twinkling, and caught me as I reappeared on the surface, and with prompt assistance from the boat I was fished up again, a sorry looking specimen of humanity, but all sound and unharmed, though a very narrow escape," etc.; and after some more matters, she added, "I am going to leave room for — to speak for himself. I think he is able, as he is now fifty years old."

So the husband—the "good-man"—does speak for himself, and adds a P.S., in which, among other things, he says: "Mrs. — tells me she has written to you about her being saved from being food for fishes by the subscriber. Well, it may be so, but she had on a great lot of jewelry, which I thought was worth saving, particularly as gold now is pretty high!"

A RESIDENT of California sends to the Drawer this reminiscence of his youth:

In the back part of Massachusetts, "among the pines," was a place called Jucketham, a few of the inhabitants of which labored in a furnace in the vicinity, while the balance were engaged in cutting down and carting the wood, which covered most of the country around. Any one possessing a horse-frame and rickety wagon could earn a scanty living by taking it into the city of New Bedford, at the rate of a dollar a load, payable in groceries, the main bulk of which, however, was generally carried home in a stone jug, alongside of the sleeping driver, who depended for his safe but not speedy arrival on the sagacity of the quadruped.

It so happened that a young couple of this section proposed matrimony, and as they belonged to the aristocracy it seemed imperative that the thing should come off with some éclat. Accordingly numerous invitations were issued, and corresponding preparations made for the important event. The house consisted of two rooms; the larger one, having a fire-place and chimney of rough stones laid up in mud and topped out with a barrel, was to be used first for the entertainment of the guests during the services, and afterward for the bridal apartment. This was early filled by the assemblage, some seated upon the bed, some on blocks of wood, etc., and the rest, including the expectant bride and groom, standing around promiscuous-like. The other room was used as a bedroom for the family, and was then occupied by the invalid mother of the bride. After the minister had properly united the pair "for better or worse," the refreshments were passed around. These consisted of some New England rum, which was poured from the broken spout of an earthen tea-pot, which had lost its handle, into a wine-glass, the bowl only of which remained. The bottomless wine-glass having been duly honored by the "happy couple," and circulated from guest to guest, the minister announced that they would proceed with the concluding exercises (which, on extraordinary occasions like the present, consisted of a "hem" sung by the whole company, followed by a prayer and benediction), and requested if any one had any particular choice in the selection of the hymn that they would make it manifest. Upon this the old lady sung out from the bedroom that "if there was no special choice, and the company didn't object, she wished they would jest sing a hem which seemed to her to fit exactly this solemn occasion. She couldn't tell exactly where it was, but it went somehow so:

"Since he is mine and I am his,
What can I want beside?"

MANY years ago, in a pretty little village in the Buckeye State, there was taught, during the winter, a country school, and thither flocked the children of the surrounding country, for the laudable purpose of getting an education. The teacher, Mr. Brown, was a good, hard-working, faithful man, as many a successful farmer and business-man of the Northwest will willingly testify. He was also a religious man, and spared no pains to inculcate good morals among his charge. On one occasion a little black-eyed, curly-headed, sunny-faced girl, some twelve years of age, was detected by some of her companions in a lie, which being duly reported to Mr. Brown, he took the earliest occasion to reprimand and lecture her upon the enormity of the sin. The little girl sobbed bitterly as Mr. Brown concluded by saying, "Now, Betty, you have lost both your character and the respect of your school-mates; and it remains for you to confess your guilt, and to strive by your future conduct to regain both." Here a little carrotty-headed, white-eyed, freckled-faced youngster, who had got as far as Baker in his well-thumbed spelling-book, and who had intently listened to all that had been said, unable longer to contain the information with which he was bursting, rose, and in a squeaking voice said, "Please, Mister Brown, I think Tom Jones has found 'em both, for I've seen him chawing something all the morning." The effect of this announcement can be better imagined than described. Mr. Brown himself was unable to preserve his dignity, and school was dismissed at three o'clock.

THE following lightning story shows us why the telegraph is so given to lying:

In a little sea-port on Long Island Sound, not many hours from the Metropolis, resides an old coasting skipper, whose marvelous tales of adventure by sea and land, if collected and published, would render the copy-right of Munchausen's travels worthless. Here is a story of his, for a sample:

"It's close on to thirty years ago that I was coming down the Sound in the old sloop Sally; 'twas summer-time, and the wind was to south'ard. All of a sudden the wind died away, and it commenced thick'ning up to north'ard and west'ard. I had an idee that we was goin' to hev a thunder squabble, and took in sail and waited for it. Byrne-by here it come, feather white, as fur as you could see; and such thunder and lightning and rain as I guess was never seen before in these latitudes. The mate was at the helm and I was standing at the companion-way, the lightning striking all around the sloop, when, suddenly, after a big flash, I felt a curious feeling—a cold chill, like I had swallowed quicksilver, come over me. I got down below as soon as I could, and set down on the locker, feeling mighty streaked, I can tell you! The squall soon passed over, and I felt all right except an onaccountable feeling about my feet. I sung out for the cook, who pulled off my boots, and, strange to say, although it is the truth, I turned out of each one nigh on to a pint of the electric fluid."

Our Lulie, a black-eyed one of six, came into her grandmother's room one day, and looking up with her grave little face, said, "I've been praying to God, grandma." "Well, little one, for what did you ask?" "I've been praying to God, and I've been telling him he is too good; he gives us six days, and only keeps one himself; and I've been telling him he must take more. It's too much for us—it is too much!"

THIS comes from the mouth of White River, Arkansas:

During the Red River campaign, last spring, a New York regiment of Zouaves was marching through Alexandria, Louisiana. An old and probably near-sighted woman coming to the door, and seeing the red-petticoated soldiers pass, exclaimed, "Mercy! what is the Government coming to, when it has to fetch its wimen to war!"

ONE day, during a time when we were on short rations, one of the messes of my company had something a little extra for dinner; and going on the principle of "every man for himself," it was not long till the table was cleared. One of the boys, who happened to be out at dinner-time, came in just as the rest had finished. Disappointed in not having a good dinner, he commenced growling at them for eating it all up, and not saving some for him. A little fellow in the mess looked up at him and said, "Why, confound it, Bill, can't you take a joke!"

"HAVE you relatives in the army?" asked a Second Lieutenant of a lady sitting in the car seat with him. "Yes." "Your husband?" "Yes, Sir." "From what State?" "Illinois." "Illinois [patronizingly] has sent some fine troops, ma'am. Your husband wears a strap, I presume?" "Yes, Sir." "Is he with the Potomac army?" "Yes, Sir." "May I inquire his name?—I am acquainted with a good many brother officers there." "Certainly, Sir—Ulysses S. Grant." (Exit Lieutenant for smoking-car.)

AN urchin in school reading about a singular gentleman, was asked by the teacher what the expression meant. The boy promptly answered, "A man that isn't married!"

"OIL CITY," as all know who ever visited that thriving and busy spot, is celebrated for the great depth of the mud in its streets—a quantity and quality of mud that baffles description. During the past "rainy season" the mud has attained a greater depth than ever before, attended with a loss of patience and petroleum altogether unexampled. In view of this state of things, some wag astonished the weary pilgrims by affixing to a post a huge placard announcing "a fine of ten dollars for riding or driving faster than a walk through this street!"

WE close the Drawer with this one, fresh from the army:

We were lying near Brandy Station last winter, and the officers of our staff endeavored to relieve the ennui of camp-life by frequent visits to the fair secesh maidens of the surrounding country. One of our staff became quite enamored with a young lady in Culpepper, more noted for her secession ideas than for her beauty.

On one of his visits she requested the loan of some books, and the next day he sent over a parcel containing, among other books, Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables." To his surprise the orderly returned with the books, and a message from the fair one that she "didn't want any of his nasty Yankee trash."

Not exactly understanding it, he rode over in the evening to inquire what was wrong. The young lady's eyes flashed as she demanded to know how he dared to insult her by sending her a book about "Lee's Misérables." She knew that General Lee's men weren't as well dressed as the Yankees, but they weren't miserable one bit, and it was all a Yankee falsehood to say that they were.

A TOUR THROUGH ARIZONA.

[Fourth Paper.]

COCOSPERA CAÑON.

PASSING into Sonora we continued our journey through the valley and cañon of San Ignatio, another of those beautiful regions highly favored by nature, but at present utterly desolated by the Apaches. From time immemorial the San Ignatio cañon has been a famous place for bloody battles, ambushes, and robberies. Nature never designed a fitter locality for the destruction of unwary travelers. Every rock is a natural fortification, and every thicket affords a hiding-place for the enemy. Ruined houses, broken fences, and deserted pastures are the prominent marks of their ravages. Where vast herds of cattle once grazed is now a rank growth of mesquit, grass, and weeds, inhabited only by deer, rabbits, and wild turkeys.

VOL. XXX.—No. 176.—K

Our present driver, who had taken the place of George (the love-sick swain from the Monte), was a discreet Irishman, who had served for some years as a soldier in Oregon. He was a lively, intelligent man, a clever whip, and an experienced Indian fighter; but, like all Irishmen, his judgment was very precarious. A favorite crotchet of his was that all this talk about Apaches was "blatherskite," and that there "wasn't a divil of 'em widin a thousand miles." In proof of which he was willing to risk his life in any part of the country without "a livin' sowl besides himself." Upon entering the San Ignatio cañon, where we all considered an attack by no means unlikely, this sagacious Irishman put whip to the mules, and, despite my most earnest remonstrances, continued to keep about two miles ahead of the escort during the entire passage through. Poston, with equal sagacity, was scouting the cañon in search of a deer, and Paddy and I took the lead—he yelling like a devil at the mules, and I begging him not to run into a hornet's nest of red-skins. "Sure," said he, "they'd scalp me the first any how." "Why so?" said I. Paddy smiled and rubbed the top of his head, which was covered with a luxuriant growth of hair—"Becase," he quickly answered, "I don't think so much as other gentlemen that's always writin'."

We had a number of experienced hunters in our company, who were famous for slaughtering game in California; but owing either to some derangement of the nerves in creeping around the bushes, or through the tall grass at a distance from camp, they could not generally hit a deer at twenty paces in Sonora. We were fortunate enough, however, to kill a couple just as we emerged from the San Ignatio cañon. I shot at a great many myself, and struck but one, which ran faster after I struck him than he did before. I believe he thought it was lightning struck him, for he made a thundering noise jumping through the bushes.

I shall long remember our journey through this beautiful and picturesque part of Sonora. If there is any thing finer than the winter climate, I do not know where it is to be found. Every afternoon we camped in a luxuriant bed of grass, under some wide-spreading oak or walnut-tree; and it was a great pleasure to bathe in the clear, sparkling stream that coursed through the valley. Hunting, bathing, eating, drinking, and sleeping formed the routine of our camp life. For the first time in my life I grew fat, but like a hare lost it all again in about three days. Wood is abundant in the valleys. It was a cheery sight to see our little command of soldiers seated around the glowing camp-fires, their horses picketed close by, the fumes of many a savory mess regaling the senses, while song and joke passed merrily around. I did not wonder that men should volunteer for such service as this. It was all easy, holiday life, with just adventure and danger enough to give it zest. I had some notion of giving up civilization altogether myself, and devoting the remainder of my days to hunting Indians in Arizona.

All along the road, wherever we entered a town or village, our excellent lieutenant drew up his cavalry in imposing style, gave the natives a blast on the horn, and performed the most skillful and effective military evolutions with both horses and fire-arms. The "blanketed thieves," as Mr. Calhoun once called these mongrel Mexicans, peeped from behind the corners of their wretched adobe huts, and looked for all the world like pickled cucumbers shivering in their skins. Since the Crabbe massacre they entertain a natural dread of retribution. Couriers were sent ahead of us, from village to village, informing the inhabitants of our approach; and it was evident there was a lurking suspicion in the minds of the people, notwithstanding our peaceful professions, that we had entered the country on some mission of vengeance. Our thirty volunteers, with their devil-may-care bearing and style of costume, looked very much like a band of invaders.

At Imuriz, the first town of any consequence on the way, some little excitement was occasioned by an incident that occurred during the night. Our horses were closely picketed in the milpas, or corn-fields, down by the river. Some time after dark the sentinels perceived two men stealthily approaching on horseback through the bushes. It was thought they designed stealing some of the animals. As usual, they were hailed, but instead of answering they attempted to run, when one of the sentinels fired. The Mexicans shouted, "Mas arriba! Mas arriba!" and still continued to run. In a few minutes the whole command was scouring the bushes in search of loose "Greasers." Nothing further transpired till morning, when a suspicious-looking vagabond called upon the lieutenant and complained that, while hunting cattle, some of the men had fired upon him and made a hole through his hat. The hat, which he dolefully exhibited, certainly had a hole through it a little above the range of the scalp, but whether made by a Minié ball or gouged out with a knife for purposes of indemnity could not be determined. If the damage was done by force of powder and ball, it was a very appropriate cry uttered by the Mexican—Mas arriba—(higher)! Almost any body whose scalp had been so closely grazed would like to be shot at a little higher up.

Another of these miserable vagabonds made a great fuss because the soldiers had burned a couple of worthless logs which they found on the road. He claimed damages to the amount of "cinco pesos." Upon examination it turned out that he was one of a party who had committed a robbery, and attempted to assassinate Mr. Pierce (a nephew of ex-President Pierce), at the Hentzelman Mine, a year ago last summer. Mr. Pierce had joined us at Tucson, and was now of our party. He speedily identified the man, and informed the lieutenant of the fact. Not wishing to have any trouble, the lieutenant

IMURIZ.

The horses were wretchedly poor, and looked much more disposed to die than to run races for a wager. In truth, horse-flesh is in rather a low condition just now in Sonora. The best horses are all in possession of the Apaches. Kuchies, the famous chief and warrior of the Pinals, rides the finest horse in the country. These vagabond Indians have a saying, no less sarcastic than true, that the Mexicans are their vaqueros, upon whom they depend for their horses and cattle; and that the Americans are their teamsters and mechanics, who haul goods for them and supply them with arms. I did not see one horse in Arizona or Sonora that would bring eighty dollars in California.

A little beyond San Ignacio, as we were peacefully pursuing our way, we were overtaken by the Prefect of Magdalena, a fat gentleman of imposing dignity, who touched his hat with official courtesy, and made us a diplomatic speech on the propriety of observing the obligations of international law.—Although we had been but two days within the inhabited quietly advised the professed owner of the logs to make himself as scarce as possible within the period of five minutes, or he would be tolerably certain to receive his “cinco pesos” in lead, skillfully inserted in his ear. No more was heard of the “cinco pesos” after that, except that the logs belonged to another party, who attached no value to them.

We stopped a while at the village and mission of San Ignacio, to examine the ruins and witness a horse-race which came off during the day. There was but little to interest us in the race.

limits of the country news of our arrival had been dispatched by a courier to the Governor, Pesquiera, then on a visit to his silver mines, sixty miles from Imuriz, and a letter received from him by the Prefect of Magdalena directing a strict inquiry to be made into the object of our visit, and a suitable explanation to be obtained of our entrance into a friendly State with an armed party of thirty men in military costume. We assured his excellency the Prefect that our intentions were entirely pacific; and, so far as international law was concerned, that we had no idea whatever of violating it (though, between ourselves, reader, it was a little irregular to enter a foreign State with thirty soldiers, who would have been delighted to sack, burn, and destroy any town within the range of our travels—especially Fronteras, the trading-post of the Apaches). The Prefect professed himself satisfied with our explanation, and informed us that he would see us at Magdalena on the following day. As an excuse for our escort we stated, and with truth, that the condition of the country rendered it necessary for our personal safety. A party of Americans, of whom we were in search, had been waylaid and robbed by the Indians, and two of our countrymen had just been murdered. It was for this reason we traveled with such an imposing escort.

On the way down to Magdalena we passed through several small villages and rancherias watered by the Cocospera and San Ignacio rivers. In referring to rivers it does not necessarily follow that they contain water in this part of the world. Most of the rivers I have seen in Arizona and Sonora contain nothing but dry sand. A traveler might perish from thirst if he depended for water upon the various rivers and their tributaries as laid down on the maps. The Cocospera and San Ignacio combined would scarcely turn the wheel of a small grist-mill. The mills on these streams are driven by horse-power. It should be observed, however, that this was a very dry season. So long a drought had not been known for many years.

The inhabitants of Imuriz, Terrenati, San Ignacio, and the smaller villages or rancherias are miserably poor and lazy. Their cattle have nearly all disappeared, in consequence of the frequent raids of the Apaches; and their milpas, or fields, formerly cultivated with considerable success, have gone to ruin. Scarcely sufficient food to sustain life is now produced. The ground is rich and the climate unsurpassed, and with the rudest cultivation abundant crops of wheat, maize, pomegranates, and oranges might be produced; but all hope for the future seems to have been crushed out of these miserable people. All day long they sit by the doors of their filthy little adobe huts, smoking cigarritos and playing cards. I fancy they like it better than working. At least they live by idleness. Industry would kill them. When these mixed races are compelled to work they sicken and die.

We arrived at Magdalena without a fight, funeral, wedding, or casualty of any kind, and were hospitably received by Don Francisco Gonzales Torraño, an intelligent merchant from old Spain, for some years past a prominent citizen of Sonora. Don Francisco lives in rather comfortable style, considering the wretched character of the place and its surroundings. A good room with a bedstead, and the still rarer luxury of a wash-basin, was kindly allotted to the principals of the party. I had not seen my face in a looking-glass for over two weeks, and was astonished to recognize in the rough, sunburnt, and dilapidated individual before me the little that remained of my former self. Some scented soap and a bottle of rose-water, also furnished by our generous host, brought on a spell of sentiment that threatened for a time to unfit me for the ordinary duties of life; and when Don Francisco produced his best Champagne and exchanged sundry compliments with us, I think an ode to the fair sex would have been within the limits of my resources in a poetical point of view.

Magdalena is next to Hermosillo and Ures in population. From its geographical position it has assumed considerable importance since the acquisition of Arizona by the United States. It is now the chief dépôt of supplies for the mining regions of Northern Sonora and the adjacent part of Arizona. There are three or four stores in the place, one of them kept by a Mr. Kitchen, an American, and another by a German. The population is about 1500. The town is like all I have seen in Sonora, a parched up confusion of adobe huts, scattered over the slope of a barren hill like so many mud boxes. A notable feature is the old church, of which I made a sketch for Don Francisco. He prizes this token of regard and artistic skill so highly that he has since had it photographed, and I am thus enabled to present the reader with a copy.

The earth and houses are pretty much of the same general material and color. Mesquit and petayah are the chief surrounding objects of interest and ornament in the way of vegetable life; and a few Yaqui women, with ojas or earthen pitchers on their heads, give grace and animation to the watering-places—like Rebecca at the well in the days of yore. A moving pile of mesquit wood, with the legs of a small burro or donkey underneath, is now and then seen passing along the principal street; but otherwise a delusion seems to prevail among the inhabitants that every day is Sunday, and must be respected by total abstinence from labor. I saw but few people in the place, and they were propping up the houses in a manner customary with natives of the country—by leaning, or sitting with their backs against them.

The only production against which there seems to be no limit, and certainly no effective law, is that of children. Owing to the climate, perhaps, and idleness, which is the father of all mischief and many mixed breeds of babies, these mongrel little humans abound to an amazing extent in the small towns of Sonora.—Nearly all of them have Indian blood in them, and many denote a growing proclivity toward the American race.—Hence you often see in one family a remarkable variety of races. A mother with white-headed and blue-eyed children, and black-headed and black-eyed children, and children with straight hair, and curly hair, and thin lips, and thick lips, and noses long, and noses short, all bearing a strong family resemblance, is a very common kind of mother in this latitude. Occasionally some beneficent padre goes through the country doing up a long arrearage of marriages, putting together in the holy bonds of wedlock all who desire to secure by the rites of the church the partners with whom they chance at the time to be on terms of domestic intimacy. For this reason I think Sonora can beat the world in the production of villainous races. Miscegenation has prevailed in this country for three centuries. Every generation the population grows worse; and the Sonorians may now be ranked with their natural compadres—Indians, burros, and coyotes. The worst of the whole combination of races is that which has the infusion of rascality in it from American sources. Mexican, Indian, and American blood concentrated in one individual makes the very finest specimen of a murderer, thief, or gambler ever seen on the face of the earth. Nothing in human form so utterly depraved can be found elsewhere. I know of no exception, and do not believe a good citizen of sound morals ever resulted from such an abominable admixture. Of such material as this is the town of Magdalena composed. It is said to be a very quiet and orderly place compared with Hermosillo, and I can well believe the statement; for while Magdalena has not been much favored with the presence of renegade Americans within the past few years, Hermosillo has long been their favorite place of resort, chiefly because it affords a more extensive field for the exercise of all the depraved passions of human nature.

We remained about two days in Magdalena, during which we greatly enjoyed the hospitality of our friend Gonzales Torraño. It is due to this gentleman to say, that he has done more for the accommodation of American travelers on their way through Sonora, and afforded them more assistance in procuring supplies of implements and provisions for their mining operations than any man in the country. He has done this without profit or reward, chiefly from the natural promptings of his heart, and incidentally from a liberal and intelligent desire to see the resources of this vast mineral region properly developed.

It is evident to any one passing through Sonora, even as far north as we did, that a great change is going on throughout the State. Every steamer from San Francisco lands at Mazatlan and Guyamas from 100 to 200 passengers, many of whom, disappointed in more northern regions, desire to establish themselves in the rich mineral fields of the south. Political disaffection toward their own Government may have something to do with this influx of Americans within the borders of Sinaloa and Sonora; but I would not like to say any thing vindictive on that point—especially as most of these enterprising adventurers are at present without money, and not a few of them dependent upon the charity of the Mexicans, who complain that they are obliged to support them. Quite a number of the more energetic, however, are making an honest living by driving teams, blacksmithing, or doing rough jobs of painting and housework. As yet but few have derived any income from the silver mines, though all are pretty rich in claims.

In respect to mines, owning silver lodes in Mexico is a pretty precarious business at present. In Sonora, at least, there is too much mescal and too little law. The central Government is no more recognized than the Government of Spain. Mines may be held by interest or force, but it is very questionable if they can be held by law. So long as it is beneficial to have the Americans come in, put up machinery, and develop the mines, so long, perhaps, will their rights be respected. But the Sonoranians are a treacherous and uncertain people, and can never be relied upon. Nor is there any guaranty that the rights of Americans, whom they hate in their hearts, will, even if uncontested by the Sonoranians, be respected by the French, who are now, as we hear, about to occupy the port of Guyamas and assume possession of the State. Their promise of a liberal policy may just be taken for what it is worth—which, in my opinion, is less than this sheet of paper.

These are suggestions worthy of serious consideration on the part of our fellow-citizens of California who are moving in this direction. There can be nothing urged in favor of Sonora as a field of enterprise for our miners and capitalists which will not apply with equal force to Arizona, a Territory within our own borders, abounding in mines as rich as any discovered by the Spaniards in Sonora, and where investments of labor and money are in no apparent danger of being lost from extraneous circumstances.

On leaving Magdalena we returned by the San Ignacio road as far as Imuriz, from which we diverged to the right, taking the road through the cañon of Cocospera for Santa Cruz. We were accompanied by Don Francisco Gonzales as far as the ranch of Babesaqui, near which he owns a silver lead which he wished us to visit. Six or seven of us rode up a small cañon to the left, extending into the mountains about three miles, and took an observation of the mine. As yet it is but little developed. The ore is apparently rich in copper and galena. Our friend thinks it is rich in silver also, and is apparently rather enamored of his vein, which he floridly calls "El Primo del Mai." It is not very convenient to water, but what it lacks in that respect it makes up in proximity to Apaches, a band of whom attacked Don Francisco in the adjacent cañon of Cocospera a year or two ago, killed two of his men, took possession of his animals, burned his ambulance, and pursued himself and the remainder of his escort, who had taken to their heels, for about three miles. Don Francisco says that, although forty-eight summers have passed over his head, he can, when occasion requires it, run as fast as he ever did. It is due to him to add that a braver man, or one who has more generously risked his life for others, does not exist in Sonora. In cases of this kind prudence is the better part of valor.

The Cocospera cañon, through which we passed leaving the ranch of Babesaqui, is a line of natural fortifications and masked batteries for a distance of about nine miles. Dense thickets of willow, mesquit, and cotton-wood cover the narrow bottom through which the river runs; and the sides of the cañon are precipitous and rock-bound, rising in many places into a massive range of fortifications, almost as regularly formed for purposes of assault and defense as if constructed by a military engineer.

Behind these solid ramparts of stone a few determined men, well armed, could keep at bay and slaughter ten times their number, with comparative safety to themselves and an easy way of exit over the mountains in the rear. It is for this reason marauding bands of Indians have chosen the Cocospera Pass for many of their most daring assaults upon the Mexican soldiery, and upon travelers attempting to make their way up north. The bones of the unfortunate men and families killed here would, it is said, pave the road from one end of the cañon to the other.

I was interested in taking some views of the scenery in the Cocospera by Mr. Bartlett's romantic narrative of the captivity and sufferings of Doña Inez, a young Mexican girl, whose family were murdered in this cañon about twelve years ago, and herself captured and held in bondage by the Apaches for fifteen months, subject to the most cruel treatment. News of her captivity having reached Mr. Bartlett during his service as Boundary Commissioner, he made a demand upon Mangus Colorado, the Apache chief, for her release. The answer was insolent and characteristic—that it was none of his business; this was a matter between the Apaches and the Mexicans. Mr. Bartlett explained that under the treaty between his Government and Mexico the officers of the United States were bound to aid the authorities of Sonora in suppressing Indian hostilities; that this was a very flagrant case, and if the girl was not at once delivered up he would proceed to take her by force. Having a strong party to back up his demand it was deemed prudent by the cunning Apache to comply with it, and Doña Inez was reluctantly delivered to the Commissioner, who turned her over to Captain Gomez, of the Mexican army, then commandant at Tubac. It was admitted by all that Mr. Bartlett had manifested a most praiseworthy and chivalrous interest in the misfortunes of this young woman. At the tender age of fifteen she had seen her relatives murdered before her eyes; had been dragged over mountains and deserts by ruthless savages; had suffered the most cruel barbarities at their hands; and was now once more, by the exertions of this humane American, restored to her friends and to civilization. The delicate and chivalrous conduct of Mr. Bartlett toward the fair captive can not be too highly estimated, considering her beauty and the peculiar circumstances of her career. Far different was the course of Captain Gomez, who, upon finding a beautiful young woman placed in his charge—of his own country too—fell desperately in love with her, and, contrary to all the rules of propriety, took her to lodge in his own quarters. When Mr. Bartlett next heard of her she was the idol and the ornament of the house of Gomez, who loved her not wisely but too well to marry her, having already a wife in the city of Mexico. This breach of duty and implied faith aroused the indignation of our Commissioner, who had so nobly rescued and delicately cherished the divine Inez; and it is currently stated in Arizona that he made it a subject of official protest to the Governor of Sonora and a letter of serious complaint to the Bishop. The Governor and Bishop, as I am told, were greatly mortified at the conduct of Gomez; but upon receiving his explanation, which was to the effect that his wife was still living, and would be very unhappy if he married another woman, they acquitted him of all blame in the matter, and Doña Inez continued to enjoy the hospitality of his mansion.

The sequel of the romance I find recorded in my own note-book. Doña Inez is married and settled at Santa Cruz. Her husband is not Captain Gomez. I called at her house in company with Mr. Poston, and had an interview with her on the subject of her captivity among the Apaches. She had heard of the narrative of her adventures written by Mr. Bartlett, but had never seen his book. She spoke kindly and gratefully of her deliverer. On the subject of her treatment by the Apaches she was somewhat reserved. Her husband was much more communicative.

Doña Inez is now about twenty-seven years of age, though she looks older. Her features are thin, sharp, and care-worn, owing to ill-health. Possibly she may have been pretty in her youth. Mr. Bartlett thought so, and he ought to be a judge. He saw a great deal of beauty unadorned in his tour of exploration.

This pleasant little history of captivity, suffering, and love, so impressively associated with the wild region through which we were passing, will be appropriately followed by the romance of an unprotected American female whom we found at the old Mission of Cocospera. All along the road we heard vague rumors of the adventures and exploits of this remarkable woman, who seemed to be ubiquitous, and to possess at least a dozen different names. Even the Mexicans, when they spoke of her, did so with a smile and a shrug of the shoulders, as much as to say she was "some" even in that country. A party of Americans whom we met at Imuriz, on their way from Hermosillo, prepared us to expect at Cocospera a valuable addition to our transport. They hinted at "a whole team" that was awaiting our arrival there, but warned us to be careful how we undertook to harness that team, as it was rather disposed to kick and bite. I must confess it was with considerable trepidation that I set out from our camp in the valley to make a sketch of the old Mission.

A more desolate-looking place than Cocospera does not, perhaps, exist in Sonora. A few Mexican and Indian huts, huddled around a ruinous old church, with a ghostly population of Greasers, Yaqui Indians, skeleton dogs, and seedy sheep, is all that attracts the eye of a stranger under the best circumstances. Yet here lives the father-in-law of Pesquiera, Governor of Sonora—a poor old man, with a half-Indian family of children, of whom Pesquiera's wife is one. At the date of our visit the Apaches had just cleaned out the community of nearly all the cattle and sheep it possessed, killed one man, and filled the souls of the remainder with fear and tribulation, so that the place presented a very depressed appearance. To this there was but one exception—that of our heroine, the unprotected American female. I found her sitting upon a pile of adobes outside a dilapidated Mexican hovel, humming over in a lively strain some popular ditty of the times. Poston seemed disposed to evade the responsibility of his position as commander-in-chief of the party by introducing me to her as a gentleman of a literary turn, who had taken a lively interest in her history. She immediately arose and grasped me by the hand; I was just the man she was looking for.

By-the-way, hadn't she seen me in Frisco? My countenance was familiar. Didn't I keep bar on Dupont Street? No? Well, by jingo! that was funny. She was very glad we had come, any how; shook us by the hand again very cordially; had been expecting us for several days; wanted to make tracks from Cocospera as soon as possible; was getting tired of the society; good enough people in their way, but had no snap about them. She liked people with snap. These Mexicans were dead-alive sort of cusses. The men had no grit and the women no jingle. Thought, upon the whole, Cocospera was played out, and would prefer going to Santa Cruz. She claimed to be a native of Georgia, and was strong on Southern rights. Said she had prospected a while in Australia, and bobbed around Frisco for the last few years. Got tired of civilization, and came down in the steamer to Guyamas last July in company with "a friend," who left her at Magdalena. Another "friend" brought her up here and went "a prospecting." She had claims, and expected they would turn out rich; but, hang it all, she didn't care a cuss about the mines. The excitement pleased her; it was so jolly to be knockin' around among the Apaches! Wouldn't she like to skelp some of 'em; you bet she'd make jerked meat of their ears if she once got a show at 'em! She didn't speak Spanish; had been eight days at this infernal place among a set of scallywags who didn't understand her lingo. Was about ready to change her location; didn't care a flip where it was, so there was fiddles around the premises. Was a photographer by profession; that was played out; dull work; didn't pay. Hadn't any instruments at present, and wouldn't photograph scallywags any how. Heigh-ho! Rickety Jo! Great country this!

Such was the style of address of this astounding female. She was sharp, thin, and energetic, not very old, and comparatively good-looking. After she had shown us around the town, making various sparkling comments upon the natives and their style of living, she ushered us into the church, smiling contemptuously at the sacred daubs on the walls.

"Look-a-here!" said she, mounting a pile of rubbish and hauling out a couple of grinning skulls from an alcove; "that's what we're all coming to. Them's monks. Don't they look jolly?"

I must confess I was a little shocked at her levity, and mumbled over something about the dust of the dead.

"Bosh!" cried the lively female; "what's the odds so long as we're happy! Your skull and mine, and the skulls of a dozen more of us, may be foot-balls for the Apaches before a week."

I turned away and signalized Poston that we had better retire to camp. In the evening we had the honor of a visit from our fast friend. She stepped with a grand swagger into camp, nodded familiarly to the soldiers, and said, "Them's the boys I like to see."

Poston's buffalo-robe was spread on the ground close by our ambulance. Without the least hesitation she took possession of it, merely observing, "I like this. It suits me. A fellow can sleep like a top in such a bed as this!"

From time to time, as she gave us the benefit of her ideas touching the world and things generally, she laughed heartily at the figure she would cut in society, sun-burnt, freckled, and dressed as she was; and varied the interest of the occasion by singing a few popular songs, and reading choice selections of poetry from a book which she pulled out of a satchel belonging to one of the party.

Having thus cast a glow of inspiration over the younger members of our command, she suddenly jumped up exclaiming, "Hurrah, boys! Let's stir up the town! Who's got a fiddle? By jingo we'll have a fandango!"

Nobody had a fiddle, but there was a guitar in camp, and it was not long before the fandango was under a full head of steam. Greasers, Yaqui Indians, soldiers, and señoritas were at it full tilt, amidst all the noise and din and horrible confusion of a genuine Spanish baile. The fast woman jumped and capered and pirouetted in a style that brought down the house; and it was long after midnight when our part of the company began to straggle into camp.

As there was no room in the ambulance even for so entertaining a companion, the proposition to transport her to some point of greater security on American soil was submitted to our gallant young Lieutenant, commander of the escort. The question was debated in camp, Was an American woman to be left by an American party in the midst of an Apache country? Had her character any thing to do with the question of humanity or the duty of placing her at some point where her life would be secure? Of course not. Go she must, and go she did, in the baggage-wagon. All along the road, in the wildest and most dangerous places, she popped her head out at intervals to see how things in general were flourishing; twitted the "boys" on their style of riding; sang snatches of Opera, and was especially great on ballads for the multitude.

"When this cruel war is over," she would scream at the top of her voice, "You bet I'll go to Frisco, a kiting, a kiting,

"As the swallows homeward fly."

Thus she entertained us, and thus she clung to us; taking a grip upon our unfortunate Lieutenant that seemed likely to obliterate him from the face of the earth. She jolted and jogged along in the baggage-wagon to Santa Cruz, and didn't like the place; she rattled on to the San Antonio ranch, and didn't yearn to stay there; she jingled away to Tubac, and considered it too infernally dull for a coyote or a wild-cat. In fact, she rather enjoyed sloshing around, and manifested a desire to accompany our expedition throughout the entire range of our travels. It was abundantly evident to us all that she was inspired with a romantic attachment for our gallant Lieutenant. The shafts of Cupid began to shoot from her glittering eyes, and their fatal influence became fearfully perceptible. He grew pale and weary; was fretful and impatient; and seemed like a man burdened with heavy cares. After a week or so it became necessary to send the wagon down to Tucson for a fresh supply of provisions. The Lieutenant brightened up; a happy thought struck him; he would shuffle off this incubus that hung upon him like a cloud. What excuse he made I never could learn, but he packed up our enterprising female, addressed a note to the officer in command at Tucson, stating the causes which had induced him to give her transportation, and sent her to that tropical region, which he thought would be congenial to her tastes. The last I heard of her she was enjoying the hospitality of our vaquero.

The country through which we passed after leaving the old mission of Cocospera, consists of a series of broad cañons and open valleys, abounding in rich pastures of gaeta-grass, patches of mesquit, and cactus of various kinds. For the most part it is well watered. A few abandoned ranch-houses and corrals on the way-side indicated that it was once a grazing region for herds of cattle and sheep; but now it is a dreary waste, so far as animal life is concerned. The soil is rich, and the remains of acequias for irrigation show that it was once subject to cultivation. In such a region as this, favored by the finest climate I have ever enjoyed, it is impossible to estimate the variety and value of the crops which it is capable of producing. All the vegetation of the temperate zones, and most of the plants known in the tropics, will flourish with wonderful luxuriance. Millions of acres of the finest lands thus lie idle in the northern part of Sonora. Probably these lands, owing to the long droughts which prevail every few years, will never be in much demand for farming purposes, but as ranges for cattle and sheep they are unsurpassed. The grass consists of three verdure. The trees burst forth into leaf, and the valleys and hills are decorated with flowers; the corn in the milpas springs into life; the streams rush down from every mountain cañon, and the thirsty earth rejoices in the refreshing deluge. June is the season of greatest vegetable growth. So warm and porous is the ground that it quickly absorbs the moisture, and in a few days after the heaviest rain one would scarcely believe such a blessing was ever enjoyed. Roaring torrents have become dry arroyas; floods that covered the low lands have disappeared, and the dry, cracked earth seems gasping for more water; vegetation begins to look parched; the grass is scorched by the burning rays of the sun; and thus it continues till another torrent reinspires the earth with new life and vigor.

Our next camping-place was at the ruins of San Lazaro, an old missionary establishment long since gone to decay. The ranch of San Lazaro is watered by principal varieties; the sacatone, a coarse, thick, and strong variety, growing in bunches; the mesquit, which covers most of the lands lying within the range of the mesquit timber; and the grama, or fine meadow-grass, occupying the open valleys and hill-sides.

The rainy season commences in June and lasts generally till September. During the winter there is but little rain; but upon the opening of spring there are showers which start the vegetation. Immediately after the first heavy rain the earth becomes clothed in the richest the Santa Cruz River, and is one of the finest grazing regions in the State. As usual, it is now uninhabited. Lying immediately on one of the Apache trails, it has been robbed of its cattle, till nothing is left save the ruined adobe walls of the ranch-houses and mission, and the broken fences of the corrals and milpas. At the time the mission was occupied by the Jesuit priests, San Lazaro must have been in a high state of cultivation. The walls of the main building, within which we camped, show evidences of considerable architectural style. Guard-houses and watch-towers are still to be seen; also the remains of an orchard, with acequias for irrigation, and two large tanks for tanning hides. It was evident the good fathers were not deficient in industry.

Passing through the picturesque little cañon of San Lazaro, which extends some three miles from the Mission, we soon entered upon the pastures and milpas of Santa Cruz. Wild ducks were abundant here, and we killed enough to last us for several days.

The town of Santa Cruz stands on a barren and elevated plateau, overlooking the grain-fields, and consists of a dilapidated church and about eighty or a hundred adobe huts, inhabited by the usual population of Mexicans, Indians, burros, and dogs. It is the most northern town in Sonora, and derives its support chiefly from the corn-crops and a small trade with the Mowry or Patagonia mine. The total population is about four or five hundred.

Owing to its elevation and the position of the surrounding mountains, Santa Cruz is, perhaps, the only inhabited spot in the State of Sonora which is cool all the year round. The water froze in our buckets while we camped in that vicinity; and although the sky was clear the air was raw and penetrating. The valley is well irrigated, but the people are too idle and thriftless to do more than derive a bare subsistence from the earth. Stealing and gambling are pursuits much more congenial to their tastes. Exposed to constant encroachments from the Apaches, and robbed of nearly all their stock, they seem to have no hope of bettering their condition. If it were not for the opening of the Mowry and San Antonio mines it is probable Santa Cruz would be at this time entirely deserted. There are no stores in the place. A German Jew, named Apfel, keeps mescal and a few dry-goods and trinkets. Supplies of goods and provisions to any great extent can only be had by sending to Magdalena. Flour, corn, and pinole may be had occasionally, but the supply is scanty and uncertain.

I thought I had seen the concentration of filth, laziness, and inanity, and the perfection of vicious mixtures of races at Imuriz and Magdalena; but Santa Cruz caps the climax. The more southern towns possess at least the advantage of a genial temperature, and it is not unpleasant to see people enjoy the dolce far niente, even if they indulge in it to excess. The chilling climate of Santa Cruz sweeps away all the dreamy illusions of indolence, and reduces the inhabitants to a condition of torpor depressing to witness. Too inert to stir about and gather sufficient wood for a comfortable fire, a genuine native of this region sits shivering all day long over three twigs of mesquit, his dirty serape drawn up over his shoulders, his skin a bilious black yellow, the inevitable cigarrito in his mouth; a score of starved coyote curs snapping around his heels; no gleam of hope in his eye, no spark of ambition in his nature—a dreary spectacle of wretchedness and inanity.

Ask him the simplest question, and the extent of his knowledge is quien sabe? His whole life is a quien sabe business, signifying nothing. The world can not afford a more depressing specimen of degraded humanity.

An incident that occurred during our stay will show the shifts to which these wretched beings resort to procure the means of subsistence. In passing through the cañon of San Lazaro, one of the escort picked up a few sticks of wood which he found lying by the side of a broken-down fence, and threw them in the box of the forage-wagon, as was customary before entering camp, for convenience in starting a fire. No sooner had we halted on the Plaza than a miserable-looking wretch, shrinking into the folds of his serape, made a formal call upon our Lieutenant in company with the Alcalde, and demanded “cinco pesos” for the wood, alleging that it was gathered on his ground, and formed a part of his fences. There had not been a fence in use at the place in question for over three years, and the professed owner of the wood no more dared to venture that far from Santa Cruz than to enter an Apache strong-hold. The Lieutenant offered him fifty cents for the wood, preferring not to have any dispute about it; but he indignantly rejected the offer, and insisted upon the amount originally demanded. The Lieutenant then proposed to return him the wood (about an armful) which was also rejected. To avoid the unpleasant results of a storm that was gathering in the faces of our indignant volunteers, who were spoiling for a chance to raze the town, we repacked the wagons, and proceeded on our journey. That evening we camped seven miles from Santa Cruz, at the hacienda of the San Antonio mines, where we learned all the particulars in relation to the unhappy fate of Mills and Stevens, whose tragic death occurred in an adjacent cañon.

In my next I propose to give an account of our tour among the silver mines of Patagonia (now called the Mowry Mines), Santa Rita, and Cerro Colorado.

THE city of Vicksburg, about four hundred miles above New Orleans, is situated on a bluff on the east bank of the Mississippi, which commands the stream for many miles above and below. The nature of the location renders it nearly impregnable against any attack by water. The peculiarities of the surrounding country render it exceedingly difficult of military approach by land.

Early in January, 1861, the rebels commenced throwing up batteries at this spot, and after the fall of Island No. 10 their fortifications were greatly enlarged and strengthened. In June, 1862, some abortive attempts were made toward the reduction of the place by Admiral Farragut, who ascended the river with a fleet from New Orleans. After several weeks of bombardment it became evident that the place could not be taken without the co-operation of a land force, and the fleet withdrew. At this time Vicksburg was the only fortified place on the Mississippi held by the rebels. During this summer, however, they took possession of Port Hudson, nearly three hundred miles below, which they strongly fortified that ships might be prevented from ascending from New Orleans to co-operate in the reduction of Vicksburg. They were so far successful in this movement that it became necessary to assail Vicksburg from above by the army of General Grant.

Immediately after the battle of Corinth arrangements were made for this enterprise. On the 20th of September, 1862, an expedition set sail from Memphis under General Sherman. It consisted of a fleet of one hundred transports, several gun-boats, and a force of about fifteen thousand men. They arrived at the mouth of the Yazoo, just above Vicksburg, on Saturday morning, September 29. A line of high bluffs here fringe the eastern shores of both the Yazoo and the Mississippi. This bluff on the Yazoo is at a short distance from the river, and the intervening space consists of a low and marshy bottom, often overflowed by the swellings of the stream, and at all other times intersected by sluggish bayous. This chain of bluffs frowned with batteries on the summit and sides, and with rifle-pits near the base. The plan of attack was for General Sherman to assail these works in front, while General Grant, advancing by the way of Jackson, was to charge them in the rear. But by the inconceivable imbecility of a subordinate at Hollis Springs, a raiding party of rebels had fallen upon our magazines of supplies there, and had destroyed two millions' worth in a few hours. General Grant was thus delayed. General Sherman heroically, perhaps imprudently, resolved to make the attempt alone.

On the very day of the disembarking of the troops General Sherman, encountering but slight opposition, pushed his army across the marshy river bottom to near the edge of the bluff. The next morning the engagement was opened, first with an impetuous fire of artillery, and then with an infantry charge upon the first line of the rebel rifle-pits. The heroic enterprise was crowned with success, and as the patriots swarmed into the captured works the rebels fled to their second line of defense. In the mean time the rebels had concentrated a great force within their ramparts, while but one-half of the patriot army designed for the enterprise was in the field. Sunday and a part of Monday were spent by both armies in preparation for the decisive conflict, while each endeavored to annoy the other by occasional artillery firing. General Sherman, having thrown several bridges across the bayous, ordered a general assault at two o'clock Monday afternoon.

At the appointed hour the storm burst in all its fury. The hill belched forth flame and smoke, with tremblings of the earth under the cannons' roar, as though a hundred volcanoes were in violent eruption. The soldiers, in the charge, were compelled to wade the bayous and struggle through the swamps. General Blair's horse became hopelessly mired, and he slid from him and led his brigade, which was first in the charge, on foot. De Courcey's brigade was next; but his men pressed forward so vehemently in the daring onset that it was soon difficult to tell which brigade was in the advance. Onward they swept through flame, and smoke, and blood, leaving the dying and the dead behind them, climbing, crawling, fighting their way up the slope, with the desperation of men resolved to conquer or to die.

Their thinned ranks, breathless and bleeding, reached the centre of the enemy's works. Here they were assailed by an awful fire from outnumbering foes nearly surrounding them. Bravely they had won their position; but it was found impossible to hold it. One-third of Blair's division, in this terrible charge, had been placed hors du combat. They had taken both the first and second line of the rebel intrenchments, and yet they found but defeat in their victory. Such a destructive storm of shot and shell was poured in upon them that they were compelled precipitately to retire. With saddened hearts they yielded to the cruel necessity. General Blair, who was one of the first to ascend, was the last to leave the hill.

Such was the battle of Chickasaw Bluffs. It was a brave but desperate conflict. The patriots accomplished all that mortal valor could achieve. But the experiment proved that it was impossible to carry those frowning heights, by charging them in the face of all their batteries with but half of the army commissioned for the enterprise.

Any further attempt to carry Vicksburg from this direction, and with the force then at General Sherman's disposal, would be manifestly fruitless. Preparations were accordingly made to withdraw from the scene of the disaster and return to Memphis. Nearly four months now elapsed while more formidable preparations were being made for the renewal of the assault upon Vicksburg. On the 29th of January, 1863, General Grant, descending the Mississippi with gun-boats and transports, landed a portion of his army a few miles above Vicksburg, on the western shore, at Milliken's Bend. Another portion he landed a little farther down the river, here about a mile wide, opposite Vicksburg, at Young's Point. Under this indefatigable commander there was now commenced a series of operations almost unparalleled in the history of military science.

The Mississippi River, fed by innumerable tributaries, emptying their floods into this majestic stream from all directions, is subject to sudden and great changes in its volume of water. The country around, low and marshy, is often flooded for leagues in the swellings of the river, the stream expanding often into an almost illimitable ocean, spreading through sombre forests and over gloomy morasses. Through a region of hundreds of square miles this country, sublimely dreary, where God, by the slow deposit of ages, is preparing soil for future tillers, now presents bogs, and lakes, and sluggish bayous, the congenial home of alligators and all unclean reptiles. Mosquitoes, the vilest of earth's tormentors, darken the air. Majestic trees, draped in funereal moss, overhang these gloomy waters, while the rankest undergrowth of every tough, creeping, climbing, intertwining shrub renders the boundless thicket almost impenetrable.

Where the land is sufficiently raised above the water to be cultivated, it is protected from the spring and autumnal freshets by dykes or levees, artificial mounds of earth, about ten feet high and fifteen feet wide, constructed, at an immense expense, along the river banks. Vicksburg is situated upon the eastern bank of the river, on a high bluff, near the point of one of the most majestic bends of the stream. On the opposite or western shore of the peninsula formed by the bend the land is low and protected by a dyke. In the attempt upon Vicksburg by Commodore Farragut's fleet General Williams had essayed to cut a canal across the neck of this peninsula, hoping thus to change the channel of the river. This would leave Vicksburg an inland town of no military importance. Our ships could ascend and descend the stream far beyond the reach of the Vicksburg batteries. The plan was abandoned then, in consequence of the low state of the water.

General Grant's first attempt upon Vicksburg was by the renewal of this experiment. He hoped at least thus to secure a channel for the passage of his transports. Accomplishing this he could land his troops below Vicksburg, and thus gain a position to assault the city from its rear. For six weeks thousands of hands were incessantly at work in this vast trench, and the eyes of the nation anxiously watched the progress of the enterprise. When the work was nearly two-thirds done an unfortunate break in the dam, at the upper end of the canal, flooded the immense ditch with water, effectually stopping all further work. Before this injury could be repaired the period of high-water passed away and the enterprise was abandoned.

SECOND EXPERIMENT BY LAKE PROVIDENCE.

General Grant, aware of the grandeur of the task before him, and of the uncertainty of the success of the canal, had instituted other measures to be carried on simultaneously. While a portion of his army were busy with pickaxe and spade at Young's Point, another body of men were detailed for a somewhat similar operation up the river nearly seventy miles north from Vicksburg. Here there is found, about five miles west of the river, a large expanse of water called Lake Providence. A bayou full of snags, and winding through the entangling forest, connected the southern extremity of this lake with the northern extremity of Swan Lake. This sheet of water, thirty miles in extent, found an outlet in the Tensas River which emptied into the Black River, which last stream flowed sluggishly into the Red River. Could the boats descend by this route they would enter the Mississippi several miles below Natchez. It was apparently only necessary to cut a canal, five miles long, through the morass, dig out the shallows, drag out the snags, cut away the wind-falls and saw off the gigantic stumps, through this route of more than one hundred and fifty miles, to give us, as it were, a new Mississippi parallel with the old one.

Stupendous as this plan was, it was by no means Quixotic. The river is continually abandoning its old channels and finding new ones. A glance at the map will show that it would not be strange if in this way the channel of the stream should be changed even to the Gulf. The region thus to be traversed was gloomy, wild, desolate, and mostly uninhabited. Here and there could be found a spot of sunny soil in the midst of the pestilential morass. In that dreary wilderness the adventurers engaged in one of the most stupendous enterprises of war had no human foe to fear. Newspaper correspondents kept the community well informed respecting the progress of these plans. Many were very sanguine respecting the result. It was even by some apprehended that the channel of the river would be changed all the way to the Gulf, leaving both Natchez and New Orleans inland towns far away to the east of that great river upon which their existence depended. One letter-writer, in the flush of anticipated success, writes:

"The control of the Mississippi is almost within our grasp. Even if we have to desolate West Louisiana, we may save the nation. Even if we shall be obliged to leave New Orleans, the removal of a few spadefuls of dirt may give us the outlet to the sea undisputed."

The canal was successfully opened. One steamer and a few barges entered the lake and began to descend the sluggish bayous. But the river persisted in its old course. As the waters of the spring flood fell, the new channel became but a shallow creek, through which the majestic stream scorned to flow. West Louisiana was not flooded, New Orleans was not left to dust and ashes. The Lake Providence canal proved a failure—one of those failures through a series of which keen sagacity and indomitable energy, fruitful in resources and never discouraged, often accomplishes its most signal successes.

There was a third plan to be tried. One hundred and fifty miles north of Vicksburg in an air line, and nearly opposite St. Helena, there is on the eastern shore of the river a sheet of water called Moon Lake. It is separated from the river but by a narrow strip of land, a few hundred yards wide. From this lake a crooked and narrow stream, known as the Yazoo Pass, leads into the Coldwater River. This again enters into the Tallahatchie, which in turn empties into the Yazoo, about seventy miles north of Vicksburg. It was decided to cut a canal into Moon Lake, clear the obstructions from Yazoo Pass, and by this series of streams gain a position in the rear of the rebel fortifications at Haines's Bluff, near the mouth of the Yazoo.

The canal was speedily cut, and the steamboats, entering Moon Lake, commenced their perilous descent through these labyrinthine streams, along which the canoe of the Indian had never yet been paddled. The task was one of extremest difficulty. The crooked channel was overhung by the gigantic branches of cypress and sycamore trees, sweeping low down over the water and rendering the passage almost impossible. Gnarled roots and stumps and snags obstructed the channel. The flood of the swollen Mississippi rushing through the bayous created a swift and dangerous current. Upon these whirling streams the steamers were drifted along, using their paddle-wheels only in backing water to check their otherwise too rapid motion. They found it frequently necessary to make an entire stop to remove obstructions. Under these circumstances it is not strange that their average rate of speed should have been but a mile in three hours and a half.

The expedition succeeded at length in surmounting all obstacles, and passing through the Tallahatchie they entered the Yazoo. Here, in a commanding position, the rebels had erected a fort. Surrounded by illimitable bogs it was impossible to approach these formidable works by land. The wooden gun-boats had but small chance against their formidable batteries. For two days the rebel ramparts were fiercely bombarded from the boats, but it was all in vain. The fort could not be reduced, and it could not be passed. This plan thus had also failed, and the expedition returned to its point of departure.

Weak souls are disheartened by obstacles. Strong ones are only incited by them to more heroic endeavor. General Grant does not appear to have been in the slightest degree discouraged. "Try, try again," was his motto. About seven miles up the Yazoo, from its entrance into the Mississippi, there is the mouth of a stream known as Steele's Bayou. This bayou is connected with a labyrinthine net-work of creeks, called Black Bayou, Rolling Fork, and Sunflower River. These sluggish waters have several entrances into the Yazoo, one of the most important of which is just below Yazoo City. By this succession of streams a complete circuit of Haines's Bluff is made.

Admiral Porter on the 14th of March started with a gun-boat fleet, determined, if possible, to force a passage through this tortuous, tangled, and hitherto impervious channel, to attain a position in the rear of the batteries frowning upon the bluffs. The expedition was accompanied by a considerable force of infantry under General Sherman. The progress of the boats was very slow. The Admiral was compelled to cut his way through an almost impenetrable forest. Meanwhile the rebels gathered in force to dispute his advance. Their sharp-shooters, lurking in every thicket, and behind every concealment, threw bullets with unerring aim upon his decks, and upon every working party. They felled huge forest trees across his path to retard his advance, and in the rear of his passage to prevent his return. The danger of being caged and captured in this hideous wilderness became imminent. The expedition had nearly reached the Sunflower River when their peril became manifestly so great that prudence demanded that they should retrace their steps. In safety they accomplished their return. Thus ended the last of these marvelous and heroic attempts to capture Vicksburg by digging canals and traversing bayous.

"What next?" the nation anxiously inquired. "Nothing!" was the response of all timid souls. But this was not General Grant's response. He had put his hand to the plow, and was not disposed to look back. At no time had General Grant depended upon the success of either of these movements. He fully appreciated the philosophy of the declaration of Holy Writ: "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand, for thou knowest not which may prosper, whether this or that." Other plans were already fully matured in his mind. But they could not be consummated until a fall of the water should render it possible for the army to traverse the marshy country on the western banks of the river opposite Vicksburg. In the mean while the measures already attempted, which certainly presented a fair chance of success, served to occupy the army, to engage the thoughts and feed the hopes of the country, always impatient of idleness, and to divert the attention of the enemy from those designs in which General Grant reposed his ultimate hopes.

General Sherman's desperate assault had demonstrated that Vicksburg could not be taken by a direct attack from the river. The failure of the Yazoo expedition, and the expedition through Steele's Bayou, proved that the fortress could not be approached for assault from the north. One alternative remained. It was to effect the transportation of the troops to some point south of Vicksburg, cross the river, and thus gain a position in the rear. But how could this be accomplished? Some of the gun-boats might, by chance, run the terrible batteries ; but how could the troops be transported down the river ? The attempt to convey transports around the Vicksburg batteries by the Williams's Canal, and by Lake Providence, had both failed. Audacity attempted and accomplished that which the most skillful engineering could not achieve.

As soon as the spring flood had sufficiently fallen to render it possible, General Grant ordered his forces to advance by land through the forest, and threading the edge of the morass on the western shore of the river, entirely concealed from observation, to march from Milliken's Landing above the rebel ramparts to New

Carthage below. In this movement General M'Clermand, with the Eleventh Army Corps, led the advance. It had been necessary to delay this enterprise until the water in the river and the bayous should recede. Still the road was all but impassable. It lay through a vast bog, intersected with numerous bayous half-flooded with water. The heavy artillery wheels cut through the slime and the mud, rendering the path a perfect mortar-bed, through which the men and horses waded knee-deep, and where the hubs of the wheels often disappeared from sight. The advance of the army was found to be utterly impracticable, except by the building of corduroy roads, cutting outlets for the egress of the water, and bridging the bayous. In fact, the army had to build for itself, under the most difficult circumstances, a military road as it advanced. Twenty miles of levee had to be most carefully guarded lest it should be cut by the enemy, and the whole country flooded.

The vigilant foe got some intimation of this movement, notwithstanding it had been most carefully concealed. As the patriot troops approached New Carthage they found that the rebels had cut the levee, and the surrounding country was so flooded that New Carthage was converted into an island. After ineffectual attempts to bridge the rushing waters, or to cross them in boats, it was found necessary to march in search of some point farther down the river. Inspired rather than discouraged by such obstacles the heroic band pressed on, and after having constructed seventy miles of road, and about two thousand feet of bridging, they reached their final destination.

A considerable part of the army was now south of Vicksburg, but on the wrong side of the river, which here rushed along, a wide, deep, turbid torrent. They had no means of crossing; and as the rebels had a strong array of batteries at Port Hudson, no transports could be sent up the river to their aid. But without transports the river could not be crossed. General Grant was prepared for this emergency. He had resolved to undertake the apparently desperate enterprise of running the terrific batteries with his steam-boats.

Three transports and eight gun-boats, in a bend of the river where they were secluded from all observation, were secretly prepared for the trying ordeal. The transports were plain, wooden boats. Speed was essential to their safety, and capaciousness necessary to render them useful should they reach the army below. The boilers were carefully protected by bales of cotton and hay on the side exposed to the batteries. The engines were put in the best possible running order. An ingenious contrivance was adopted to prevent any gleam of the fires from reaching the eyes and guiding the aim of the foe. It was not deemed right to command men to engage in an enterprise so desperate, and volunteers were called for. More came forward than could be accepted, and the eager aspirants agreed to abide the decision of the lot. The excitement was intense to see who would be the favored ones. Pilots, engineers, firemen, deck hands, had eagerly proffered their services for one of the most perilous enterprises in which one could engage. One single regiment furnished one hundred and thirty-two such volunteers. The contest among them was so great that a boy, who was a successful drawer, was offered one hundred dollars for his place. He rejected the offer, held his post, and passed the batteries in safety. Such was the spirit which animated the American patriots in this war against rebellion.

The plan was for the gun-boats to pass down in single file, and, when opposite the batteries, to open upon them a terrific fire. Under cover of this fire, and sheltered by the gun-boats, the transports were to endeavor to run by unseen. A little before midnight, when most of the lights had disappeared in Vicksburg and silence reigned over both of the camps, the gun-boats, one after another, huge shadowy masses, emerged from their concealment and floated silently down the stream. The patriot army breathlessly watched the movements of these clouds of darkness, from which war's most awful thunders were soon to burst. Three quarters of an hour of silence elapsed, when two flashes from one of the Vicksburg batteries, followed by a roar which shook the hills, announced the opening of the sublime drama. In an instant the whole line of bluffs was ablaze with fire. The three transports, the Forest Queen, Henry Clay, and Silver Wave, were now on the most impetuous rush down the stream. The iron-clad gun-boats lay squarely before the city, from twenty-five guns pouring their storm of shell, grape, and shrapnell directly into its streets. Suddenly a gleam of light appeared, and an immense bonfire blazed from one of the hills of Vicksburg, converting night into day. The beacon-flame lit up the river so brilliantly that every boat was exposed to the careful aim of the batteries. The first of the transports, the Forest Queen, received two shots, which so disabled her that she floated helpless upon the current. She was immediately taken in tow by a gun-boat, and carried without farther injury down the stream. The next transport, the Henry Clay, was struck by a shell, which set her cotton on fire. The curling flames grew every moment more brilliant, throwing up huge billows of smoke, and the majestic fabric floated down the stream a mountain of fire. The crew took to their boats and escaped on the western shore. The doomed vessel was burned to the water's edge. The Silver Wave ran the fiery gauntlet without being touched. No one on either transport was injured. The whole of the eight gun-boats reached their journey's end without material damage. On the Benton, Porter's flag-ship, one man was killed and two wounded. The batteries extended along a line of eight miles. One hour and a quarter was occupied in passing them.

The injuries which the boats received in running the batteries were speedily repaired by volunteer mechanics, who came forth from the ranks, ready for any work in wood or iron, and who were skillful artisans in all the most difficult departments of mechanics.

"It is a striking feature," says General Grant, "so far as my observation goes, of the present volunteer army of the United States, that there is nothing which men are called upon to do, mechanical or professional, that accomplished adepts can not be found for the duty required in almost every regiment."

The success of this experiment was so gratifying that on the 22d of April six more transports were sent down the stream, towing twelve barges loaded with forage. One of these transports, the Tigress, received a shot below the water-line, and sank on the Louisiana shore. The rest, with one-half of the barges, got through with but trifling damage.

On the 29th of April the fleet and army were ready for action. A little below Vicksburg, and on the same side of the river, is the town of Grand Gulf. Here General Grant had expected to effect a landing, and make it, for the time being, the base of his operations against Vicksburg. But the rebels, anticipating the danger, had planted batteries there and dug rifle-pits. It was not, however, supposed that these works were very formidable, but that, under protection of the gun-boats, General Grant would be able to land a sufficient force to carry them by assault. Admiral Porter, with the gun-boats, opened fire on the 29th, and continued the bombardment for five hours. General Grant, who witnessed the battle from a tug in the middle of the stream, says,

"Many times it seemed to me that the gun-boats were within pistol-shot of the enemy's batteries."

The attempt, however, proved unsuccessful. The gun-boats, having exhausted all the energies of valor and of skill, were, a little after noon, compelled to withdraw, leaving the principal battery of the rebels apparently uninjured. During all the time this bombardment was raging the army had been impatiently waiting upon the transports the moment when their advance would be ordered. The withdrawal of the fleet filled them with disappointment, for it seemed that the whole expedition had proved a failure.

General Grant, however, was prepared for this emergency, as he had been for all others. A previous reconnoissance had disclosed a good landing at a point a short distance below, called Bruinsburg. He immediately disembarked his troops, and ordered them to continue their march down the western banks of the river about three miles. Their movement was buried in the forest, so that the foe could not perceive it. That night he ran the Grand Gulf batteries with his transports, and the next morning but one, on the 30th of April, triumphantly, and without the loss of a man, landed the whole force he had with him on the eastern shore of the river.

General Grant himself was the first man to step upon the bank.

One of the ever-friendly negroes was at hand to guide him through this unknown land by a good road from Bruinsburg to Port Gibson, a small town situated back from the river, in a southeasterly direction from Grand Gulf. This movement, in landing one corps of his army, the Thirteenth, under General M'Clermand, on the eastern banks of the river, was bold even to audacity. The enemy were strongly intrenched just above him, in superior force, commanding the river. General Sherman was still left with one corps above Vicksburg, for a purpose which will soon appear. Grant's line of communication was long and liable to attack. All the provisions of his army had to be conveyed by wagons down the western banks of the river, by the military road which he had constructed. The country through which he was to advance was wild, entirely unknown, very sparsely inhabited, full of hills and gloomy ravines, most admirably adapted for defensive warfare. Every thing now depended upon celerity of movement and almost reckless bravery. General Grant ordered his troops to march with as little baggage as possible. He set them the example.

"He took with him," says the Hon. Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, who accompanied the expedition, "neither a horse, nor an orderly, nor a camp chest, nor an over-coat, nor a blanket, nor even a clean shirt. His entire baggage for six days was a tooth-brush. He fared like the commonest soldier in his command, partaking of his rations and sleeping upon the ground with no covering but the canopy of heaven."

The attention of the main rebel army at Vicksburg was successfully diverted from these operations by the feint of an attack upon their works by the Fifteenth Corps, left behind under the impetuous Sherman. In co-operation with the fleet under Admiral Porter, a vigorous assault was made upon the rebel works at Haines's Bluff, on the 29th and 30th of April, just at the time when General Grant was landing at Bruinsburg. While the fleet opened a fierce bombardment on the batteries, the troops landed under cover of the fire, and made preparations as though to attempt to carry the works by storm. By this ruse the rebels were prevented from sending a combined force to crush General Grant, now advancing from the south. This object being accomplished, General Sherman re-embarked his troops, and following General Grant, marched them rapidly across the peninsula from Milliken's Landing, and down the western banks of the river to the transports. He effected a junction with Grant's main army about the 8th of May.

But General Grant, aware of the importance of the utmost possible celerity in such a movement as he had undertaken, did not wait for the arrival of General Sherman's corps.

"I deemed it a matter of vast importance," he said, "that the highlands should be reached without resistance."

MARCH THROUGH AN UNKNOWN COUNTRY.

He accordingly directed General M'Clerland with his corps to march directly for the interior, so soon as his troops could be provided with three days' rations. He did not even wait for army wagons to be brought across the river. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the 30th of April, the very day on which the troops landed at Bruinsburg, General M'Clerland's corps commenced its march. The road for two miles led along the levee. It then encountered the river bluffs, and, turning to the right, entered a hilly country, broken, precipitous, and rugged. It was the spring of the year, in almost a tropical clime. Beauty bloomed and fragrance was diffused all around them. Flowering shrubs embroidered the hill-sides, and the utmost luxuriance of vegetation, in billows of verdure, feasted the eye. The natural enchantments of the scene were enhanced by the brilliant military array, climbing the hills and threading the valleys in a long line, presenting a scene of wonderful picturesque beauty.

Even the waning day did not arrest their march. Through the still, cool, balmy hours of a brilliant night, they pressed joyously on until 2 o'clock in the morning. They were then brought to a sudden halt by a rebel battery which frowned upon an eminence directly before them.

As in the obscurity of that hour it was not possible to ascertain precisely its position, or the strength of its armament, the army were compelled to wait patiently until morning. The wearied soldiers were soon asleep. The rebel General Bowen had pushed out from his intrenchments at Grand Gulf, and had planted his batteries on these commanding heights, hoping to hold the patriots in check until he could receive reinforcements. But Generals Grant and M'Clermand allowed him no time to strengthen his position or to await his expected aid.

With the earliest dawn the position of the rebels was carefully examined. Again a friendly negro came to our aid. He informed General M'Clermand that the rebels had seized upon a point where the road forked. The two branches, however, leading by routes about two miles apart, both conducted to Port Gibson. The space between the two roads and for miles around was diversified by open fields, thick woods, abrupt hills, and deep ravines. Both of the two roads ran along narrow ridges, where a small force could hold a much larger one at bay. The ravines on either side were filled with thick underbrush, and were almost impassable, affording excellent protection against a flank attack. The rebels occupied both of these roads.

There was manifestly nothing to do but to fight, and that as quickly as possible. The position of the rebels was impregnable by a direct assault. Generals Hovey, Carr, and Smith, under the personal direction of General M'Clermand, attacked upon the right, and steadily forced the enemy back. General Osterhaus led the assault on the left. For a time it required his utmost exertions to hold his own. Soon, however, a division of General M'Pherson's corps, under General Logan of Illinois, came to his aid. Thus reinforced, and leading a gallant charge in person against the foe, he routed the portion of the rebel line against which he advanced, capturing three cannon.

Equally gallant and successful was a charge upon the right, by the Twelfth Division, under General Hovey of Indiana. But no valor exhibited on that day of heroic deeds is more worthy of honorable mention than that of Amos Neagle, a private in the Ninety-seventh Regiment of Illinois Cavalry, who captured the color-bearer and the colors of the Fifteenth Arkansas. The rebel banner was inscribed with the names of four battle-fields, "Oak Hills," "Elkhorn," "Corinth," and "Hatchie Bridge."

The battle occupied much of the day. During the darkness of the succeeding night the rebels retreated, leaving the road open for the march of the patriots to Port Gibson unopposed. The severity of this conflict may be estimated from the loss of the Union troops, which consisted of 130 killed 700 wounded and 3 missing. Five cannon and more than a thousand prisoners were captured from the rebels. Grant's dispatch to the Government, giving an account of the battle, was written by moonlight on the field. This victory was attended with glorious results. The routed rebels retreated across the Big Black River. Grand Gulf, thus outflanked and no longer tenable, was precipitately abandoned, the guns spiked, and the ammunition destroyed. On the 3d of May the deserted works were taken possession of by the fleet. It became immediately a very important base for General Grant's supplies until his plans for the investment of Vicksburg could be completed.

The rebel army was now divided. General Bowen had retreated across the Big Black River. General Joe Johnston was gathering another rebel army at Jackson, the capital of the State of Mississippi, an important military post situated at the junction of two railroads. The rebels had here large magazines of supplies. General Pemberton was in command at Vicksburg. He was to form a junction with Bowen and assail General Grant in front, while General Johnston, with the large force he was gathering was to fall on the patriot rear. The plan was excellent, but General Grant spoiled its execution. Deceiving his foes into the belief that he was making arrangements to pursue the fugitives across the Big Black, he suddenly and rapidly sent his whole army to the east, moving along the southern bank of the river. At the same time he abandoned his line of communication with the Grand Gulf, depending for the supply of his army upon forage and such stores as he could take with him.

In this advance General M'Pherson's corps took the right, moving directly upon Jackson, by the way of Raymond. Generals Sherman and M'Clermand took the left, keeping close to the Big Black and threatening the railroad between Jackson and Vicksburg. The ferries across the river were closely guarded so as to conceal General Grant's real intentions. These several corps of the patriot army were carefully kept within supporting distance of each other. General Grant's design was to seize the city of Jackson, scatter the army which Johnston was gathering there, and destroy the supplies he had accumulated. Then, having dispersed the one rebel army, he would turn suddenly about and destroy the other at Vicksburg. His plan was good. He accomplished it.

On the 12th of May General Logan came up with the enemy, two brigades strong, three miles in front of the town of Raymond. They were advantageously posted in a piece of timber, but were driven out after some hard fighting. Falling back a little way the rebels re-formed at Farnden's Creek. The banks of the creek were steep, and there was but little water in the channel. In front of the creek there was an open field. The rebels, crouching in this natural rifle-pit, could effectually sweep the approach with their fire, while they were protected.

Here again apparent rashness was the only prudence. A charge was ordered, impetuously made, and after a brief but terrible struggle the rebels were driven from their lurking-place, and were again on the retreat. In this brief, fiery storm of war the patriots lost 69 killed, 341 wounded, and 32 missing.

In Raymond copies of the Jackson papers of the previous day were found, from which the patriots read with amusement that they had been thoroughly defeated at Grand Gulf and Port Gibson, and were falling back to the protection of their gun-boats. The following day General McPherson entered Clinton. That night the rain fell in torrents, and continued to fall until noon of the 14th, making the roads very miry. The advance was, however, still continued, and the troops, animated by past success, pushed forward through mud and rain without a murmur.

In the afternoon of the 14th the enemy were again encountered, in line of battle, upon the crest of a hill over which the road passed, about two and a half miles from Jackson. At the foot of this hill there was an open plain which the rebel batteries effectually commanded. After a short artillery duel and some indecisive skirmishing, General Crocker ordered a charge. The patriots, with slow, measured, and resolute step, with banners unfurled and bugle peals, as on dress parade, moved across the plain, and up the hill regardless of volley after volley of death-dealing bullets which greeted their approach. Though great rents were made in their line, and the dead and the wounded were left strewn along their path, not a foot faltered. It was like the march of a spirit host, whom shot could not terrify and who returned no answering fire. Not until they were within thirty yards of the rebel line did the patriots discharge a gun. Then with unerring aim the whole line flashed with fire; and with a cheer, which burst simultaneously and almost frenziedly from every throat, they rushed, with fixed bayonets, upon the foe.

"Thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just." The guilty rebels, desperate men as they were, fighting not to establish but to overthrow free institutions, could not stand the onset, though they had every advantage of preparation and position. Their momentary resistance was swept away by the impetuosity of the charge. Breaking they fled in confusion, leaving a battery of six pieces to fall into the hands of the patriots. The victors pressed joyously forward, and that night occupied Jackson, the capital of Mississippi.

General Grant gave his bewildered foes no time to recover from their consternation. The evening of the capture of Jackson he learned that the rebel General Pemberton was advancing from Vicksburg to attack him in the rear. Leaving General Sherman to destroy the railroads, bridges, and governmental work-shops in Jackson, he immediately faced about with the remainder of his army, and, by converging lines, advanced toward Edwards's Dépôt, two miles east of the Big Black River. At this point the rebels were said to be strongly fortified. The rebel General Johnston, with ten batteries of artillery and twenty-five thousand men, was preparing to descend from the North; and thus General Grant was to be crushed between these two armies. General Grant's salvation depended upon his crushing or dispersing the troops of Pemberton before Johnston should arrive. General Pemberton selected his position with skill, which he had acquired at the expense of the United States at West Point. The main road, by which the patriots must advance, passing over open fields, turned suddenly to the south, and ascended diagonally a heavy swell of land with a precipitous front, called Champion's Hill. The upper side of this road and the crest of the hill was covered with thick timber. Below were open fields. The rebels had stationed themselves under cover of these woods. Their batteries commanded the road and swept the open fields.

Here General Grant came upon the foe, and immediately opened the drama of battle. General Grant was upon the field, and commanded in person. The battle commenced about nine o'clock in the morning. The rebels, massing their forces, hurled them upon the centre of the patriot line, which was under the command of General Hovey. For a time he held his heroic, well-trying troops firm under the tremendous onset. But the fire grew hotter and deadlier. From the concealment of the woods incessant volleys of bullets swept their ranks, and no available shot could be returned. A more terrible musketry fire was perhaps never experienced.

At length General Hovey was compelled to fall back. He did this, however, slowly and in perfect order, as he expected every moment reinforcements. Soon they arrived—General Quimby's division of M'Pherson's corps. Thus strengthened he massed his artillery, concentrated it upon the advancing foe, and brought them to a stand. Just at this moment came the word that General Logan had gained a position on the rebel left, and was threatening their rear. Then the order was given to charge. With a cheer the patriots rushed on, and the rebels were driven back, pell-mell, to their thickets. Onward streamed the victors. The foe, vanquished, bewildered, disheartened, fled from their covert, and disappeared over the brow of the hill. The patriots were soon in possession of Edwards's Station, but not until the retreating rebels had set fire to five car-loads of ammunition, which they had time to destroy but not to remove.

Thus ended the battle of Champion's Hill, or Edwards's Station. It was the most decisive of Grant's battles in his advance on Vicksburg. It really decided the campaign; for Generals Pemberton and Johnston could no longer hope to effect a junction. Over one thousand prisoners and two batteries fell into the Union hands. This great victory, however, was not purchased but at a corresponding price. Nearly one-third of General Hovey's division was placed hors du combat. The entire patriot loss was 429 killed, 1842 wounded, and 189 missing.

The next morning, the 17th, General M'Clermand, in hot pursuit of the foe, came upon them in force at the Big Black River. Here the fugitives had made another stand, determined to resist the passage. The position was admirable for the purpose for which it was chosen, and a bloody battle was anticipated. As the patriot troops approached the river over a plain, they found before them a bayou, about twenty feet wide and three feet deep, which with wide protecting sweep encircled a rebel battery of eighteen guns. Just beyond, on a bluff which fringed the farther bank of the river, were seen another array of batteries and of troops. The bayou broke out from the river above the hostile position, and, after the sweep of a mile, entered it below. Both the railroad and turnpike crossed the bayou and the river at this point, upon bridges, side by side. To reach the opposite shore it was necessary to march over the open plain, and cross both the bayou and the river in the face of the rebel batteries.

General M'Clermand immediately commenced an artillery attack upon the rebel position, to which there was a vigorous response. Almost at the first fire General Osterhaus was wounded so as to disable him. General A. L. Lee was assigned temporarily to his command. While this not very effectual conflict was taking place at the centre, General Lawler succeeded in approaching quite near the rebel works on the right unobserved. Here, casting off their blankets and their knapsacks, and fixing their bayonets, his men rushed from their concealment, passed the open field, and plunged into the stagnant waters of the bayou. A murderous fire of shot and shell was instantly turned upon them, reddening the water with their blood.

But the assault from that direction was so sudden and unlooked-for that the rebel fire was not given with such destructive aim as usual. The bayou was successfully crossed, and the surrender of the rebel works demanded at the point of the bayonet. A score of extemporized white flags rose along the line, and the works were yielded without further resistance. The two bridges spanning the river were destroyed by the rebels before the victorious patriots could cross. But fifteen hundred prisoners with eighteen cannon, beside quite a supply of ammunition and small-arms, fell into the hands of the victors. The Union loss was 373 killed, wounded, and missing.

In the mean time General Sherman had moved to a point above, and crossed the river on the 18th. Thence, turning to the right, he marched for the Yazoo River, so as to come in upon the rear of the rebel works, which five months before he had endeavored in vain to carry by assault in front. Admiral Porter had been already several days in the Yazoo, waiting to co-operate with him in opening a new line of communication with the patriot army.

The rebels now abandoned their position on the Big Black as no longer tenable. General M'Clermand bridged the stream and pressed on toward Vicksburg, turning to the south as he approached the city. On the morning of the 19th the doomed city was completely invested. The national lines extended from the Yazoo above to Warrenton on the Mississippi below. The rebel army were cooped up in their fortress without a possibility of escape.

The memorable events of the siege, which continued for about two months, we have not space to record. All the arts of offensive and defensive war were exhausted by the combatants. The rebels found themselves in a gripe which was daily tightening. Food became scarce. The soldiers were reduced to quarter rations. Ammunition failed. The patriot shot and shell began to explode in the heart of the city itself. The people lived in caves and cellars. Exploding mines opened immense gaps through the rebel ramparts. The 4th of July was now at hand. It was supposed that on that illustrious day the patriots would make their final assault. The weakened and disheartened garrison would be able to present but feeble resistance. On the 3d of July General Pemberton sent two officers with a flag of truce to arrange terms for the capitulation.

"This I do," he said, "though fully able to maintain my position for an indefinite period of time, in order to avoid the further effusion of blood."

General Grant replied: "Your note of this date, just received, proposes an armistice of several hours for the purpose of arranging terms of capitulation through commissioners to be appointed. The effusion of blood you propose stopping by this course can be ended at any time you may choose by an unconditional surrender of the city and garrison. Men who have shown so much endurance and courage as those now in Vicksburg will always challenge the respect of an adversary, and I can assure you will be treated with all the respect due them as prisoners of war. I do not favor the appointing commissioners to arrange terms of capitulation, because I have no other terms than those indicated above."

General Grant was then requested to hold a personal interview with General Pemberton. He consented. At 3 o'clock that afternoon, at a preconcerted signal, General Grant, accompanied by Generals M'Pherson and A. J. Smith, and General Pemberton, accompanied by General Bowen and Colonel Montgomery, stepped out simultaneously from their respective fortifications. They met in an open space between the two lines, under the shade of a gigantic oak. The respective armies, swarming like bees upon their ramparts, watched with intensest interest the interview which involved results so vast. General Pemberton was the first to speak.

"General Grant," said he, "I meet you in order to arrange terms for the capitulation of the city of Vicksburg and its garrison. What terms do you propose?"

"Unconditional surrender!" was the reply.

"Unconditional surrender!" repeated General Pemberton. "Never, so long as I have a man left me. I will fight rather."

"Then, Sir," rejoined General Grant, "you can continue the defense. My army has never been in a better condition for the prosecution of the siege."

The two generals, as by a mutually instinctive movement, separated themselves from their companions, and retiring a short distance by themselves, continued the interview. No definite result was reached. It was, however, agreed that General Grant should confer with his officers, and transmit in writing to General Pemberton the terms he would accept. Promptly the note was sent to General Pemberton. It demanded, as ever, the entire surrender of the place, the garrison, and the stores.

"On your accepting the terms proposed," the note stated, "I will march in one division as a guard, and take possession at 8 o'clock to-morrow morning. As soon as paroles can be made out, and signed by the officers and men, you will be allowed to march out of our lines, the officers taking with them their regimental clothing, and staff, field, and cavalry officers one horse each. The rank and file will be allowed all their clothing, but no other property."

Early the next morning, the glorious 4th of July, General Pemberton's reply was returned. He accepted the terms on condition that his troops should be permitted to march out with their colors and arms, stacking them outside of their works.

Thus, after a campaign really of six months duration, and of nearly two months vigorous siege, the rebel batteries of Vicksburg, which had insolently attempted to rob a nation of the most majestic river on the globe, fell, and the Mississippi was again thrown open for the unrestricted commerce of the United States from Cairo to the Gulf. During the progress of the campaign the rebels were defeated in five battles outside of Vicksburg. Jackson, the capital of the State, as well as Vicksburg, was captured. The enemy lost thirty-seven thousand prisoners, including fifteen general officers. At least ten thousand were killed and wounded, including Generals Tracy, Tilghman, and Green. Arms and munitions of war for an army of sixty thousand men, besides an immense amount of public property, consisting of railroads, locomotives, cars, steamboats, cotton, etc., fell into the hands of the victors. The total loss of General Grant's army during the campaign, in killed, wounded, and missing, is estimated at eight thousand five hundred and seventy-five. When we contemplate this achievement in all its aspects, it must be admitted that it stands prominent among the most heroic deeds of heroic men.

AFTER THE STORM.

ALONG the shore, along the shore,
 While hush'd is now the tempest's din,
 Except the sullen muffled roar
 Of breakers rolling slowly in,
 A woman tow'rd the sea-line dark
 Turns, as she walks, her tearful eyes:
 "I see no sail, no boat, no bark—Alas! alas!" she weeping cries.

Along the shore, along the shore,
 The Fisher's Wife still hurries on,
 And scans the tawny ocean o'er,
 Still heaving though the storm has gone.
 Last night the gale that fiercely blew
 Loud sough'd against the window-pane;
 She could not weep—ah! well she knew
 What bark was on the angry main.

Along the shore, along the shore,
 Where roll the waves with ceaseless din,
 The Fisher's Wife shall see no more
 The red-sail'd lugger coming in.

Alas! where far the dark sea-line
 The sky from ocean doth divide,
 The bark lies swallow'd by the brine
 A score of fathoms 'neath the tide!

Along the shore, along the shore,
 Though dark her grief, the mourner hears
 A voice that whispers, "Weep no more,
 For I will wipe away thy tears.
 Vain is the tempest's wrath, and vain
 The billows' rage with ruin fed:
 The lost one I will bring again—
 THE SEA SHALL RENDER UP THE DEAD!"

Along the shore, along the shore,
 That skirts the everlasting main,
 How oft we weep what never more
 The waves of Time bring back again!
 And while years rolling boom the dirge
 Of hopes long swallow'd by the brine,
 How oft a fruitless search we urge,
 And vainly scan the dark sea-line!

SCENES IN THE WAR OF 1812.

STATUE OF JACKSON, IN NEW ORLEANS.

XII.—DEFENSE OF NEW ORLEANS.*

IN a previous number of these sketches we have noticed the fact that the British Government made ample preparations, as they believed, for the subjugation of the Americans and the ending of the war, in 1814. The release of a large number of Wellington's veteran troops from service on the Continent had given that Government control of military strength that seemed to be quite sufficient to accomplish the desired result. The successful ravages on the American coasts during that year, and the capture of the National Capital, gave such assurance of full and final victory to British arms that, at the middle of December, Lord Castlereagh, the English Prime Minister, then in Paris, said, exultingly: "I expect, at this moment, that most of the large sea-port towns of America are by this time laid in ashes; that we are in possession of New Orleans, and have command of all the rivers of the Mississippi Valley and the Lakes, and that the Americans are now little better than prisoners in their own country."

Events already accomplished and preparations made justified the expectations of the British premier. A powerful land and naval force had been sent to the Gulf of Mexico for the purpose of seizing New Orleans, and penetrating the country northward by way of the Mississippi with such vigor as to co-operate powerfully with invading British forces from the Canadas. The Government calculated largely on the passive acquiescence, if not actual assistance, of the French and Spanish inhabitants of Louisiana, who had been opposed to the rule of the United States Government, and also upon the aid of the slaves, whose freedom was to be proclaimed when the British troops should obtain a sure foot-hold on the borders of the Mississippi River or the Gulf of Mexico.

At that time there was a community of outlaws engaged in privateering and smuggling, whose head-quarters were on a low island called Grand Terre, six miles in length and one and a half in breadth, which lies at the entrance to Barataria Bay from the Gulf of Mexico, little less than sixty miles southwest from New Orleans in a direct line. From that island there is a water communication for small vessels through lakes and bayous to within a mile of the Mississippi River, just above New Orleans. Toward the Gulf is a fine beach, and to it inhabitants of the "Crescent City" resort during the heats of the summer months. The Bay forms a sheltered harbor, in which the privateers of the Baratarians (as the smugglers were called) and those associated with them lay securely from the besom of the "Norther" that sweeps occasionally over the Gulf; and also from the cannon of ships of war, for the Bay is inaccessible to such ponderous and bulky craft. The community of marauders there formed a regularly organized association, at the head of which was Jean Lafitte, a shrewd Frenchman and blacksmith from Bordeaux, who had long wielded the forging hammer in St. Philip's Street, New Orleans. He had caused a battery of heavy guns to be pointed seaward for the protection of his company of Baratarians; and there might be seen at all times shrewd and cautious men from New Orleans, having "honorable mention" in that community, purchasing at cheap rates for profitable sales the rich booty of the sea robbers, and thereby laying broadly the foundations of the fortunes of many a wealthy family living in the Southwest when the great civil war broke out in 1861. Lafitte became known in history, romance, and song as the "Pirate of the Gulf."

He was not a corsair in the meaning of the law of nations, and his crimes, such as they were, were not against humanity, but were violations of the revenue and neutrality laws of the United States. "I may have evaded the payment of duties at the custom-house, but I have never ceased to be a good citizen," said Lafitte, on one occasion; and then, with the usual plea of a culprit, he added: "All the offenses I have ever committed have been forced upon me by certain vices in the laws."

The British authorities were acquainted with the Baratarians and the fact that the United States Government had, by legal proceedings, made them outlaws, and, as the English supposed, the bitter enemies of the Republic. Acting upon this belief the British sent an agent to engage them as allies in the invasion of Louisiana, because their knowledge of the peculiar country and their fleet of small craft used as transports might enable the invaders to place a heavy land-force in the rear of New Orleans, cut it off from its supplies and reinforcements, and make its capture an easy task. Accordingly, at the close of August, a single British brig, detached from a squadron in the West Indies, appeared off Barataria Bay, and on the morning of the 2d of September a signal-gun upon her deck announced her presence. Lafitte immediately left Grand Terre in a small boat rowed by four men, and started in the direction of the sound of the signal-gun to ascertain its meaning. He was met by a boat from the brig, bearing four English officers. These were conducted to the Baratarian rendezvous and elegantly entertained by the leader, when a package addressed to "Mr. Lafitte" was handed to him. It contained letters from British officials, and a proclamation to the inhabitants of Louisiana and Kentucky by the British commander in the Floridas, calling upon the former to "assist in liberating from a faithless, imbecile Government" their "paternal soil," and upon the latter to "range themselves under the standard of their forefathers, or observe a strict neutrality." They offered every inducement which a desire for wealth and honor might crave for Lafitte to join them in the contemplated invasion of Louisiana; and the chief bearer of the dispatches (Captain Lockyer, of the British navy) assured him that his vessels and men would be enlisted in the honorable service of the Royal Navy.

Lafitte had amassed a large fortune by his lawless pursuits, and perceived the danger that menaced his trade, his possessions, and his liberty. Already his brother, who had been his chief agent in New Orleans, was in prison for his offenses, and the authorities of the United States were preparing to strike a withering blow at Barataria. Lafitte, willing to save himself and his possessions, and preferring to be called a patriot rather than a pirate, asked the British messengers to allow him a few days for consideration. When they had departed he sent the important papers left with him to the Governor of Louisiana through the hands of a friend in the city, to whom he wrote a letter, saying, "Though proscribed in my adopted country, I will never miss an occasion of serving her, or of proving that she has never ceased to be dear to me."

The revelations made by Lafitte were not accepted as true by the Government officials; but the people believed them, and held a large meeting in consequence at the St. Louis Exchange, in New Orleans, on the 16th of September. They were eloquently addressed by the late Edward Livingston, then a leading citizen of Louisiana, who urged the inhabitants to make immediate preparations to repel the contemplated invasion. They appointed a Committee of Safety, composed of the most distinguished citizens of New Orleans, with Livingston as Chairman, who sent forth a stirring address to the people. Governor Claiborne, who, like Livingston, believed the statements of Lafitte, sent copies of the British papers to General Jackson, then at Mobile. The patriotic fire in the bosom of that hero glowed with tenfold intensity when this scheme of invasion was laid before him. He issued a stirring appeal to the inhabitants of Louisiana; and on the same day he addressed a proclamation to the free people of color in that State, inviting them to unite under the banner of their country for the purpose of contributing to its defense.

Jackson now set about the task of making the practical triple alliance of Britons, Spaniards, and Indians in Florida harmless before he should march for the defense of New Orleans. He invited volunteers from Tennessee, and two thousand soon rallied under his standard. On the 2d of November he turned his face toward Pensacola with three thousand men, and on the 6th he appeared before that town and demanded its instant surrender. It was refused, and the next day he fought his way into the place, cowed the Spanish authorities into meek submission, drove the British to their shipping in the harbor, and was about to take possession of Fort Barrancas, when it was blown up, the torch having been applied by a British hand. Two days afterward he abandoned Pensacola and returned to Mobile, where he found urgent messages in waiting, with pressing invitations to hasten to the defense of New Orleans. He had accomplished three important results, namely: the expulsion of the British from Pensacola; the scattering of the Indians through the forests, alarmed and dejected; and the punishment of the Spaniards for much perfidy.

Jackson departed for New Orleans on the 21st of November, and arrived there on the 2d of December, and made his head-quarters at what is now 86 (formerly 104) Royal Street.

JACKSON'S CITY QUARTERS.

He found the city utterly defenseless, and the councils of the people distracted by petty factions. The patriotic Governor Claiborne had called the Legislature of Louisiana together as early as the 5th of October. The members were divided into several factions, and there was neither union, nor harmony, nor confidence to be found. The people, alarmed and distrustful, complained of the Legislature; that body, in turn, complained of the Governor; and Claiborne complained of both the Legislature and the people. Money and credit were equally wanting, and arms and ammunition were very scarce. There was no effective naval force in the waters; and only two small militia regiments, and a weak battalion of uniformed volunteers, commanded by Major Plauché, a gallant Creole, constituted the military force of the city. The storehouses were filled with valuable merchandise, and it would be natural for the owners to prefer the surrender of the city at once to a seemingly invincible foe, to incurring the risk of the destruction of their property by a resistance that should invite a fiery bombardment. In every aspect the situation was most gloomy when Jackson arrived, worn down with sickness, fatigue, and anxiety. His advent was hailed with great joy by the citizens, for he was regarded as a host in himself; and the cry of "Jackson's come! Jackson's come!" went like an electric spark in eager words from lip to lip, giving hope to the desponding, courage to the timid, and confidence to the patriotic.

Jackson did not rest for a moment. He organized the feeble military force in the city, took measures for obstructing the large bayous whose waters formed convenient communications between the Mississippi near New Orleans and the Gulf of Mexico, and proceeded to inspect and strengthen the fortifications in the vicinity and to erect new ones. Fort St. Philip, below the city, was the object of his special care; for on that he mainly relied for preventing the passage of the river by the vessels of the invaders.

The expected enemy soon appeared. The army that captured Washington and was repulsed at Baltimore had left the Chesapeake toward the middle of October, three thousand strong, and sailed away for the West Indies in the fleets of Admirals Cochrane and Malcoln. These were soon joined by over four thousand troops under General Keane, a gallant young Irish officer, which had sailed from Plymouth in September. The combined forces were assembled in Negril Bay, Jamaica, and in over fifty vessels of all sizes more than seven thousand land troops were borne across the Gulf of Mexico, in the direction of New Orleans. They left Negril Bay on the 26th of November, and first saw the northern shore of the Gulf, off the Chandeleur Islands, between the mouth of the Mississippi and Lake Borgne, in the midst of a furious storm, on the 9th of December. Music, dancing, theatrical performances, and hilarity of every kind had been indulged in during the passage of the Gulf, for every man felt confident that an easy conquest of Louisiana awaited them. The wives of many officers accompanied them, and were filled with the most delightful anticipations of pleasure in the beautiful New World before them.

The British supposed the Americans to be profoundly ignorant of their expedition. They anchored the fleet in the deep channel between Ship and Cat Islands, near the entrance to Lake Borgne, and prepared small vessels for the transportation of troops over the shallow waters of that region with great expedition, hoping to surprise and capture New Orleans before their presence should be fairly suspected. They were disappointed. The revelations of Lafitte had made officers and people vigilant; and early in December Commodore Patterson, then commanding the naval station at New Orleans, was warned by a letter from Pensacola of the approach of a powerful British land and naval armament. That vigilant officer immediately sent out five gun-boats, a tender, and a dispatch-boat toward the passes of Mariana and Christiana, as scouts to watch for the enemy.

They were commanded by Lieutenant (late Commodore) Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, who sent two gun-boats, under the respective commands of Lieutenant M'Keever and Sailing-Master Ulrick, to Dauphin Island, at the entrance to Mobile Bay, to catch the first intelligence of the foe. They discovered the great fleet on the 10th of December, and hastened to report the fact to Commodore Jones. Patterson had ordered that officer to take such position as would enable him, in the event of the enemy making his way into Lake Borgne, to cut off his barges and prevent the landing of troops. If Jones should be hard pressed he was to fall back to the mud-fort of Petites Coquilles, near the mouth of the Rigolets, between Lakes Borgne and Pontchartrain, and shelter his vessels under its guns.

When, on the afternoon of the 10th, the fog that succeeded the storm had cleared away, and the British fleet were in full view, Jones made for the Pass Christiana with his little flotilla, where he anchored and awaited the approach of the invaders. He was discovered by the enemy on the 13th, much to their astonishment. It was evident that the Americans were acquainted with the intentions of the British, and had made preparations to meet them. Cochrane immediately gave orders for a change in the plan of operations. It would not do to attempt the landing of troops while American gun-boats were patrolling the waters of Lake Borgne. So he prepared a flotilla of almost sixty barges, the most of them carrying a carronade in the bow and an ample number of armed volunteers from the fleet, and sent them, in command of Captain Lockyer, to capture or destroy the American vessels. These were observed by Jones at four o'clock in the afternoon, when, in obedience of orders, he proceeded with his flotilla toward the Rigolets. A calm and adverse water currents would not allow him to pass the channel between Point Clear of the main and Malheureux Island, and there he anchored at two o'clock on the morning of the 14th. Jones's flag-ship was a little sloop of eighty tons, and the other vessels of his tiny squadron were commanded respectively by sailing-masters Ferris and Ulrick, and Lieutenants M'Keever and Speddon. The aggregate number of men was one hundred and eighty-two, and of guns twenty-three.

With a cool morning breeze the British barges, containing twelve hundred men, bore down upon Jones's flotilla, while the tender Alligator was in the distance, vainly endeavoring to join the Americans. The barges, with six oars on each side, formed a long parallel line, and in that order swept rapidly forward, while Jones reserved his fire until they were within close range. Then M'Keever hurled a thirty-two pound ball over the water, and a shower of grape-shot, which broke the British line and made great confusion. But the invaders pushed forward, and at half-past eleven o'clock the engagement became general and desperate. At one time Jones's boat was attacked by no less than fifteen barges. The Alligator was captured early, and by the force of overwhelming numbers the British, after a combat of almost an hour, gained a complete victory. It was at the cost of several of their barges, that were shattered and sunk, and about three hundred men killed and wounded. The Americans lost only six men killed and thirty-five wounded. Among the latter were Lieutenants Jones, M'Keever, Parker, and Speddon. The British commander (Lockyer) was severely wounded; so also was Lieutenant Pratt, who, under the direction of Cockburn, had fired the national buildings of Washington City a little more than a hundred days before.

The capture of the American gun-boats gave the British complete control of Lake Borgne; and the lighter transports, filled with troops, immediately entered it. Ship after ship got aground, until at length the troops were all placed in small boats and conveyed about thirty miles to the Isle des Pois (or Peas Island), at the mouth of the Pearl River, and that desert spot was made the place of general rendezvous. There they landed between the 16th and 20th of December, and there General Keane organized his army for future operations.

Cochrane had been informed by some former Spanish residents of New Orleans that at the northwestern extremity of Lake Borgne there was a bayou called Bienvenu, navigable for large barges to within a short distance of the Mississippi River, just below New Orleans. He sent a party to explore it. They followed this bayou, and a canal across Villeré's plantation, to a point half a mile from the Mississippi, and nine miles below New Orleans, and hastening back reported that the transportation of troops through that bayou was feasible. Vigorous measures were immediately adopted for an advance upon New Orleans, where, the British troops were assured, wealth and ease awaited them. They were encouraged by ex-officials of the old Spanish government of Louisiana, who went to the British camp from New Orleans, and represented Jackson as an ignorant tyrant, detested by the people, and void of any efficient means for defending the city.

Jackson was informed of the capture of the American gun-boats early on the 15th, when returning from a tour of observation in the direction of the River Chef-Menteur, northeastward of the city. He at once perceived the importance of securing the passage of the Chef-Menteur Road, that crosses the plain of Gentilly in that direction from the city to the strait between Lakes Borgne and Pontchartrain, and he ordered Major Lacoste, with his militia battalion of colored men, and the dragoons of Feliciana, to proceed at once with two pieces of artillery, take post at the confluence of Bayou Sauvage and the River Chef-Menteur, to guard the road, cast up a redoubt at its terminus, and watch and oppose the enemy. He also proceeded to fortify and strengthen every point of approach to the city; sent messengers to Generals Coffee, Carroll, and Thomas, urging them to hasten to

New Orleans with their commands as quickly as possible, and forwarded a dispatch to General Winchester, in command at Mobile, directing him to be on the alert. Then he appointed the 18th of December for a grand review of all the remaining troops in New Orleans, in front of the old Cathedral of St. Louis, in the Place d'Armes, one of the yet remaining relics of the Spanish dominion in Louisiana. It was a memorable day in New Orleans. The whole population were out to witness the spectacle. The impending danger was great, while the military force was small and weak. Strength and resolution were communicated to it by stirring sentences from the lips of Jackson, and a thrilling and eloquent appeal which was read by his aid-de-camp, Edward Livingston. The enthusiasm of the soldiers and citizens was intense; and Jackson, taking advantage of that state of public feeling, silenced the distracting voices of faction by declaring martial law and the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus.

When the review was over Major Plauché was sent with his battalion to the Bayou St. John, northward of the city; and at its mouth, on Lake Pontchartrain, Major Hughes was in command of Fort St. John; the Baratarians, on the urgent solicitation of their chief, Lafitte, were accepted as volunteers, mustered into the ranks, and drilled to the performance of important services, under the command of Captains Dominique, You, Bluche, Songis, Lagand, and Colson, at Forts Petites Coquilles, St. Philip, and St. John. The people cheerfully submitted to martial law, and in the languages of England, France, and Spain, the streets were made to resound with "Yankee Doodle," the "Marseillaise Hymn," and the "Chant du Depart." The women were as enthusiastic as the men; and at windows, on balconies, in the streets and public squares, they applauded the passing soldiers by waving of scarfs and handkerchiefs and uttering cheering words. Martial music was continually heard, and New Orleans appeared more like a military camp than a quiet mart of commerce. Business was mostly suspended, and the Legislature passed a law for prolonging the term of payment on all contracts until the 1st of the ensuing May. Military rule was complete. Able-bodied men of every age, color, and nationality, excepting British, were pressed into the service; suspicious persons were sent out of the city, and no one was allowed to pass the chain of sentinels around it without a proper official permission.

While these preparations for the reception of the invaders were in progress, the British were making unceasing efforts to press forward and take New Orleans by surprise. They had determined to make use of the Bayou Bienvenu and Villeré's Canal for the purpose; but with all their exertions, and after pressing the captured gun-boats into the service, they could not muster vessels enough fitted to navigate that bayou to carry more than one-third of the army. Keane felt so confident of success, even with a small part of his force, that he could not brook further delay; and on the morning of the 22d of December—a rainy, chilly, cheerless morning—a flotilla filled with troops set out; the advance, comprising eighteen hundred men, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Thornton, who had been wounded at Bladensburg. These were accompanied by General Keane and his staff, and other important officers, and followed by the remainder, and Admiral Cochrane in a schooner, at a proper distance, to watch and direct the squadron. All day and all night they were out upon the lake in open boats. A clear sky and biting frost came at sunset, and the wet clothing of the soldiers was stiffened into iciness by the cold night air. Their discomforts ended in a measure at dawn, when they reached the Fisherman's Village (inhabited by Spanish and Portuguese, who were spies and traitors), at the mouth of the Bayou Bienvenu. They were only twelve miles from New Orleans, and not a soul in that city suspected their approach.

Yet there were vigilant eyes, wide open, watching the invaders. At the head of the Bayou Bienvenu was the plantation of General Villeré, the commander of the first division of Louisiana militia. Jackson had instructed his son, Major Gabriel Villeré, to watch that bayou with a competent picket-guard.—He did so faithfully; but when the British landed at Fisherman's Village they captured the most of them.

FORT ST. JOHN IN 1860.

VILLERÉ'S MANSION.

It proved to be a fortunate circumstance; for these men so magnified the number of Jackson's troops, and the strength of the defenses around New Orleans, that they moved cautiously, and failed to surprise the vigilant hero in the city. They moved slowly up the bayou; but when they reached Villeré's Canal the active Thornton pushed forward with a detachment, surrounded the mansion of the plantation, which is in sight of the Mississippi, and succeeded in capturing Major Villeré. He soon escaped, fled to the house of his neighbor, the gallant Colonel de la Ronde, and in a boat they hastened across the Mississippi. There, at the stables of M. de la Croix, one of the Committee of Public Safety of New Orleans, they procured fleet horses, and with that gentleman rode swiftly up the levee on the right bank of the river, and crossed again at New Orleans to warn Jackson of the approach of the foe. Augustus Rousseau, an active young creole who had been sent by Captain Ducros, was already there. He had reached Jackson's head-quarters in Royal Street, with the startling intelligence, at about one o'clock, and a few minutes afterward Major Villeré and his party entered. "Gentlemen," said Jackson to the officers and citizens around him, "the British are below; we must fight them to-night." He then ordered three discharges of cannon to give the alarm, and sent marching orders to several of the military commanders.

Jackson's call upon Coffee, Carroll, and others had been quickly responded to. Coffee came speedily over the long and tedious route, from Fort Jackson on the Alabama River, to Baton Rouge, and was now encamped, with his brigade of mounted riflemen, on Avart's plantation, five miles above New Orleans. The active young Carroll, who had left Nashville in November with Tennessee militia, arrived in flat-boats and barges at about the same time, and brought into camp a regiment of young, brave, well-armed, but inexperienced soldiers, expert in the use of the rifle, and eager for battle. They landed on the 22d of December, and were hailed by Jackson with great joy. A troop of horse, under the dashing young Hinds, raised in Louisiana, came at about the same time.

When, in the afternoon of the 23d, Jackson issued his marching orders, Coffee's brigade was five miles above the city; Plauché's battalion was at Bayou St. John, two miles distant; the Louisiana militia and half of Lacoste's colored battalion were three miles off on the Gentilly Road, and the regulars (Forty-fourth) under Colonel Ross, with Colonel M'Rea's artillery, a little more than eight hundred strong, were at Fort St. Charles, on the site of the present United States Branch Mint in New Orleans, and in the city barracks. Within an hour after Jackson was informed that the invaders were on the direct road to the city along the river, and only nine miles distant, these troops were all in motion under special orders. Carroll and his Tennesseans were dispatched to the upper branch of the Bayou Bienvenu; further up the Gentilly Road Governor Claiborne was stationed, with the Louisiana militia; and Coffee's brigade, Plauché's, and D'Aquin's battalions, Hind's dragoons, the New Orleans rifles, under Captain Beale, and a few Choctaw Indians, commanded by Captain Jugeat, were ordered to rendezvous at Montreuil's plantation, and hasten to Canal Rodriguez, six miles below the city, and there prepare to advance upon the foe. Commodore Patterson was directed to proceed down the Mississippi to the flank of the British at Villeré's, with such armed vessels as might be in readiness. Such was the scanty force with which Jackson proceeded to fight a foe of unknown numbers and strength.

While Jackson was assembling his troops the invaders were making ready to march on New Orleans that night and take it by surprise. They sent forward a negro to distribute a proclamation, signed by General Keane and Admiral Cochrane, printed in French and Spanish, which read thus :

“Louisianians! remain quietly in your homes; your slaves shall be preserved to you, and your property respected. We make war only against Americans.”

The British were bivouacked on the highest part of Villeré's plantation, at the side of the levee, and on the plain; and in the court between Villeré's house (in which Keane and some of his officers made their head-quarters) and his sugar-works they had mounted several cannon. They were in fine spirits. Full one-half of the invading troops had been brought to the banks of the Mississippi, only nine miles from New Orleans, without firing a gun after capturing Jones's flotilla, and they believed their near approach to be wholly unknown, and even unsuspected, in the city. They were soon undeceived.

At seven o'clock in the evening the schooner Carolina, the only vessel in readiness at New Orleans, commanded by Captain Henley, dropped down the river, and anchored off Villeré's, within musket-shot distance of the centre of the British camp. At half past seven she opened a tremendous fire from her batteries, and in the course of ten minutes killed or wounded at least a hundred men. The British extinguished their camp-fires, and poured upon the Carolina a shower of bullets and Congress rockets, but with no serious effect. In less than half an hour the schooner drove the enemy from their camp, and produced great confusion among them. The American troops in the mean time, startled by the concerted signal of the Carolina's cannonade, were moving on, guided by Colonel De la Ronde, who was a volunteer with Beale's riflemen, and Major Villeré, who accompanied the Commander-in-chief. The right, under Jackson, was composed of the regulars, Plauché's, and D'Aquin's brigades, M'Rae's artillery, and some marines, and moved down the road along the levee; while the left, under Coffee, composed of his brigade, Hind's dragoons, and Beale's rifles, skirted the edge of a cypress swamp, for the purpose of endeavoring to cut off the communications of the invaders with Lake Borgne. Such was the simple plan of the battle, on the part of the Americans, on the night of the 23d of December, 1814.

The alarm and confusion in the British camp, caused by the attack of the Carolina, had scarcely been checked when they were startled by the crack of musketry in the direction of their outposts. Keane now gave full credence to the tales of his prisoners about the large number of troops—"more than twelve thousand"—in New Orleans, and gave the dashing Thornton full liberty to do as he liked. Thornton at once led a detachment, composed of the Eighty-fifth and Ninety-fifth regiments, to the support of the pickets, and directed the Fourth, five hundred strong, to take post on Villeré's Canal, near head-quarters, to keep open the communication with Lake Borgne. Thornton and his detachment were soon met by a resolute column under the immediate command of Jackson. He had made the Canal Rodriguez, which connected the Mississippi with the Cypress Swamp, his base of operations. He advanced with about fifteen hundred men and two pieces of artillery, perfectly covered with the gloom of night. Lieutenant M'Clelland, at the head of a company of the Seventh, filing through De la Ronde's gate, advanced to the boundary of Lacoste's plantation, where, under the direction of Colonel Piatt, the Quarter-Master-General, he encountered and attacked the British pickets, who were posted in a ditch behind a fence, and drove them back. These were speedily reinforced, and a brisk engagement ensued, in which Piatt received a wound, and M'Clelland and a sergeant were killed.

In the mean time the artillerists advanced up the Levee Road, with the marines, when the British made a desperate attempt to seize their guns. There was a fierce struggle. Jackson saw it, and hastening to the spot in the midst of a shower of bullets, he shouted, "Save the guns, my boys, at any sacrifice!" They did so, when the Seventh Regiment, commanded by Major Peire, advanced, and being joined by the Forty-fourth, the engagement became general between them and Thornton's detachment. Plauché and D'Aquin soon joined their comrades, and the tide of success turned in favor of the Americans. The British, hard pressed, fell sullenly back to their original line unmolested; for the prudent Ross, commanding the regulars, would not allow a pursuit. Had it been permitted it would, as we afterward discovered, been most disastrous to the invaders. This conflict occurred not far from La Ronde's garden.

General Coffee in the mean time had advanced to the back of La Ronde's plantation, where his riflemen were dismounted and their horses were placed in charge of a hundred men at the canal that separated La Ronde's from Lacoste's farm, the latter now the property of D. and E. Villeré. The ground was too much cut up with ditches to allow successful cavalry movements, and Major Hinds and his men remained at one of them near the middle of Lacoste's. Coffee's division extended its front as much as possible, and moved in silence, while Beale and his riflemen stole around the enemy's extreme left on Villeré's plantation, and, by a sudden movement, penetrated almost to the very heart of the British camp, killing several and making others prisoners. By a blunder, made in consequence of the darkness, a number of Beale's men were captured. In the mean time Thornton, with the Eighty-fifth, fell heavily on Coffee's line, and for some time a battle raged fiercely, not in regular order, but in detachments, squads, and often duels. In the darkness friends fought each other, supposing each to be a foe. The Tennesseans and British riflemen were almost equally expert as sharpshooters; but the short weapons of the English were not so efficient as the long ones of the American backwoodsmen. The Tennesseans also used long knives and tomahawks vigorously. At last the British fell back, and took shelter behind the levee, more willing to incur the danger of shots from the Carolina than bullets from the rifles of the Tennesseans.

During the engagement the Second division of the British arrived from Bayou Bienvenu, and were in the thickest of the fight with Coffee for a while; but the fear of being cut off from communication with the lake and their ships made the enemy too cautious and timid to achieve what their superior numbers qualified them to perform. They kept within the lines of their camp, and by concentration presented a strong front. Jackson perceived that in the darkness, intensified by a fog that had suddenly appeared, he could not follow up his victory with safety; so he led the right division back to the main entrance to La Ronde's plantation, while Coffee encamped near La Ronde's garden.

It was about half past nine when the conflict ceased, and at half past eleven, when all was becoming quiet in the respective camps, musketry was heard in the direction of Jumonville's plantation, below Villeré's. It was caused by the advance of some Louisiana drafted militia, stationed at a sharp bend of the Mississippi, called the English Turn, under General David Morgan, who had insisted upon being led against the enemy when they heard the guns of the Carolina early in the evening. They met some British pickets at Jumonville's, exchanged shots with them, encamped there for the night, and at dawn returned to their post at the English Turn.

The loss of the Americans in the affair on the night of the 23d of December was twenty-four killed, one hundred and fifteen wounded, and seventy-four prisoners, in all two hundred and thirteen. Among the killed was the brave Lieutenant-Colonel Lauderdale, of Coffee's brigade of mounted riflemen. The British loss was about four hundred men. According to the most careful estimates the number of Americans engaged in the battle was about eighteen hundred, while those of the invaders, including the reinforcements that came during the engagement, was about twenty-five hundred. The Carolina gave the Americans a great advantage, and made the effective power about equal to that of the foe.

Jackson's prompt advance to meet the invaders saved New Orleans from capture, and Louisiana and the Mississippi Valley from conquest. The whole country blessed him for the act. But his full task was not accomplished, and he knew it. A host of veteran soldiers, fresh from the battlefields of Continental Europe, were before him, and they were not likely to relinquish the footing they had gained on American soil without a desperate struggle. So he prepared for it. Leaving the regulars and some dragoons at La Ronde's to watch the enemy, he fell back with the remainder of his army to Rodriguez's Canal and set his soldiers at work casting up an intrenchment along its line from the river to the cypress swamp. All day they plied the implements of labor with the greatest vigor, and at sunset a breast-work three feet in height appeared along the entire line of Jackson's army, and the soldiers spent that Christmas-eve in much hilarity, for the events of the previous evening had given them the confidence of veterans. In the mean time Latour, the Chief Engineer, had cut the levee in front of Chalmette's plantation, so as to flood the plain between the two armies, and the two 6-pounders were placed in battery at the levee, so as to command the road. The river was so low that the overflow was of little account. Behind those intrenchments, of which each worker was proud, Jackson's little army spent the Christmas-day of 1814 in preparations for a determined defense of New Orleans and their common country. On the same day General Morgan received orders to evacuate the post at English Turn, place his cannon and a hundred men in Fort St. Leon, and take position with the remainder on Flood's plantation, opposite Jackson's camp, on the right bank of the Mississippi. The cutting of the levee at Chalmette's and Jumonville's helped the enemy more than it did the Americans, for it caused the almost dry canals and bayous to be filled with sufficient water to allow the British to bring up their heavy artillery. Had the Mississippi been full the invaders would have been placed on an island.

That Christmas-day dawned gloomily for the invaders. The events of the 23d had greatly depressed their spirits, and the soldiers had lost confidence in Keane, their commander. The sky was clouded, the ground was wet, and the atmosphere was chilly; and shadowing disappointment was seen in every face. The gloom was suddenly dispelled by an event which gave great joy to the whole army. It was the arrival at camp, on that gloomy morning, of Lieutenant-General Sir Edward Packenham, the "hero of Salamanca," then only thirty-eight years of age, who came to assume the chief command of the invading army. He was a true soldier and an honorable man; and the charge (which might be justly brought against some of the subordinate commanders in that army) that he offered his soldiers, as a reward for their services in the event of their capturing New Orleans, the "Beauty and Booty" of the city, is doubtless wholly untrue, for his character was the very opposite of the infamous Cockburn. He came fresh from Europe, with the prestige of eminent success as a commander, and his advent at Villeré's was hailed with delight by officers and soldiers. He, too, was delighted when he perused the list of the regiments which he was to command, for all of the troops, excepting the Ninety-third and the colored regiments, had fought all through the war on the Spanish Peninsula.

While Jackson was intrenching the British were not idle. They were employed day and night in preparing a heavy battery that should command the Carolina. It was completed on the morning of the 27th, and at seven o'clock a heavy fire was opened from it upon the little sloop, from several 12 and 18 pounders and a howitzer. They hurled hot shot, which fired the Carolina, when her crew abandoned her and she blew up with a tremendous explosion. The sloop of war Louisiana, commanded by Lieutenant Thompson, had come down to aid her, and was in great peril. She was the only armed vessel in the river remaining to the Americans. By great exertions she was towed beyond the sphere of danger, and was saved to play a gallant part in events the following day. She was on the opposite side of the river, anchored nearly abreast of the American camp.

The destruction of the Carolina gave fresh confidence to the invaders, and Packenham issued orders for his whole army, then eight thousand strong, to move forward and carry the American intrenchments by storm. He had arranged that army into two columns. One was commanded by General Keane, the other by General Gibbs, a good and experienced officer who accompanied Packenham as his second in the command. Towards evening the entire force moved forward, driving in the American pickets and outposts; and about twilight they halted on the plantations of Bienville and Chalmette, within a few hundred yards of the American line, and there a part of them sought rest, while the others commenced the construction of batteries near the river. Repose was denied them, for all night long Hind's troopers, and other active Americans, annoyed their flanks and rear with quick, sharp attacks, which the British denounced as "barbarian warfare."

Jackson, in the mean time, had been preparing to receive them. He was aware of the arrival of Packenham, and expected vigorous warfare from him. His head-quarters were at the spacious chateau of M. Macarté, a wealthy Creole; and from its wide gallery and a dormer-window, seen in the accompanying picture, aided by a telescope, he had a full view of the whole field of operations. From that chateau, yet standing, he sent forth his orders. They were many and prompt: for that night of the 27th of December, when a flushed foe in his immediate front was ready to pounce with tiger-like fierceness upon him at dawn, was an exceedingly busy one for the Commander-in-chief. He had caused Chalmette's buildings to be blown up when the enemy advanced that the sweep of his artillery might not be obstructed; and he had called to the line some Louisiana militia from the rear. He also planted heavy guns; and by the time that the couchant foe was ready for his murderous leap he had four thousand men and twenty pieces of artillery to oppose him, while the Louisiana was in position to use her cannon with signal effect in co-operation with the great guns on land.

The 28th dawned brightly, and as soon as the light fog of early morning had passed away a battle began. The enemy approached in two columns. Gibbs led the right, which kept near the great swamp, throwing out a skirmish line to meet those of the left column, commanded by Keane, who kept close to the river with artillery in his front. There was also a party of skirmishers and light infantry detailed from Gibbs's command, under Colonel Robert Rennie, a very active officer, who was ordered to turn the American left flank and gain the rear of their camp. Packenham and his staff rode nearly in the centre of the line. At this moment Jackson saw with great satisfaction a band of rough-looking armed men coming down the road from the direction of the city. They were Baratarians under You and Bluche, who had run all the way from Fort St. John. They were immediately placed in charge of one of the 24-pounders, and performed excellent service. They were followed by the escaped crew of the Carolina under Lieutenants Norris and Crawley, who were placed in the line as managers of a howitzer on the right.

The British, under Keane, advanced in solid column in the face of a galling fire of musketry, when they were suddenly checked by the opening of some of Jackson's heavy guns and the batteries of the Louisiana, which swept their line obliquely with terrible effect. More than eight hundred shot were hurled from her guns with deadly power. One of them killed and wounded fifteen men. At the same time the British rocketeers were busy, but their missiles did very little damage, and the Americans soon became too familiar with their harmless noise to be much affected by them.

For a short time Keane's men stood the terrible storm that was thinning their ranks, when the maintenance of their position became mere fool-hardiness, and they were ordered to seek shelter in the little canals. Away they ran, pell-mell, to these places of refuge, and in mud and water almost waist deep they "leaned forward," as one of their companions wrote, "concealing themselves in the rushes which grew on the banks of the canal." It was a humiliating position for "Wellington's veterans," in the face of a few rough backwoodsmen, as they regarded Jackson's troops. Their batteries were half destroyed and were abandoned, and the shattered column, thoroughly repulsed, fell back to a shelter behind the ruins of Chalmette's buildings and the perfect ones of Bienvenu.

Gibbs in the mean time was actively engaged on the British right. The gallant Rennie dashed into the edge of the swamp to flank the American left, and driving in the pickets approached within a hundred yards of the line behind which lay Carroll and his Tennesseans. The movement was observed by Carroll, who sent Colonel Henderson, with two hundred Tennesseans, to gain Rennie's rear and cut him off from the main body. Advancing too far Henderson encountered a large British force, and he and five of his men were killed and several were wounded. The remainder retraced their steps. Rennie was then pressing Carroll's left very severely, when Gibbs, observing the fierceness of the fight on the part of Keane's column, ordered the dashing Colonel to fall back on the main line. Rennie reluctantly obeyed, and was compelled to be an idle spectator of Keane's disaster. At length Packenham ordered a general retrograde movement, and he retired to his head-quarters at Villere's, deeply mortified by the failure of his plans, of whose success he had not allowed himself to doubt. In this repulse the Louisiana, which was stationed near the right bank of the Mississippi, played the most efficient part and lost but one man killed. The loss of the Americans was nine killed and eight wounded. The British loss was about one hundred and fifty.

Packenham called a council of war, when it was resolved to bring forward heavy siege guns from the navy before making another serious attempt to carry Jackson's lines. They established their hospital on Jumonville's plantation, next below Villere's, and prepared for heavy work. The experience of the 28th had given Packenham a test of the spirit of his opposers, and he was convinced that the task before him was not only difficult but dangerous, and that the very salvation of his army depended upon cautious movements, courage, and perseverance.

Jackson was busy, at the same time, strengthening his position at Rodriguez's canal, over which not a single British soldier had passed excepting as a prisoner. He placed two 12-pounders on his extreme left, near the swamp, in charge of General Garrigue Fleauzac, a veteran French soldier who had volunteered, and also a 6 and 18 pounder under Colonel Perry. His line of intrenchments was extended into the swamp, so as to prevent a flank movement. He ordered a line of intrenchments to be established on the opposite side of the Mississippi; and Commodore Patterson, pleased with the effects of the guns of the Louisiana from the same side, established a battery behind the Levee, on Jourdan's plantation, which he armed with heavy guns from the schooner, and manned with sailors enlisted or pressed into the service in New Orleans. It commanded the front of Jackson's lines, and soon compelled the British to abandon Chalmette's plantation and fall back to the line between Bienvenu's and De la Ronde's. A brick-kiln on the bank opposite New Orleans was converted into a square battery, which was armed with two heavy guns that commanded the city and the river road, and placed in charge of Captain Henley of the Carolina. At Jackson's head-quarters at Macarté's was a company of young men from the best families in the city, under Captain Ogden, who constituted his body-guard, and were subservient to his immediate orders alone. These were posted in Macarté's garden. There was incessant activity every where among all his troops, for his own spirit was infused into them. The Tennessee riflemen, in particular, delighted in going on "hunts," as they called them—that is to say, expeditions, alone, to pick off sentinels and annoy the enemy. This was carried on to such extent on Jackson's extreme left that the British dared not post sentinels very near the swamp. They contented themselves with throwing up a strong redoubt in that direction, which Captains You and Crawley continually battered with heavy shot from their cannon. The enemy persevered, and at the close of the month had several great guns mounted on the redoubt.

On the 31st the guns of the new redoubt opened vigorously on Jackson's left, and that night the whole British army moved rapidly forward, took position within a few hundred yards of the American lines, and in the gloom commenced vigorous work with pickaxe and spade. They had brought up heavy siege guns from the lake, and all night long that army labored in the construction of redoubts for them, under the superintendence of Colonel Sir John Burgoyne, with the intention of making an immediate effort to break the American line. Before dawn they had completed three solid demi-lunes, or half-moon batteries, right, centre, and left, six hundred yards from the American lines, at nearly equal distances apart. They were constructed of earth, hogsheads of sugar from the neighboring plantations, and every thing that might resist, and upon them were placed thirty pieces of heavy ordnance, manned by picked gunners of the fleet, who had served under Nelson and Collingwood and St. Vincent. Their works were hidden by a heavy fog in the morning of the 1st of January, which hung thickly over the belligerent armies until after eight o'clock. When it was lifted by a gentle breeze the British opened a brisk fire, not doubting that in a few minutes the contemptible intrenchments of the Americans would be scattered to the winds, and that the army, placed in battle order for the purpose, would find it an easy matter to rush forward and take them. Every moment their cannonade and bombardment became heavier, and the rocketeers sent an incessant shower of their fiery missiles into the American lines. Jackson's head-quarters at Macarté's was a special target. In the course of ten minutes more than a hundred balls, shells, and rockets struck the building, and compelled the commander-in-chief and his staff to evacuate it. The marks of that furious assault may be seen in all parts of the house to this day.

Jackson in the mean time had opened his heavy guns on the assailants. The cannonade was led off by the gallant and imperturbable Humphrey on the left, followed by the fierce You and his Baratarians—Crawley, Norris, Spotts, and the veteran Garrigue. The American artillery thundered along their whole line, to the amazement of the British, who wondered how and where they got their guns and gunners. Packenham soon saw that he had underrated the strength and skill of his adversary; and Cochrane, whose gallant tars were at the guns, did every thing in his power to encourage them. The conflict became terrible. Batteries on the Levee fought with Patterson on the opposite side; and in them were kept in readiness red-hot shot for the destruction of the Louisiana, if she should come within range of the guns. Packenham also sent a detachment of infantry to attempt the turning of the American left, in the swamp; but they were driven back in terror by Coffee's Tennesseans, and only the battle of the batteries went on.

Toward noon the fire of the British visibly slackened, while that of the Americans was unceasing. The demi-lunes of the foe were crushed and broken. The sugar hogsheads had been converted into splinters, and their contents, mingling with the moist earth, soon lost their volume. The guns not dismounted were careened, and were worked with great difficulty; and by the time their voices ceased altogether the batteries on the Levee were nearly demolished. The invaders abandoned their works at meridian, and fled in inglorious haste, helter-skelter, to the ditches in search of safety; and under cover of the ensuing night they crawled sullenly back to their camp, dragging with them over the spongy ground a part of their heavy cannon, and leaving five of them a spoil for the Americans. Their disappointment and chagrin were intense, and were equally shared by officers and men. Their New-Year's Day was a far gloomier one than that of Christmas. They had been without food or sleep for nearly sixty hours. They all cast themselves down on the damp ground, too wearied for thought, and their troubles were soon ended for the time by deep slumber. Packenham was in his old quarters at Villere's, which he had left in the morning with the confident expectation of sleeping in New Orleans that night as a conqueror.

There was joy in the American camp that night. It was intensified in the morning by the arrival of Brigadier-General John Adair with intelligence of the near approach of more than two thousand drafted militia from Kentucky, under Major-General John Thomas. They arrived in the city on the 4th of January, and seven hundred of them were sent to the front under Adair. Their forlorn condition as a body was such that Jackson was at a loss to determine whether their presence should be considered fortunate or unfortunate for the cause. They had come with the erroneous belief that an ample supply of arms and clothing would be furnished them in New Orleans, and a large number of them were sadly deficient in these. Of the seven hundred sent to the front only five hundred had weapons of any kind. The commiseration of the citizens was excited, and by an appropriation by the Legislature and the liberal gifts of the citizens the sum of sixteen thousand dollars was speedily raised, with which goods were purchased and placed in the willing hands of the women of New Orleans. Within a week these were converted by them into blankets, garments, and bedding. The men constituted capital raw material for soldiers, and they were very soon prepared for efficient service.

Packenham was disheartened, but by no means despaired of success. He conceived the bold and hazardous plan of carrying Jackson's lines on both sides of the river by storm. Those on the right bank had been strengthened, but were feebly manned, and were under the chief command of General Morgan. Packenham resolved to send over fifteen hundred infantry, with some artillery, and, under the cover of night, attack Morgan, carry the works, occupy them, and from batteries there enfilade Jackson's line, while the main army should be engaged in storming it. The transportation of these men to the other side of the river was confided to Admiral Cochrane, who, in opposition to the opinions and wishes of the army officers, set the wearied soldiers and sailors at work widening and deepening and prolonging to the Mississippi Villere's Canal, for the purpose of bringing over boats from the Bayou Bienvenu, instead of dragging them on rollers as they had heavier cannon. The labor was completed on the 7th, when the army was in fine spirits because of the arrival, the day before, of a considerable body of reinforcements under Major-General John Lambert, a young officer of Wellington's army, who had sailed from England toward the close of October. Packenham's own regiment (Seventh Fusileers) was among them, and the army that confronted Jackson now consisted of ten thousand of the finest soldiers in the world. These were divided into three brigades, and placed under the respective commands of Generals Lambert, Gibbs, and Keane.

Packenham's plan of operations for the new attack was simple. Colonel Thornton was to cross the Mississippi on the night of the 7th, with the Eighty-fifth and one West India regiment, marines and sailors, and a corps of rocketeers, and fall upon the Americans before the dawn. The sound of his guns was to be the signal for General Gibbs, with the Forty-fourth, Twenty-first, and Fourth regiments, to storm the American left; while General Keane, with the Ninety-third, Ninety-fifth, and two light companies of the Seventh and Forty-third, with some West India troops, should threaten the American right sufficient to draw their fire, and then rush upon them with the bayonet. Meanwhile the two British batteries near the Levee, which the Americans destroyed on the 1st, were to be rebuilt, well mounted, and employed in assailing the American right during Keane's operations. Keane's advance corps were furnished with fascines to fill the ditches, and scaling-ladders to mount the embankments. Such was the substance of Pakenham's General Order issued on the 7th of January, 1815.

Jackson penetrated Pakenham's design on the 6th, and prepared to meet and frustrate it. His line of defense, extending, as we have observed, from the Mississippi to an impassable cypress swamp, a mile and a half in length, along the line of the half-choked Rodriguez's Canal, was very irregular. In some places it was thin, in others thick; in some places the banks were high, in others very low. They had been cast up not by the soldiery alone, nor by the slaves, but by the hands of civilians from the city, including merchants and their clerks, lawyers and physicians and their students, and many young men who never before had turned a spadeful of earth. Along this line artillery was judiciously placed. On the edge of the river a redoubt was thrown up and mounted with cannon, so as to enfilade the ditch in front of the American lines. Besides this there were eight batteries placed at proper distances from each other, composed of thirteen guns carrying from 6 to 32 pound balls, a howitzer, and a carronade. Across the river was Patterson's marine battery for auxiliary service in the defense of this line, mounting nine guns; and the Louisiana was prepared to perform a part, if possible, in the drama about to open.

Jackson's infantry were disposed as follows: Lieutenant Ross, with a company of Peire's Seventh Regiment, guarded the redoubt on the extreme right, in which tents were pitched. Between Humphrey's battery and the river, on the right, Beale's New Orleans riflemen were stationed. From their left the Seventh Regiment extended so as to cover another battery, and connected with a part of Plauché's battalion, and the colored corps under Colonel La Coste, which filled the interval between batteries No. 3 and 4 (see Map), the guns of the latter being covered by D'Aquin's free men of color. Next to D'Aquin was the Forty-fourth Regiment, which extended to the rear of battery No. 5. The remainder of the line (full two-thirds of its entire length) was covered by the commands of Carroll and Coffee. The former had been reinforced that day (7th) by a thousand Kentuckians under General Adair, and with him, on the right of battery No. 7, were fifty marines under Lieutenant Bellevue. Coffee, with five hundred men, held the extreme left of the line on the edge of the swamp, where his men were compelled to stand in the water, and to sleep on floating logs which they lashed to the trees. Captain Ogden, with cavalry (Jackson's body-guard), was at head-quarters, yet at Macarté's chateau; and on De Leroy's plantation, in the rear of it, Hinds was stationed with one hundred and fifty mounted men. Near Pierna's Canal a regiment of Louisiana militia, under Colonel Young, were encamped as reserves.

Jackson's whole force on the New Orleans side of the river, on the 7th, was about five thousand in number, and of these only three thousand two hundred were at his line. Only eight hundred of the latter were regulars, and most of them were new recruits commanded by young officers. His army was formed in two divisions, the right commanded by Colonel Ross, acting as Brigadier, and the left by Generals Carroll and Coffee, the former as Major-General and the latter as Brigadier-General. A mile and a half in the rear of his main line another intrenchment had been thrown up, behind which the weaker members of his army were stationed with pickaxes and spades. This line was prepared for a rallying point in the event of disaster following the impending conflict. Jackson also established a third line at the lower edge of the city. General Morgan, on the opposite side of the river, prepared to defend his lines with only eight hundred men, all militia and indifferently armed. On his left were two 6-pounders in charge of Adjutant Nixon of the Louisiana militia, and a 12-pounder under Lieutenant Philibert of the navy. Patterson's battery in Morgan's rear could render him no service, for its guns were turned so as to command the plain of Chalmette in front of Jackson's line.

Such was the strength and position of the two armies on the night of the memorable 7th of January, 1815, preparatory to the great conflict on the following day.

It was not until the afternoon of the 7th that Jackson could determine, with any certainty, whether the enemy would first attack his own or Morgan's line. Then from the gallery of head-quarters, with his telescope, he could see such preparations by the foe as convinced him that his own lines would first feel the shock of battle; and when the darkness of night fell he could distinctly hear the sounds of labor in reconstructing the British batteries which the Americans had destroyed. His pickets and sentinels were strengthened, and sleepless vigilance marked a large portion of the troops behind his intrenchments that night. The chief lay down to rest on a sofa after a day of great fatigue, surrounded by his aids, and was slumbering sweetly when, at little past midnight, he was awakened by the entrance of an aid of Commodore Patterson (Mr. R. D. Shepherd), who had been sent to inform the General that there seemed to be positive indications in the British camp that Morgan was to be first attacked, and that he needed more troops to maintain his position. "Hurry back," said Jackson, "and tell General Morgan that he is mistaken. The main attack will be on this side. He must maintain his position at all hazards." Then looking at his watch he spoke aloud to his aids,

"Gentlemen, we have slept long enough. Arise! for the enemy will be upon us in a few minutes. I must go and see General Coffee." One of his first orders was for General Adair to send over five hundred Kentuckians to reinforce Morgan.

Let us observe the movements in the British camp on that memorable night.

According to the plan already mentioned Colonel Thornton proceeded to cross the Mississippi for the purpose of attacking Morgan. He marched to the Levee, at the end of the newly-cut canal in extension of Villere's, and there waited with the greatest impatience the arrival of the boats that were to carry him and his troops over. The banks of the ditch had caved in in some places, and the falling of the water in the river had made that of the canal so shallow that the sailors were compelled to drag the boats through thick mud in many places. It was three o'clock in the morning before even a sufficient number of vessels to convey one-half of the detachment had arrived. Further delay would be fatal to the enterprise, so, with Pakenham's sanction, Thornton dismissed half of his force, embarked the remainder, and crossed the river in a flotilla commanded by Captain Roberts of the Royal Navy. Ignorant of the fact that the Mississippi was flowing with a quiet, powerful current, at the rate of five miles an hour, and making no provisions for this obstacle to a quick and direct passage, they were landed, after great fatigue, at least a mile and a half below their intended point of debarkation. Before they had all left the boats the day dawned, and the roar of cannon was heard on the plain of Chalmette.

Pakenham and his officers had passed an almost sleepless night, and at the time when Jackson aroused his slumbering staff the divisions of Gibbs and Keane were called up, formed into line, and advanced to within four hundred and fifty yards of the American intrenchments. Lambert's division was left behind as a reserve. There stood the British soldiers in the darkness and the chilly morning air, enveloped in a thick fog, and anxiously listening for the booming of Thornton's guns in his attack on Morgan. He was yet battling with the current of the Mississippi. Tediously the minutes and the hours passed, and yet that signal-gun remained silent.

Day dawned and the mist began to disperse, and as the dull red line of the British host was dimly seen in the early morning light through the veil of moisture, Lieutenant Spotts, of battery No. 7, opened one of his heavy guns upon it. It was the signal for battle. As the fog rolled away the British line was seen stretching two-thirds across the plain of Chalmette. From its extreme left and right rockets shot high in air, and like a dissolving view that red line almost disappeared as it was broken into columns by companies.

Gibbs now advanced obliquely toward the wooded swamp, with the Forty-fourth in front, followed by the Twenty-first and Fourth, terribly pelted by the storm that came from batteries Nos. 6, 7, and 8, and vainly sought shelter behind a bulging projection of the swamp into the plain. These batteries poured round and grape shot incessantly into Gibbs's line, making lanes through them, and producing some confusion. This was heightened by the fact that the Forty-fourth, with whom had been intrusted fascines and scaling-ladders, had advanced without them. To wait for these to be brought up was impossible in the focus of that cannonade. So Gibbs ordered them forward, the Twenty-first and Fourth, in solid and compact column, covered in front by blazing rockets, and cheered by their own loud huzzas. Whole platoons were prostrated, when their places were instantly filled by others; and the column pressed on without pause or recoil toward the batteries on the left and the long and weaker line, covered by the Tennesseans and Kentuckians.

By this time all the American batteries, including Patterson's on the right bank of the river, were in full play. Yet steadily on marched Wellington's veterans, stepping firmly over the dead bodies of their slain comrades until they had reached a point within two hundred yards of the American line, behind which, concealed from the view of the invaders, lay the Tennesseans and Kentuckians four columns deep. Suddenly the clear voice of General Carroll rang out Fire! on the morning air. His Tennesseans arose from cover, and each man taking sure aim delivered a most destructive volley on the foe, their bullets cutting down scores of the gallant British soldiery. The storm ceased not for a moment; for when the Tennesseans had fired they fell back and the Kentuckians took their places, and so the four columns, one after another, participated in the conflict. At the same time round, grape, and chain shot went crashing through the ranks of the British, making awful gaps, and appalling the stoutest hearts. The line began to waver, and would have broken but for the cool courage and untiring energy of their officers, and the inspiring cry, "Here comes the Forty-fourth with the fascines and ladders!"

A detachment of the Forty-fourth had indeed come with scaling implements and Packenham at their head, who encouraged them by stirring words and bold deeds for a few minutes, when his bridle-arm was made powerless by a bullet, and his horse was shot under him. He at once mounted the black Creole pony of his favorite aid, the now venerable Sir Duncan Macdougall of London. Other officers fell until there were not enough to command, and the column began to break up into detachments, a greater part of them falling back to the shelter of the projecting swamp. There they were rallied, and throwing away their knapsacks, they rushed forward to scale and carry the works in front of Carroll and his sharp-shooters. At the same time Keane, contrary to instructions but with zealous concern for the cause, wheeled his column into line and led a portion of them to the assistance of the right wing. They were terribly scourged by the enfilading fire of the American batteries as they strode across the plain. Among them was the Ninety-third Regiment, composed of nine hundred sinewy Highlanders, who had won victories on many a field in Continental Europe, and were unmoved by the storm that poured in such fury upon them. Their presence and example encouraged the broken column of the right, who, with these Highlanders, rushed into the very heart of the tempest from Carroll's rifles, having Gibbs on their right, and Packenham on their left. In a few minutes the right arm of the latter was disabled by a bullet, and as he was riding to the rear on the led pony, shouting huzzas to the troops, there came a terrible crashing through the ranks of round and grape shot that scattered dead men all around him. One of the balls passed through the General's thigh, killed his horse, and brought both to the ground. Packenham was caught in the arms of his faithful aid, Captain M'Dougall, who had performed a similar service for General Ross when he fell, mortally wounded, near Baltimore a few months before. The commander was conveyed to the rear in a dying condition, and placed under a venerable live-oak tree, which disappeared only a few years ago. There he soon expired in the arms of M'Dougall.

General Gibbs was also mortally wounded, and died the next day; and Keane was so severely shot through the neck that he was compelled to leave the field. The command was then assumed by Major Wilkinson, the officer of highest grade left in the saddle. Under his leadership the broken battalions endeavored to scale the breast-works. They were repulsed, and Wilkinson fell on the parapet mortally wounded. His discomfited men fell back, and all of the assailants withdrew in wild confusion. Of the gallant nine hundred Highlanders, with twenty-five officers, of the Ninety-third Regiment who went into the fight, only one hundred and thirty men and nine officers could be mustered at its close. The Twenty-first Regiment lost five hundred men, and every company came out of the terrible conflict a mere skeleton in numbers.

PLAIN OF CHALMETTE.—BATTLE-GROUND, JANUARY 8, 1815.

on the British right a more successful movement, for a time, was made by them on their left. Keane's whole division moved when he led the Highlanders to the right. Nearly a thousand men, under the active Colonel Rennie, composed of the Ninety-fifth Rifles, companies of the Seventh, Ninety-third, and Forty-third Infantry, and some West India troops, had pushed rapidly forward near the river in two columns, one on the road, and the other nearer the water under shelter of the Levee, and driving in the American pickets, succeeded in taking possession of the unfinished redoubt on Jackson's extreme right. They drove out the Americans, but they did not hold it long. The invaders on the road were terribly smitten by Humphrey's batteries and the Seventh Regiment, and were kept in check. At the same time Rennie led the column along the water's edge, where they were terribly annoyed by Patterson's battery, and with several other officers scaled the parapet of the American redoubt. The New Orleans rifles, under Beale, now poured upon these officers and the inmates of the redoubt such a terrible fire that nearly every man was killed or mortally wounded. Rennie had just exclaimed, "Hurrah, boys, the day is ours!" when he fell to rise no more.

This attacking column also fell back in great disorder under cover of the Levee, and, like those on the British right, sought shelter from the terrible storm that came from Jackson's lines in the plantation ditches. General Lambert, with his reserves, had come forward on hearing of the disasters to Packenham, Gibbs, and Keane; but he was in time only to cover the retreat of the battered and flying columns, and not to retrieve the fortunes of the day. The fire of the musketry had ceased by half after eight in the morning, but the artillery kept up their fire until about two o'clock in the afternoon. It is worthy of note that, from the flight of the first signal rocket of the British to the close of the contest, the New Orleans band, stationed near the centre of the line where the American standard was kept flying during the struggle, played incessantly, cheering the troops with national and military airs. The British, on the contrary, had no other musical instrument than a bugle, and as their columns advanced, no drum was heard in their lines, nor even the stirring tones of the trumpet. From their first landing at the Fisherman's Village the experience of that army had been almost unbroken dreariness.

Let us now turn our attention to the movements on the right bank of the Mississippi.

We left Colonel Thornton and his men just debarked after battling with the current of the Mississippi for some time. Morgan had sent forward his advance of less than three hundred men (one-third of whom were Arnaud's Louisiana militia) under Major Tessier, and the remainder fatigued and poorly-armed Kentuckians under Colonel Davis, chosen from those sent over on the 7th by General Adair. They were directed to take position on Mahew's Canal, near which it was supposed the British would land. The line which this small force was expected to hold extended from the river to the swamp, a distance of a mile, and required at least a thousand men and several pieces of artillery to give it respectable strength. Davis's raw troops were placed on the left, resting on the Levee, and Tessier's were on his right, extending to the swamp, and both watched vigilantly for signs of the coming of the invaders. Their vigilance was vain, for Thornton landed a mile below them under cover of three gun-boats, each armed with a carronade in the bow, under the command of Captain Roberts.

Pushing rapidly up the road Thornton encountered Morgan's advance, when he divided his superior force, sending a part to attack Tessier, while with the remainder, and aided by Roberts's carronades, he assailed Davis. Both commands were soon put to flight, and fell back in confusion on Morgan's line. Tessier's men could not gain the road, and many of them took refuge in the swamps, where they suffered much for several hours.

When Thornton gained the open fields in front of Morgan's lines, he extended his force, and with the sailors in column on the road, and the marines placed as a reserve, he advanced upon the American works under cover of a flight of rockets, and with the aid of Captain Roberts's carronades. As the sailors rushed forward they were met by volleys of grape-shot from Philibert which made them recoil. Seeing this, Thornton dashed forward with the Eighty-fifth, and handling the men with great skill and celerity, soon put the Kentuckians to flight, who ran in wild confusion, and could not be rallied. Following up this advantage, Thornton soon drove the Louisianians from the intrenchments, and gained possession of Morgan's line after that General had spiked his cannon and cast them into the river. He next made for Patterson's battery, three hundred yards in the rear of Morgan's lines. Its guns, which had been playing effectually on the British in front of Jackson's lines, were now trailed on the near foe on the river road. But Patterson, threatened by a flank movement, was compelled to give way; so he spiked his guns, and fled on board the Louisiana, while his sailors assisted in getting her into the stream out of the reach of the enemy.

A large number of the troops were rallied and formed on the bank of the Boisgervais Canal, and prepared to make a stand there. But the British did not advance beyond Patterson's battery. There Thornton was informed of the terrible disasters on the opposite side of the river, and soon afterward received orders from General Lambert to rejoin the main army. Jackson, in the mean time having heard of Morgan's disaster, sent over General Humbert (a gallant Frenchman who was acting as a volunteer) with four hundred men to reinforce him. Their services were not needed. Thornton had withdrawn, and at twilight re-embarked his troops. That night the Americans repossessed their works, and before morning Patterson had restored his battery in a better position, and announced the fact to Jackson at dawn by discharges of heavy cannon at the British outposts at Bienvenu's. The loss of the enemy on this occasion, in killed and wounded, was a little more than one hundred. The Americans lost one man killed and five wounded. On that side of the Mississippi the British acquired their sole trophy during their efforts to capture New Orleans. It was a small flag. It now hangs conspicuously among other war trophies in Whitehall, London, with the inscription: "Taken at the battle of New Orleans, January 8, 1815."

Let us now observe what occurred at Jackson's lines after the conflict had ceased.

The commander, accompanied by his staff, passed slowly along his whole line, addressing words of congratulation and praise to the officers and men every where. Then the band struck up "Hail Columbia," and cheer after cheer for the hero went up from every part of the line. It was echoed from the lips of excited citizens who had been watching the battle at a distance with the greatest anxiety. Then the soldiers, after partaking of some refreshments, turned to the performance of the sad duty of caring for the wounded and the bodies of the dead, which thickly strewed the plain of Chalmette for a quarter of a mile back from the front of Jackson's lines. These were the maimed and slain of the British army. No less than twenty-six hundred were lost to the enemy in that terrible battle, of whom seven hundred were killed, fourteen hundred were wounded, and five hundred were made prisoners. The Americans lost only eight killed and thirteen wounded! The history of human warfare presents no parallel to this disparity in loss. The Americans were thoroughly protected by their breast-works, while the British fought in front of them in an open level plain.

After the battle General Lambert sent a flag of truce asking for an armistice in order to bury his dead. Jackson granted it on the condition that it should not be extended to operations on the right bank of the river. The result of this exception was, as we have observed, the immediate withdrawal of Thornton from Morgan's lines. On the following morning detachments from both armies were drawn up three hundred yards in front of the American lines, when the dead bodies between that point and the intrenchments were carried and delivered to the British by the Kentuckians and Tennesseans on the very scaling-ladders left by the enemy when driven back. The British then carried their dead to a designated spot on Bienvenu's plantation which had been marked out as the cemetery of "The Army of Louisiana." There they were buried; and to this day that consecrated "God's Acre" has never been disturbed. It is distinguished in the landscape by a grove of small cypress-trees, and is a spot regarded with superstitious awe by the negroes in that neighborhood. The wounded, who were made prisoners, were carefully conveyed to New Orleans, where they were placed in the barracks, and tenderly cared for by the citizens.

The bodies of the dead British officers were carried to Villeré's, the head-quarters, in whose garden some of them were buried by torch-light that night with solemn ceremonies. Those of Packenham, Gibbs, Rennie, and one or two other officers, were disemboweled, placed in casks of rum, and sent to their friends in England. Their viscera were buried beneath a stately pecan-tree which, with another quite as stately, yet stands in vigorous health, on the lawn a few yards from Villeré's house. It is said to be a remarkable fact that this tree, fruitful before its branches were made to overshadow the remains of the invaders, has been barren ever since.

While these events after the battle were occurring on the field of strife the British were seeking to secure the free navigation of the Mississippi below New Orleans, for themselves, by capturing Fort St. Philip, at a bend of the stream, seventy or eighty miles below the city in a direct line, and which was considered by both parties as the key of Louisiana. It contained, at that time, a garrison of three hundred and sixty-six men, under Major Overton of the rifle corps, and the crew of a gun-boat which had been warped into the bayou at its side. On the morning of the 9th, at about the time when disposition was being made of the British dead in front of Jackson's lines, a little squadron of five hostile vessels appeared near the fort. They consisted of a sloop of war, a gun-brig, and a schooner (Herald, Sophia, and Tender), and two bomb vessels. They anchored out of range of the heavy guns of the fort, the bomb vessels with their broadsides toward St. Philip. At three o'clock in the afternoon they opened fire, and finding they had the range of the fort, continued the bombardment, with little interruption, until daybreak of the 18th, casting more than a thousand shells with the expenditure of twenty thousand pounds of powder, besides many round and grape shot. For nine days the Americans were in their battery; five of them without shelter, exposed to cold rain part of the time. The proceeds of this expenditure secured by the British consisted of two Americans killed and seven wounded. They withdrew on the 18th without gaining either the fort, spoils, or glory.

On the 18th of January, in accordance with an arrangement made the previous day, a general exchange of prisoners took place; and on the 19th the British, under Lambert, were wholly withdrawn from the Mississippi, having stolen noiselessly away under cover of darkness the previous night. They reached Lake Borgne at dawn on the 19th, but they were yet sixty miles from their fleet, exposed to quite keen wintry air, and considerably annoyed by mounted men under Colonel de la Ronde, who hung upon their rear. There they remained until the 27th, when they embarked, and two days afterward reached the fleet in the deep-water between Cat and Ship Islands. The vigilant Jackson, in the mean time, had made such disposition of his forces as to guard every approach to the city; for he thought the foiled enemy, enraged by disappointment, might attempt to strike a sudden blow in some other quarter.

On the 21st of January, Jackson, with the main body of his army, entered New Orleans. They were met in the suburbs by almost the entire population of all ages and sexes, who greeted the victors as their saviours; and they entered the town in triumphal procession, with far more honest pride than ever swelled the bosoms of victorious conquerors or emperors of other centuries of time.

Two days afterward (23d) New Orleans was the theatre of a most imposing spectacle. At the request of Jackson, the Abbé du Bourg, Apostolic Prefect for Louisiana, appointed that a day for the public offering of thanks to Almighty God for his interposition in behalf of the American people and nationality. The dawn was greeted by the booming of cannon. It was a bright and beautiful winter morning on the verge of the tropics. The religious ceremonies were to be held in the old Spanish Cathedral, which was decorated with evergreens for the occasion.

In the centre of the public square, in front of the Cathedral, where the equestrian statue of Jackson now stands, was erected a temporary triumphal arch, supported by six Corinthian columns and festooned with flowers and evergreens. Beneath the arch stood two beautiful little girls, each upon a pedestal and holding in her hand a civic crown of laurel. Near them stood two damsels, one personifying Liberty and the other Justice. From the arch to the church, arranged in two rows, stood beautiful girls, all dressed in white, and each covered with a blue gauze veil and bearing a silver star on her brow. These personified the several States and Territories of the Union. Each carried a flag with the name of the State which she represented upon it. Each also carried a small basket trimmed with blue ribbon and filled with flowers; and behind each was a lance stuck in the ground bearing a shield on which was inscribed the name and legend of the State or Territory which she represented. These were linked by evergreen festoons that extended from the arch to the door of the cathedral.

At the appointed time General Jackson, accompanied by the officers of his staff, passed through the gate of the Grand Square fronting the river, amidst the roar of artillery, and was conducted between lines of Planché's New Orleans battalion of Creoles to the raised floor of the arch. As he stepped upon it the two little girls leaned gently forward and placed the laurel crown upon his head. At the same moment a charming Creole girl (Miss Kerr), as the representative of Louisiana, stepped forward, and with modesty supreme in voice and manner addressed a few congratulatory words to the chief, eloquent with expressions of the most profound gratitude. To these words Jackson made a brief reply, and then passed on toward the church, his pathway strewn with flowers by the sweet representatives of the States.

At the cathedral entrance the honored hero was met by the Abbé du Bourg in his pontifical robes, and supported by a college of priests in their sacerdotal garments. The Abbé addressed the General with eloquent and patriotic discourse, after which the chief was conducted to a conspicuous seat near the great altar, in the Cathedral, when the Te Deum Laudamus was chanted by the choir and people. When the imposing pageant was over the General retired to his quarters to resume the stern duties of a soldier; and that night the city of New Orleans blazed with a general illumination.

OLD COURT-HOUSE, 269 ROYAL STREET.

A few weeks later New Orleans became the theatre of another great popular demonstration, of a far different kind, when General Jackson appeared, not as a coroneted hero and almost an object of adoration beneath the roof of the old Cathedral, but as a culprit arraigned at the bar of justice in the old Spanish Court-house yet standing on Royal Street. The story may be told in a few words. In the Legislature of Louisiana was a powerful faction personally opposed to Jackson—so powerful that, when the officers and troops were thanked by that body on the 2d of February, the name of their chief leader was omitted. This conduct highly incensed the people. Their indignation was intensified by a seditious publication, put forth by one of the members of the Legislature, which was intended to produce disaffection in the army. This was a public matter, and Jackson felt bound to notice it. He ordered the arrest of the author and his trial by martial law. Judge Dominique Hall, of the Supreme Court of the United States, issued a writ of habeas corpus in favor of the offender. Jackson considered this a violation of martial law, and ordered the arrest of the Judge and his expulsion beyond the limits of the city. The Judge, in turn, when the military law was revoked on the 13th of March, in consequence of the official proclamation of peace, required Jackson to appear before him and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of court. He cheerfully obeyed the summons, and entered the crowded court-room in citizen's dress. He had almost reached the bar before he was recognized, when he was greeted with huzzas by a thousand voices. The Judge was alarmed, and hesitated. Jackson stepped upon a bench, procured silence, and then turning to the trembling Judge, said: "There is no danger here—there shall be none. The same hand that protected this city from outrage against the invaders of the country will shield and protect this court, or perish in the effort. Proceed with your sentence." With quivering lips the Judge pronounced him guilty of contempt of court, and fined him a thousand dollars. The act was greeted by a storm of hisses. Jackson immediately drew a check for the amount, handed it to the Marshal, and then made his way for the court-house door. The excitement of the people was intense. They lifted Jackson upon their shoulders, bore him to the street, and then the immense crowd sent up a shout that blanched the cheeks of Judge Hall, and gave evidence of the unbounded popularity of the heroic soldier who was so prompt in his obedience to the mandates of the civil law. He was placed in a carriage, from which the people released the horses and dragged it themselves to Maspero's house, where he addressed the populace, urging them to show their appreciation of the blessings of liberty and free government by a willing submission to the authorities of their country.

The news of the gallant defense of New Orleans produced a thrill of intense joy throughout the land. State Legislatures and other public bodies thanked the hero who commanded the victorious little army; a small commemorative medal was struck and extensively circulated among the people, and the National Congress then signified their approval by voting him a gold medal, and thirty years afterward by refunding to him the amount of the fine imposed by Judge Hall. Peace came immediately afterward; and Jackson retired to his home, a rude log-house in the forest—the dwelling of an accomplished wife whom he tenderly loved—from which he had been drawn by the urgent calls of his country. That home stood there in rude loneliness an eloquent witness of Andrew Jackson's moral heroism. His generous hand had aided a young relative of his wife in an unsuccessful mercantile adventure. To meet the obligations of the insolvent, Jackson sold the improved portion of his estate, and took up his abode in the woods to begin a new farm and establish a new home.

The battle of New Orleans was fought just half a century ago, a fortnight after the treaty of peace had been signed at Ghent.

[Scene at a Fancy Ball.]

THEY tell me you want to become, my dear,
A Sister of Charity;
But before you set off from home, my dear,
Let your mission begin with me!

E'en the world with its cares and strifes, my dear,
Is a school it is easy to see,
And if vows you would make for your life, my dear,
Pr'ythee make them at once to me!

Whenever you wish to "confess," my dear,
Be this tender heart your shrine;
For you never will find, I guess, my dear,
So loving a heart as mine!

If indulgences ever you need, my dear,
You have only how many to say,
And if blessings your bliss can speed, my dear,
You'll be happy by night and by day!

TOM'S EDUCATION.

I HAD lost my place—perhaps I should say situation. What kind of a situation, do you ask? Civil? “Contrairy quite,” as Mrs. Gamp says; and hardly military, though I dealt with infantry, and taught the young ideas how to shoot.

What a tide of life surged through the streets that day! The slow, steady tramp of soldiers resounded here and there; martial music throbbed in the air, and found its echo in thousands of anxious, throbbing hearts. A national fort had been stormed and taken by traitor hands. Each man felt as if his own hearth-stone had been shattered, his own fire-side invaded and desecrated. But I did not take the national grief into my heart. The struggle far away on Carolina's coast was a dead and distant thing to me compared with the battle I had waged that day, and the new fields for toil that still lay before me. A genial April sun sent its bars of dusky gold through the car window and laid them on my hands—a mocking shadow that could not be coined or used—a phantom of a substantial good. “Oh, golden light,” I sighed, “golden youth, golden love! what are ye to the gold with which we buy and sell?” But when I recalled the multitudinous blessings of light, the rich promise of youth, and the glorious vision of true love, I thought, “Oh, ‘Gold! gold! gold! gold!

Beaten or hammered, coined or rolled,’ what art thou without God's sunshine, hope, and love, which thou canst neither buy nor sell?”

But still, I had lost my place, and what was to become of Tom's education?

I was glad to see the little brown dépôt, and to hear the well-known name, “Fonthill Station,” shouted by some one. I had yet a walk before me, for Fonthill proper reposes snugly a long half-mile away from the shriek of the locomotive. It was still light; a fresh breeze began to whisper among the leaves; a few passengers were walking the same way; and presently a tall, slender young man, with a cigar in his mouth, passed by. The smoke curled and wreathed itself backward like a thing of life. I was startled. Surely that step was familiar; surely that form was an accustomed sight—that cigar, or one like it, a household incense, as well as a source of incensing the household generally with the stale flavor of smoke that pervaded every thing. At last, when the young gentleman began to whistle a tune, I could doubt no longer. I stepped forward quickly and called out, in an assured voice,

“Tom!”

The young man swallowed the rest of his tune and turned his head. I felt my heart sink. It was Tom.

“Why, hallo! Mill, is that you?”

“What are you doing at home—college does not break up till July?”

“And what are you doing at home, Miss?

You were to stay two months longer, as I understood it,” answered Tom, laughing.

But I was too anxious and unhappy to enjoy the joke.

“Tell me, Tom, are they all well at home?”

“Oh yes—‘reasonably convalescent.’ I am, at least. Father looks thinner; but then he wears himself out with work-service every day and special honors to the saints. He's dreadful busy now about something that's to come off to-morrow;” and Tom hummed, gayly,

“To-morrow's the feast of St. Alecampagne,
Apostle and martyr by heretics slain,
Will you come to the altar I've shaded for you?”

I was so preoccupied that I had no rebuke for Tom's levity.

“And what kind of a scrape have you had in college, Tom?”

“I don't mind telling you, I'm sure, Mill,” answered Tom. “You see I went away stuffed as full as a sausage with good advice from father and you; and I really meant well. I intended to keep it all and profit by it, highly seasoned as it was. For a couple of months I studied like a brick—like a regular brick, you know.”

Here Tom paused to give effect to his statement. I was silent, though I did not comprehend the style in which a brick conducts his studies.

“But it was so precious dull, so slow, you see,” continued Tom, “that I was obliged to get acquainted with some fellows who were faster. We had rich scenes; but I must admit I began to be stumped in lessons about that time, and now and then made a blue fizzle.”

“A what?” I asked, rather confounded at these inexplicable terms.

“A fizzle. Oh! I forgot you're not one of the fellows. A ‘stump’ is when you miss a question, and ‘the blue fizzle’ when you miss the whole lesson.”

“So the blue fizzle became frequent. Oh, Tom!”

“Yes, 'pon my word. I don't see how it was, for I studied; but you see I've got such a head, like a sieve, I think—the more knowledge you put in the more it ain't there. Well, so I went on till one of the Proffs caught us in a midnight spree. I never was appreciated afterward.”

“Oh, Tom, are you expelled?” I cried, in sudden agony.

“No; only sent to rusticate for my health,” he answered, laughing.

His laugh smote me to the heart like a blow sudden and sharp, and left a dull pain aching there. Could he laugh at his own disgrace—did he feel no shame? Had he no greater object in life but to enjoy? I feared not. I was glad to see the lights twinkling here and there before me, and to know that home was near. I quickened my steps. My heart beat fuller and faster as I saw the brown-stone church tower with turrets clearly defined against a pale evening sky. “The same, the same!” I murmured, in a choking voice, as though I had feared some miraculous change in its familiar aspect.

The little study looked bright as ever, with its clear astral lamp shedding a mild light over my father's face. He sat at the table with an ancient-looking volume in his hand when I entered, but looked terrified and bewildered when he saw me.

"What brings you home, Milly? Are you sick?"

"Oh no," I answered. "Do I look like an invalid? I am well and happy now that I am with you all once more."

When Rose came bounding into the room, with overwhelming kisses and questions about fashions and flounces, I was fain to excuse her flirty frivolous little ways as I looked at her blooming, brilliant face. Was it not enough if she only occupied a niche in life like a beautiful statue, or framed herself in your visions a rosy, blooming picture, or sang carelessly as a bird might do? She was "a thing of beauty and a joy forever," my dear little sister Rose.

"What will you have for supper?" asked Rose, when the first ebullition of joy was over. "You can't think what a good housekeeper I make. I compound the daintiest little dishes."

"She gives her mind to it," said Tom, laughing.

"Well, I know you enjoy it, old fellow! and papa says I make a much better cook than Mildred."

"Did I—did I say that?" asked her father.

"Why, yes, papa, you certainly did, after you had enjoyed a pudding of my own invention. You said it must be called the 'Rosamunda.' Now, Mildred, just tell me did you ever originate a pudding?"

"No, never."

"Take out a patent, Rose," cried Tom. "To originate a pudding is much better than to originate a poem."

"Much more useful, I should think," answered Rose, tossing back her blond curls with an air of pique. "Now, Mildred, you know, always went about with an absent air, and had Schiller or some other dreadful book behind the baking-board, and while she waited results she was marching up and down repeating terrific German words that sounded like a witch's incantation."

"Words that would 'splinter the teeth of a crocodile.' They need to be boiled before they are fit for use," interrupted Tom.

"Well, the cakes used to burn sometimes," finished Rose.

"Yes—I confess," said I, laughing. "I hope you will be far more practical and useful than I have ever been, Rose. Dreamers have no business in life—it is the doers who are needed. If we can't provide the dinners or cook them, of what use are we?"

"Don't say that," exclaimed our father. "What would the world be without the thinkers—the great minds whose words stir us to great deeds?"

"Do you remember that picture in Harper's of a training-school for such things?" said Tom —"one girl is calling out, 'Please, Sir, I know this omelet;' and another is salting her lesson with tears, while she dolefully says, 'I never can learn this plum-pudding.'"

"Oh, how nice!" exclaimed Rose, "if one could only eat the lessons when learned."

"That would be truly stimulating to your ambition, Rose. I'm afraid you would get into a high fever with the intensity of your duties," laughed Tom.

When they went out the gay talk ceased. I recounted a little of my bitter experience. Then I tried to banish all troublesome thoughts. For a brief moment the door of care was barred—the future, with its untried perplexities—the past, with its known trials, were forgotten—only the serene present shed its atmosphere of peace around me. But even in looking at that dear face care seemed to mock me with a returning glance. Was it the silvery light of the lamp which made the ground glass-shade look like an illumined pearl?—that showed so many gleams of white in his hair, and made his cheek so pallid? Looking up into that face, and reading it as an open book, I could not help doing as we do with a too pathetic tale. I turned away to hide the tears.

Time passed on, and I began once more to look over the papers for a situation. Not long could I enjoy the shelter of the home-nest. It was not a favorable time of year, and the few that offered seemed to require such marvels of intellect that they must be like the century plant, and only blossom once in a hundred years from the tree of knowledge. Tom made some faint objection.

"But I want you to start fair for college next fall."

He was silent. In fact he looked rather disgusted at the continual harping on such a mouldered string. He cared little about going back to college—I saw that plainly. He would willingly float on uselessly as a straw on the current of life; but I could easier give up home-love and comfort than my ambitious plans for him, our only brother—so handsome and really gifted!

He saw my serious look, and said, "Don't be afraid for me, Mill. I'll work like a regular tramp at my invention this summer. I don't say much about it for fear of being forestalled; but you'll see."

I turned away impatiently. I had little faith in Tom's inventions, except that they were the very best patents ever taken out for wasting time.

Some time after Tom grew gloomy. I remembered that his grave mood began with the reception of a letter. One bright afternoon—the sunshine looked so genial—the young birches in the garden waved their branches, wreathed with tender green, in the soft air—the tulips nodded their gay heads, turbaned like princesses of the East—the green borders were starred with creamy-hued crocus all alight with buds—here and there the apple blossoms lay rosy white on the grass, a mosaic more lovely than the Florentine. There was a gleam of water in the distance, and toward this I walked. The sunshine that fell on my path gave no hint of marsh or swamp—no shadow of dread disease in its golden beams. It paved a way of light amidst emerald grasses, along which I walked gayly as if it were the road to happiness, and the far-famed temple of earthly felicity stood at the end.

But I found something else at the end—namely, Tom. Yes! there he was, stretched out under a huge tree, smoking a cigar. He held something crumpled in his hand. I walked straight up to him.

"Well, Tom, you didn't invite me to join your excursion, but here I am."

No answer.

"You seem to be having a good time here."

"A —— [something like an oath] dull time." I was shocked, but not repelled.

"Is it not a lovely afternoon?"

"Is it?"

"Yes—can't you see?"

Tom puffed vigorously away at his cigar till he grew dim in the smoke.

I sat down beside him. The river rapidly floating on, here and there flecked with a white sail—the waves sun-steeped and sparkling—the blue sky, with slow-sailing floats of pearly cloud—all whispered "Peace," like the voice of the Master, to any tempest that might rage in the soul. But these voices seemed silent to Tom. He only glowered fiercely at Nature, as if he wondered what business she had to look gay when he was gloomy and discontented. Presently he tossed something white toward me. I picked up the crumpled note, and somewhat curiously smoothed it out and read:

"DEAR TOM,—I regret that I am forced to remind you of a claim I have against you. I go to Washington in a few weeks, or I should wait. I wish, if possible, that you would let me have the sum I lent you before that time. If I thought it would be the last imprudence, I would gladly lose it for the sake of your reform. As it is, I claim it that you may learn the value of money; also that I may use it for some of my brave fellows. Yours ever,

"BERTRAND MERRION."

I felt my face flush with shame for Tom, and a little indignation at the tone of the note.

"Isn't he a prig?" exclaimed Tom, savagely.

"Rather cool in his tone," I answered, with a sadly troubled heart.

"Yet, you'd hardly believe it—he's a splendid fellow!" said Tom again.

"Is he?"

"Yes; offered it of his own accord when he overheard me telling my difficulties. Blame it, how was I to know what Champagne suppers would cost? When the bills came in—whew!"

"Oh! Tom, how could you?" I exclaimed, quite appalled at the magnitude of his folly.

"Well, I tell you I was astonished!" answered Tom, in an angry tone, as if that was a sufficient expiation for any fault. "Bertrand Merrion was one of the grave and reverend Seniors, but he gave me the money with a large pill of advice—sugar-coated. I have an invention now that will be worth a mint if it only succeeds."

"If you do not find that your invention has been invented before, as is generally the case with your discoveries. You are always busy with toys, Tom—from the time you invented silk-reels that never would wind, to this hour, when some impossible scheme takes your mind from all possible good—from all self-culture—from all scientific knowledge, which would show you the untrodden paths of new invention—and where the ignes fatui glimmer only to lead astray."

"In the mean time Bertrand Merrion—"

"Will hardly wait for your invention to be patented," I answered, gravely. "Our father must know nothing of this, Tom."

"Of course not," answered Tom, moodily. "Never mind, I can go as clerk in a dry-goods store. It would go against the grain confoundedly, but I might earn something; or I don't know but I should prefer a dose of laudanum."

Tom stood listlessly enough, skipping stones in the water as he spoke. He looked very little like accomplishing either suggestion just then: erect in the pride of youth; his slender figure, his handsome face crowned with well-trimmed curls; his quick hazel eyes, now a little moody and roving in their glance; his smooth white forehead, too broad and smooth for intellectual development; his features altogether too regular to denote strength of character. All these traits I marked as I examined him with a keener glance than ever before, and they gave me the impression of one who might do many a foolish deed, but never a daring one.

"I have some money, Tom," I said, "but it must be kept for your education; for this debt I have nothing."

At this moment the sunshine, glinting through the boughs, fell on a diamond ring that shone on my hand. The light seemed to radiate from the stone till it sparkled and gleamed like a tiny sun itself. It seemed to light a way out of the difficulty.

"I will give you this, Tom," I said, with a painful effort. "You can pawn it, and I can afford to make up the rest."

Even Tom was moved to some faint objection. "Our mother's ring," he said, in a low tone. "You must not—I can never allow that."

"If it only proves a talisman to save you from future folly. Oh, Tom, promise me that you will go back with the strong determination to make the best use of all the opportunities not so easily earned I can tell you. You have idled too long."

"I'll promise any thing for your sake, Milly," answered Tom, quite gayly, now that the temporary pressure of the debt was removed. "You are the best sister that an 'unfortunate cove' ever owned."

He could throw off a burden so easily, careless about who took them up; he promised so gayly, I could hardly feel satisfied with a tone which had no depth to indicate resolve, no earnestness of will, no strong purpose of accomplishing in its expression. I rose from my seat, moss-cushioned and daisy-tapestried as it was, with a faint and weary feeling, as though life with its numerous calls and duties was already a burden. The glory of the day had departed, though sunset clouds began to golden, though purple curtains began to fall before the fading light. I felt a chill in the balmy air, and saw behind Fonthill the misty giants rising and wavering in the steps of the dying day. They seemed to beckon me with their vaporous arms, and to fan my brow with their chill damp breath till I reached the rectory door.

About a week afterward, as I passed, equipped for a walk, Tom called me into his room. He presented a rather curious spectacle at the moment, as if ready for execution, though the oil-skin cap which he wore to protect his glossy brown curls from dust and danger was not drawn far enough down. He never forgot in his most absorbing occupation what he considered the chief duty of man—to look as handsome as possible, and enjoy himself. Besides this cap, which gave him somewhat the appearance of a peeled onion, Tom sported a most remarkable dressing-gown. It had once been a gorgeous Cashmere strewn with Oriental palms; but it was now so spattered and smeared with various chemical substances that the original tints had left in dismay, and the palms had run riot into a most fantastic vegetation, one yawning chasm being burned therein by sulphuric acid. Small explosions were frequently heard in Tom's room, and fearfully pungent odors made their way through the keyhole, and diffused their baneful presence through the house. His genius not being of the common order, which presents but one object to the soaring mind, he gave himself to many schemes, and felt equal to achieving greatness in either. Mechanics, art, and science alike tempted him from the beaten path of duty with their seductive blandishments, and all were represented in the various lumber that crowded the room. His brain teemed with great ideas—perhaps impossible to embody, or already in use amidst the votaries of science.

"Just come in and wait a minute, and I'll walk with you," he said. "I don't mind your seeing every thing, as it isn't likely you'll get any idea of my invention, and have the affair patented before me."

"Well, what's the invention now?" I asked, rather impatiently, as I made my way with difficulty amidst chips and shavings and dislodged a bottle of ether from the only chair.

"Oh, I've got half a dozen," Tom answered, laughing. "If it was only one I might succeed. Now your common minds can only contain one idea. My brain is over-fertile. I really can't tell which to take up, for either would make me famous."

"I wish, Tom, that you could only invent something that would make you prudent and diligent at your studies: such an invention would be truly invaluable. Your mind seems to be vividly portrayed by the condition of this room—so choked up with useless trash that one must almost go on a voyage of discovery to find the useful articles of furniture."

"Ah, but what sublime order genius can evoke out of chaos!" Tom answered, carelessly, as he put on his coat. "The only trouble is, which of my grand schemes shall I astonish the world with developing."

"Say, rather, which kind of nonsense will you waste your summer upon," I answered, in an unsympathizing tone. "You ought to be studying now for an advanced class. As you have lost all the opportunities of this term by your own folly, I should think you would feel bound to make it up."

"And so I will, Milly," he answered, as we left the room. "Can't you understand a fellow's devotion to a great idea and yet studying too? I mean to study, of course."

"And if you would only hear little Frank St. Clair's lessons," I went on, eagerly, "you might have something laid up against the fall."

"Now, Milly, that's a little too much," answered Tom, with quite an injured air. "Do you think I'm adapted to teaching stupid little brats? Do you think I could spend my time hammering ideas into a wooden-headed youngster. No, I thank you. I would rather measure ribbons, if you please; it is far more entertaining and easy."

"And yet, Tom," I answered, with a throb of pain at my heart, "I have this to do. I have to retrace all the dusty and dry paths of elementary knowledge that you think so terrible."

"Ah yes!" answered Tom, conceitedly; "but you are a woman, and women somehow adapt themselves so easily to circumstances. Now I have not the least adaptation to such things. I'd rather hang myself than be a school-teacher."

I was silent. I knew a better name than adaptation to apply to that readiness with which a true woman assumes burdens that a stalwart man would find intolerable. It was self-sacrifice.

Tom was silent a moment, and then said,

"I say, Milly, I haven't written to Merrion yet. How are we going to arrange it?"

It was rather odd that Tom should say "we," as though he had the remotest share in the arrangement. He accepted favors in a lordly style, and was generally too well-bred to allude to them at all. His gratitude might be defined as "a lively sense of benefits to come."

"You had better go to New York at once," I said. "You can see Mr. Merrion and settle it."

So Tom's mind being fully relieved he strayed off to some lounging acquaintance on the river-bank, and seemed to become oblivious to my presence. I hastened home, for a chill, mist-like rain began to fall. Into this vaporous gulf Tom disappeared a few hours later, with a buoyancy and exhilaration of spirit at the prospect of his trip, in nowise dampened by the rain.

All the next day dull and leaden clouds moved heavily over the sky. At last, in the afternoon, the dome of cloud-granite was riven and a glory glimmered through. The elms in the garden shone dewy bright, like the resplendent trees of a fairy tale, where every leaf is a jewel. Far off the misty Titans were rolling up their ponderous bulks before the king of day. I watched the earth and sky with a restless feeling that I could not define, and at last I took up a book for relief. Perhaps because my life was full of effort, self-sacrifice, and trial, I turned to "The Lotus-Eater," which chants the luxury of dreamful ease, with the vexing refrain, "Why should life all labor be?" It shut out for a time the work-day world with its ever-encroaching materialism, and gave me glimpses of a glorious land filled with repose—a land of glancing streams falling in sheets of foam—a land flushed with unfading sunset—a charmed sun that lingered ever with a rosy flame—a land where all things remained the same, nor submitted to the laborious law of change.

But I was suddenly recalled to the actual by the opening of the garden gate and the entrance of Rose, who held up a letter toward me. Slowly I stepped down the aerial spaces from the cloudy sphere of fantasy. At the same time I walked down the material stairs of the house—took the letter, opened, and read:

"I can see your eyes dilate with surprise, dear Milly, when you open this epistle. I left Fonthill with the full expectation of returning to the paternal fold to-day. I made many resolutions on the way of being such a good boy, in hopes that I might some time find a plum in the pie of my future, like little Jacky Horner of Mother Goose memory; but I shall never have my finger in that pie, I am sure. 'There is a tide in the affairs of man,' you know, Milly, the rest may be found in Shakspeare—haul over the book, and when found make a note on't. Well, I met the tide just as I turned Fulton Street, and Bertrand Merrion sailing on it with the serene composure of a clam at high-water. There was so much martial music in the air, so many star-spangled banners about, that somehow patriotism seemed to be infectious—I found I was 'Hail Columbia' all over, though I never thought of it before; but Bertrand Merrion, he's overflowing, you know, he looks daggers and talks nothing smaller than grape-shot—he's a regular steam-boiler, full of indignation and national pride, ready to explode at a touch—none of your conservatives like father, but a real out-and-outer. He's my Captain, Milly, for I enlisted at once. We're off to the Capital to-morrow. Break it to them at home as gently as possible. You know I'm twenty, and if I don't go now, I should certainly one day be 'grafted into the army.' Don't fret about my education, Milly. I'm in the right school now. I'm Second Lieutenant to begin with, and shall graduate in a higher class. I couldn't take a more honorable degree than U.S.V. in Uncle Sam's noble army of volunteers. Don't fear I shall cover myself with 'glory.' Lock my room so that no enterprising genius may put his inquisitive nose in and smell out my new invention. Good-by. I'll send your diamond back by Express. Bertrand won't listen to any payment now. Love to all.

TOM KEITH."

That was all. So ended my work and the need of it—I might stay at home now in inglorious ease—as far as related to Tom. My father was brought back to the actual by his son's departure. He laid aside the early Fathers and sought the latest newspaper. He became more alive to the present—to the great drama which was enacted around him—more a man of the time, with a hearty interest in passing events—than when he had spent his life in groping among the bones of a dead past. Even Rose forgot some favorite finery in reading aloud stirring editorials on the war, or writing long letters to Tom, which he perused eagerly by the camp-fire with a warmth about his heart never felt before. He had suffered some privation, and borne it like a man; but it made him value his humble home more than ever, and any token from that charmed spot grew doubly precious. He learned to suffer and be strong; and it seemed to me that to some the war was a great educator, terrible in its lessons, but thereby enduring. It took men away from selfish or wasted lives, and gave them a noble principle for which to suffer or even die. It drew into its vast training-school even the sickly Sybarites of fashion, and taught them that "to do and to suffer" was better than simply "to be." It gave a worthy object to objectless lives; it made people read who never read before; it struck out sparks of sympathy and benevolence from cold and niggardly hearts. It lighted the fires of philanthropy and universal love to the suffering; it called out self-devoted women who had never found their true life-work till they stood with ministering hands by the sick and dying. Ah! I thought there is good as well as evil in the war; and I followed my young soldier in thought on his weary marches, and by the flaming camp-fire, even to the battle-field, where the "ranks are rolled in vapor, and the winds are laid with sound."

The nation trembled on the eve of a great battle. Hearts turned sick and cheeks blanched at the prospect. "We must win," said the national voice; but deep throbbing in the national heart the question rankled like a poisoned arrow, "What—what if we should lose?" Restless feet trod the streets of Fonthill, and anxious groups talked at the corners. At the Rectory we talked little; even Rose's merry laugh was hushed. With bated breath and aching hearts we waited till toward twilight, when the evening paper usually came. Then a nervous and impatient anxiety sent us out to meet the news rather than await its coming. We met it at last. Terribly the tide of disaster swept by—on every side we heard the muttered thunder of the fearful storm. "Great defeat; terrible repulse; frightful loss of life; utter demoralization of the army; strange panic," etc. No need to repeat the bitter story; for what American can ever forget the first battle of Bull Run? I seized the paper, and tried to pick out something more from the meagre but fearful sentences; but there was nothing—no word of comfort—no retrieval of utter loss. Where was Tom?

We found his name in the newspaper list, three days after, "Seriously wounded."

We went at once to Washington. Rose, sobered by sorrow, presided at home with the sedateness of a matron, and made ready for the expected invalid. The parishioners were full of kindness. A new tie seemed to bind them to the Rector's family—now that we were tried by the same fiery ordeal through which many of their hearts had passed and grown tenderer by the trial. When, after weeks of weary waiting by the bedside, we brought back a pale attenuated figure, who looked out from hollow, cavernous eyes with an eager glance to catch the first glimpse of his beloved home, it was hard to recognize in this worn and wasted man the handsome, careless Tom. Even the coldest critics among our people melted into sincere sympathy at the sight; for some of them had loved ones in the army, who might one day be struck with the same withering blight, or—woeful thought!—receive the cold and deadly bullet into their young hearts, and be left to the brief, fierce agony of the death-struggle alone.

But deeper than the mere physical was the change in Tom. The ghastly pallor that replaced the flush of health, the wasted hollows where all was firmly rounded, the weakened limbs bereft of their athlete strength, were not more changed than the self-pleasing disposition, the careless demands on the time of others, the indifferent acceptance of any sacrifice that had marked him when in health. Short and severe as the schooling had been, it had effected more than the quiet training of years. He had found that "knowledge by suffering entereth;" for never till he had suffered himself had he felt a care for others. All through the languid August days he lay and thought. Now that he must lie there supine and indolent he felt the nobility of work; he was tortured with schemes of helpful action. One day he said:

"Milly, as soon as I am well enough I shall burn that new invention."

"Yes, Tom."

"I've been a confounded drag to you all, Milly. If I should go now you would all do better."

"Oh, Tom!" I cried, with a sudden burst of tears, "you are getting better; don't talk in that way."

"You are worn out with watching me; you have lost your roses in taking care of me. You must go out every day now, or I shall rebel and not take my medicine."

When had Tom cared for my comfort before, or considered any one but self? It was so sweet and unusual that I could not speak.

"If I get well, Milly—and I hope I shall, that I may reverse the order of things and do something worthy of living—I shall take care of you all. Merrion says I'm sure to be promoted for gallant conduct in the hour of battle: so you shall have every comfort. You needn't leave your home now for strangers. I despise myself that I ever allowed it."

"It was my own choice," I interrupted; "you shall not blame yourself for that."

"Well, I'm burning to do something for you. I should like to sacrifice myself in some way," said Tom, with a faint smile. "When you get married I shall give you the jolliest blow-out!"

"Is that elegant expression part of your late college course?"

"I'm afraid the dialect of the army is not quite as choice as might have been heard in the groves of Athens," answered Tom. "But I can tell you I've learned something better than choice phrases. When a fellow's cast away in the sea of a large army, isolated and homesick, he's apt to remember home care and affection, and to value the sympathy which he once took with as much indifference as his daily bread and butter. I thought of many a thing, Milly, in the lonely night-watches by the camp-fire; and my past life, so useless and aimless, often came up before me as it does before drowning people. Strange how different it all looks in that light!"

"Well, Tom, you're young enough to begin anew; sponge out the old record and try again."

Tom was silent for a while, and then he said: "Milly, do you know that being with Bertrand Merrion was one thing that brought me to my senses. His active, manly life, so full of energy and purpose, was a constant rebuke to my own self-indulgence. You saw how he visited the hospital—how he wore himself out for those men. He could hardly sleep at night; he had the whole company on his mind."

"I should think they might have proved something of a nightmare."

"But I needn't sound his praises to you," said Tom, slyly; "for I think you know all about it. Once I told him what a good sister you were, and how you gave me the diamond-ring on his account."

"Did you tell him that, Tom?"

"Why don't you ask me what he said?"

"Well, what did he say?"

"That if you would give me the hand on his account he would be the happiest of men. I saw as soon as you came that it was love at first sight."

I could not answer. I looked out of the open window where the sultry August sun streamed over the landscape like a pallid flame. Tree and shrub drooped in its fierce ray, and there was not breeze enough to stir the languid grass.

"You have given me so much, could you not give me your hand for my best friend?"

"No, Tom."

"Why," exclaimed Tom, with some of his old petulance, "there never was a better fellow."

"Because I have already given it to himself," I answered, as I ran out of the room.

Then Tom was happy. Serene and contented in heart, he grew rapidly better. He was filled with longing once more to be on the foe-man's ground. He was ready to give up home comforts so lately precious, and home love more truly estimated than ever, for the tented field and the fierce strife of battle. But not before the frost had given its sharp but healthful blessing to the enervating Southern air did he go. Then with proudly-beating heart he received the deserved and expected promotion, and took a higher rank in the wondrous training-school of the army.

THE LIFE OF FLOWERS.

SEE—on the cold damp flags,
Wherever my lady flits—
A flower-girl, huddled up in her rags,
Fallen asleep where she sits!
Well may your ladyship stop,
The sight has a wild, weird charm—
Look in the basket ready to drop Down from the listless arm.

Near;—yet how far apart!
View them, oh, pitying Powers—
Each with her tender woman's heart—
Each with her life of flowers:—
Flowers—strewn in one's happy path,
Garlands for waist and for head:—
Tell me what to the other, I pray!
Things not for beauty but bread!

Under the flaring lamp,
Out in the midnight street,
Where the air is stilly, chilly, and damp,
Look at the two, how they meet!
How many meet so—and part:—
Here in this world of ours,
Each with her tender woman's heart,
Each with her life of flowers!

SHERIDAN'S BATTLE OF WINCHESTER.

ON the morning of the 19th of September, 1864, I was marching at the head of my company along the narrow and wooded gorge through which the Berryville and Winchester pike winds between the Opequan Creek and the town of Winchester. My regiment belonged to the Second Brigade of the First Division of the Nineteenth Army Corps, and formed a fraction of the army of Major-General Philip Sheridan, which, at two o'clock that morning, had quitted its intrenched position near Berryville.

For a month Sheridan had been watching his opportunity. He had advanced to Front Royal, and retreated to Halltown; he had manœuvred in face of a superior enemy with curious and happy dexterity; he had guarded himself, where it was necessary to make a stand, with miles of field-fortifications; he had parried Early's threatened second raid upon Washington and Pennsylvania; and now, when his antagonist was weakened by the departure of Kershaw's division, he promptly resumed the offensive.

The army at this moment was engaged in the perilous movement of filing through a narrow gorge and deploying in face of a strongly-posted and veteran enemy. The road was crowded with artillery, ammunition-wagons, and ambulances, all hurrying forward. On each side of it a line of infantry in column of march stumbled over the rocky, guttered ground, and struggled through the underbrush. The multitudes of men who belong to an army, yet who do not fight—the cooks, the musicians, the hospital attendants, the quarter-masters' and commissaries' people, the sick, and the skulkers—sat on every rock and under every bush, watching us pass. Here, too, were jammed the troopers of the cavalry advance, who, for the present, had finished their fighting, having cleared the passage of the Opequan Creek, and opened the way thus far for the infantry and artillery. Presently we met litters loaded with pale sufferers, and passed a hospital-tent, inside of which I saw surgeons surrounding a table, and amputated limbs and pools of blood underneath it. The stern and sad business of the day had evidently begun in front, although the sound of it was not yet audible to us, excepting an occasional boom of cannon, deadened to a dull pum pum by the woods and the distance.

The battle of Winchester was fought on this plan: A narrow ravine, winding among hills so steep and thickly wooded as to be impassable for any troops but light infantry, debouches into an irregular, undulating valley, faced on the south by an amphitheatre of stony heights, laid, with regard to each other, like detached fortifications. The object of Sheridan was to pass through this ravine, deploy in the valley, amuse the enemy's right, fight his centre vigorously, turn and force his left. The object of Early was to allow us to deploy up to a certain extent; then to beat in our attacking columns and throw them back in confusion on our line of advance; lastly, to ruin us by pushing his strong left through our right, and reaching the mouth of the gorge so as to cut off our retreat. To effect this final purpose his army was not drawn up at right angles to the pike, but diagonally to it, so as to bring his left nearer to our vital debouching point. And this fatal stroke he attempted early in the day, with a strong column, pushed with remarkable vigor, and for a time with terrible promise of success.

At about ten o'clock the head of the Sixth Corps emerged from the ravine, took ground rapidly to the left, and advanced in two lines, the first of which presently carried a rifle-pit and wood that formed the outwork of the enemy's right. This right being refused, or held aloof, our extreme left had throughout the day, so far as I could learn, no very serious fighting. The opening struggle of supreme importance came in the centre, where it was necessary, firstly, to gain ground enough to bring up our second line; and, secondly, to hold the approaches to the ravine at no matter what cost of slaughter. I beg the reader to remark that if this was not done our striking right could not be deployed, and our retreat could not be secured; that if this was not done there could be no victory, and there must be—if the enemy pushed us with energy—calamitous defeat. Upon the Nineteenth Corps and upon Rickett's Division of the Sixth Corps devolved this bloody task. They were to sustain the principal burden of the battle during the long hours which would be necessary to let the Eighth Corps sweep around on its more enviable and brilliant mission of turning the hostile position. How the Nineteenth Corps performed its portion of the task is shown by its list of killed and wounded. Swept by musketry and artillery from the front, enfiladed by artillery from the right, pressed violently by the one grand column of attack which Early massed to decide the battle, it bled, but it stood, and, after hours of suffering, advanced.

Closely following the Sixth Corps—lapping its rear, indeed—Grover's Division emerged from the defile at a little before eleven o'clock, and forming in two lines, each consisting of two brigades, moved promptly forward in superb order. Steep hills and a thick wood, impracticable for artillery until engineered, rendered it necessary for the infantry to open the contest without the support of cannon. In face of a vigorous shelling the column swept over the hills, struggled through the wood, and emerged upon a broad stretch of rolling fields, on the other side of which lay the rebel force, supported by another wood and by a ledge of rocks, which answered the purpose of a fortification, with the semicircular heights of Winchester in the rear, as a final rallying base. As the lines of advance from the gorge were divergent, opening outward like the blades of a fan, General Emory found it necessary, in order to keep up a connection with the Sixth Corps, to hurry Molineux's brigade from the rear to the front. This was done at a double-quick, in face of the hostile musketry, without checking the general advance. And now the division quickened its pace into a charge of unusual and unintended impetuosity, the officers being dragged on by the eagerness of the men, the skirmishers firing as they ran, and the brigades following at a right-shoulder-shift, with deafening yells. Birge's men carried the detached wood with a rush: they were ordered to halt there and lie down, but it was impossible to stop them; they hurried on, pell-mell, and drove the enemy three hundred yards beyond. The rebel General Rhodes was killed while placing a battery in position. Three colonels taken by Sharpe's Brigade were sent back to Emory as prisoners. Early's first line in the centre was every where thrown back in confusion.

But an advance as vehement as this is liable to sudden reverse when the attacked party has a strong second line well in hand, as was the case on the present occasion. It is possible even that Grover's opening success changed the plans of Early, and forced him quicker than he had intended into decisive action. At all events he suddenly developed at this early stage of the battle the greatest mass of troops that he showed at any period of the day. From the position where it had been lying sheltered a force estimated at two divisions of infantry rose up, poured in a stunning volley, followed by a steady file-fire, and moved forward against the ranks of Grover and Ricketts, already disordered by their rapid push. Artillery on a height near Winchester, firing over the heads of the rebel troops, and other artillery on a height far to our right, enfilading our line, supported the movement with shell, grape, and canister. For a while this powerful and well-timed advance was fearfully successful, and threatened Sheridan with repulse, if not with serious disaster. Rickett's Division was forced, after a bloody though brief struggle, up the Berryville and Winchester pike toward the mouth of that gorge which was so vital to our army. Grover's line fought for a time at close quarters; for instance his extreme left regiment, the One Hundred and Fifty-Sixth New York (Lieutenant-Colonel Neafie), faced a rebel regiment at thirty yards distance; and around the colors of the latter not more than forty men remained, the rest having fled or fallen. But now the One Hundred and Fifty-Sixth, and presently the entire brigade, was exposed to a fatal fire from the left flank as well as from the front. Neafie's loss of one hundred and fifteen men nearly all occurred at this time and within a few minutes. Colonel Sharpe, commanding the brigade, and all the regimental commanders except one, were disabled. To attempt to hold the position longer was to be slaughtered uselessly or to be taken prisoners. The order to retire was given, and passed rapidly down the division line from left to right, being obeyed by each brigade in succession. The bloody but victorious advance was changed into a bloody and ominous retreat.

And here let me beg the reader to conceive the inevitable circumstances of hopeless, unre-sisting slaughter which attend the withdrawal of troops from the immediate presence of a powerful enemy. There is no inspiring return of blow for blow; there is no possibility of quelling the hostile fire by an answering fire; the soldier marches gloomily in his file, imagining that his foe is ever gaining on him; the ranks are rapidly thinned, and the organization of the companies shattered; and thus, from both physical and moral causes, the bravest battalions go to pieces. Rarely does it happen, if ever, that a force is extricated from this fearful trial without breaking. Grover's and Rickett's commands reached the base from which they had advanced in a state of confusion which threatened wide-spread disaster. Sixth Corps men and Nineteenth Corps men were crowding together up the line of the Berryville pike, while to the right and left of it the fields were dotted with fugitives, great numbers of them wounded, bursting out of the retiring ranks and rushing toward the cover of the forest. Some regiments disappeared for a time as organizations. Early's veterans advanced steadily, with yells of triumph and a constant rollof murderous musketry, threatening to sweep away our centre and render our struggle a defeat almost before it had become a battle. It was the bloodiest, the darkest, the most picturesque, the most dramatic, the only desperate moment of the day. General Emory and General Grover, with every brigade commander and every staff officer present, rode hither and thither through the fire, endeavoring by threats, commands, and entreaties to halt and re-form the panic-stricken stragglers.

"Halt here, men," Emory cried to group after group. "Here is good cover. Halt and form a line here."

"I am looking for my own regiment," was the usual reply.

"Never mind your own regiments. Never mind if you belong to fifty regiments. Make a regiment here."

Pointing out other groups to this and that officer of his staff, he would say, "My God! look at these men; ride over to them, and bring them up here."

Captain Yorke of the staff seized a regimental flag and bore it forward, shouting, "Men, don't desert your colors," when a spent ball struck him in the throat, paralyzing him for a time and causing him to drop his burden. Of the other staff officers Captain Wilkinson had his horse killed under him. Captain Coley had a bullet pass through his coat collar, and Major Walker received a spent shot in the shoulder.

One instance of coolness and discipline, which contrasted curiously with the general panic, was noticed by Captain Bradbury of the First Maine Battery, now Major and Chief of Artillery on General Emory's staff. Through the midst of the confusion came a captain of infantry, Rigby of the Twenty-fourth Iowa, leading a sergeant and twelve men, all marching as composedly as if returning from drill.

"Captain, you are not going to retreat any further, I hope?" said Bradbury.

"Certainly not," was the reply. "Halt; front. Three cheers, men; hip, hip, hurrah!"

The little band cheered lustily. It was the first note of defiance that broke the desperate monotony of the panic; it gave heart to every one who heard it, and made an end of retreat in that part of the field. In a few minutes the platoon swelled to a battalion composed of men from half a dozen regiments.

"Bradbury," said General Grover, "you must push a section into that gap. We must show a front there."

Under a heavy fire of musketry and artillery two pieces galloped into the open, under the charge of Bradbury himself, and, unsupported by infantry, commenced a cannonade which assisted greatly in checking the rebel advance and encouraging our men to rally. A Confederate line which attempted to carry these pieces was repulsed in a somewhat singular manner. General Emory had personally aided in rallying the One Hundred and Thirty-first New York, and had posted it in a narrow grove projecting from the wood which now formed Grover's base of resistance. The charging rebels were allowed to pass this point, and then a volley was poured into their backs. As they staggered under the unexpected shock a fire was opened upon their front by another rallied line, and breaking ranks, they fled pell-mell across the fields to cover.

Thus piece by piece our shattered first line was picked up and reunited. The rebel attack was checked, and a large portion of the lost ground recovered. On the left Neafie, now commanding the Third Brigade, made a second charge nearly up to his original position, while on the right Molineux pushed a line to within two hundred yards of the isolated wood which Birge had carried and lost. And now came into action the famous First Division of the Nineteenth Corps—a division that had never been put to shame on any field of battle, the division that under Weitzel had triumphed at Camp Bisland and Port Hudson, that under Emory had prevented defeat at Sabine Cross Roads and Pleasant Hill. From this moment my story of the battle will become to some extent a record of personal observation.

We of the First Division were already out of the defile, and drawn up in two columns behind Grover, when the failure of his attack became evident. The difficulty was, not that we were not in hand, but that, as we had only two brigades present (the Third having been left at Halltown); we were hardly strong enough to face the enemy's left, which far outreached our right, and at the same time make head against the vehement attack which threatened our centre. It had been intended that we should remain in reserve until the time came for us to join the Eighth Corps, in the grand turning movement of the day. Now we must fill up gaps, run from one imperiled point to another, and, in short, be used as the urgency of circumstances required.

Lying in a hollow across which the rebel shell screamed harmlessly, I saw our First Brigade disappear over the crest of the hill in our front. Then we of the Second Brigade moved in column to the right, and halted on a lofty slope, where we could discover some parts of the field of battle, and where the earth was occasionally furrowed by the shot of hostile artillery. Far away to the left I saw a part of the Sixth Corps mount an acclivity and charge into a wood on its summit from which the smoke of musketry issued. I distinguished their distant cheer, and rejoiced in their gallantry and triumph. We knew nothing all this while of the disaster which had occurred in our front, and did not doubt that we should have our customary success. Presently we advanced into the wood, on the extreme verge of which Grover's men were rallying and resuming the conflict. We did not see them, but we plainly heard the incessant rattle of their musketry, and, not knowing the rolling nature of the ground, wondered that the bullets did not hum more frequently through our ranks. Soon we turned to the right again, and emerged into an opening from which we obtained our first clear view of the fighting. Nearly a quarter of a mile in advance of us we saw our First Brigade in line behind a rail-fence, the men kneeling or lying down and keeping up a violent file-firing. Two hundred yards beyond them was the wood which Early had retaken from Birge, a smoke of rebel musketry now rising from it, although not a rebel was visible. As we looked our men rose up, formed, faced about and came slowly toward us, the officers running hither and thither to check a momentary confusion in the ranks. The report flew along our line that they were ordered back to the fence where we stood, and that we were to relieve them; but while we watched the unaccomplished movement two of our four regiments, the Twelfth Connecticut and Eighth Vermont, were faced to the left and hurried back through the wood which we had just traversed. The last thing that I saw as I re-entered the covert was the One Hundred and Sixteenth New York facing about with a cheer and charging back to the fence. I afterward learned that the whole brigade followed it; that the line was a second time ordered back, and then again resumed its position. Here it was that the One Hundred and Fourteenth New York offered up its glorious sacrifice of one hundred and eighty-eight men and officers, being three-fifths of the number which it took into battle. After the engagement the position of the brigade was distinguishable by a long, straight line of dead and dying, here and there piled one upon another, the prostrate and bloody ranks telling with matchless eloquence how the American soldier can fight.

While the One Hundred and Sixtieth New York and Forty-seventh Pennsylvania remained to support the First Brigade and share its fatal honors my regiment and the Eighth Vermont moved back to the centre. We were apparently wanted in many places at once. Pressing and contradictory orders repeatedly changed our direction and position. It was, "Forward!" and "About face!" "By the right flank!" and "By the left flank!" "Double quick!" and "Halt!" until our heads were half turned by the confusion. At last we came to the outskirt of the wood, and looked out upon Grover's field of battle. No ranks of enemies were visible athwart those undulating fields, but there were long light lines of smoke from musketry and great piles of smoke from batteries, while the rush and crash of shell tore through the forest. Bradbury was putting two of his pieces in position, and we lay down in their rear to support them. General Emory and General Dwight, mounted and surrounded by staff officers, were a little to the front surveying the position. "My God!" remarked the former as he saw men and horses falling around him, "this is a perfect slaughterhouse. It must be held; it is the key of the position. But tell Captain Bradbury to keep his people covered as much as possible."

Here fell one of the best and bravest gentlemen in the service, the only field-officer present with our regiment, Lieutenant-Colonel Peck. He had just given the command, "Officers rectify the alignment," as we were about to move forward, when a shell burst among us, one piece of it shattering his knee and mortally mangling the arteries. A moment afterward the Eighth and Twelfth were ordered to move into the open, wheel to the right, and relieve a portion of Molineux's brigade, which lay about two hundred yards from the isolated wood. At a double quick we went nearly a quarter of a mile over gently-rolling fields, pulling up occasionally from pure lack of breath, and then hurrying on again, until we flung ourselves on the ground among the Fourteenth New Hampshire and One Hundred and Thirty-first New York. As the enemy were firing low we suffered very little in our advance; but we had not been in position five minutes before we felt how coolly and surely Lee's veterans could aim; for, stretched at full length as we all were, and completely concealed by tall grass, the bullets searched out our covert with fatal certainty. A groan here, a shriek of agony there, a dying convulsion, a plunge of some wounded wretch to the rear, showed from instant to instant how rapidly our men were being disabled. We lay on a gentle, very gentle slope, and aimed upward, so that our fire was probably even more fatal than that of our adversaries, an ascending range being more sure of its mark than a descending one. After a quarter of an hour here (what a Frenchman would call a mauvais quart d'heure), our commander, Captain Clarke, ordered a volley. With the usual cautionary commands from the officers of "Steady men!" "Wait for the word!" "Aim low!" the regiment rose up, closed its ranks, and poured in a splendid crash of musketry, dropping immediately that it was delivered. For a few minutes our antagonists were silenced. Perhaps we had slaughtered them; perhaps the venomous flight of hissing Miniés had frightened them into taking cover; perhaps they simply saved their powder because they supposed that we were about to charge. But presently the steady file-firing was resumed. On each side the men fired low, fired slowly, fired calmly, knowing full well the hostile position, although able to discover no hostile sign except the light opposing line of musketry smoke. For two or more hours this tranquil, changeless, mortal contest continued. For two or more hours the bullets whizzed through the grass which scarcely concealed us, striking into our prostrate ranks so frequently that every one occasionally searched the branches of the trees in our front to discover the forms of hostile sharpshooters. It seemed impossible that they could strike so many of us, and yet not see us. Of the seventy men and officers whom our regiment lost during the day, at least sixty must have been hit on this line. But the enemy fired much more rapidly and continuously than we did. The word was repeatedly passed along our ranks to spare the cartridges, for we were a long way from our supports, or from any chance of replenishing ammunition, and it was necessary to save shots enough to repulse the rebels in case they should charge us with the bayonet. "Fire down to ten cartridges a piece, and then stop," was the order of our commander.

A curious change came over our men during this long trial. At first they were grave and anxious, but this passed away as they became accustomed to the position; at the last they laughed, jested, and recklessly exposed themselves. Corporal Gray, of Company C, dashed to the front, and with his shelter-tent beat out a flame which was kindling in the autumn grass, returning unhurt out of a frightful peril. "Here's one for Corporal Gray!" shouted several men, leaping up and pulling trigger. Then followed, "Here's one for Sheridan!" and "Here's one for Lincoln!" and "Here's one for M'Clellan, who'll pay us off in gold!" and "Here's one for Jeff Davis!" until the grim joke was played out for lack of cartridges.

All this time our dead and wounded lay among us, with the exception of a few of the latter who crawled a little to the rear, and found shelter in a ditch. Among us, too, were the dead and wounded of the regiments which we had relieved; and the ground in front of us was strewn with other sufferers who had fallen there when Birge met his reverse. The position of these last was horrible; the musketry of both sides passed over them in a constant stream; the balls of friend and foe added to their agony, or closed it in death. One of our men, Private Brown, of Company C, was mortally wounded while giving a drink of water to an officer of an Iowa regiment who lay within ten paces of us, pierced by three bullets. We could not carry away these children of suffering, not even our own, until the battle should be over. It was forbidden by orders; it was contrary to the regulations of the United States Army; it would have been simply an act of well-meant folly and cruelty. We could not spare the men who would surely be killed or wounded in the attempt; or who, reaching the shelter of the rear with their dangerous burdens, would not find their way back again.

I have been thus minute in describing this experience of our regiment in close line-fighting, because it was a picture of what passed in every part of the field during the central period of the battle. Along the entire front each side clung to its own positions, too exhausted or too cautious to advance, and too obstinate to recede. The duty of the Sixth and Nineteenth Corps now was to hold the enemy desperately occupied until the Eighth Corps could execute the turning movement with which Sheridan meant to decide the combat.

At three o'clock the hour of defeat for Early struck. To our right, where precisely I could not see because of the rolling nature of the ground, but in the direction of the spot where our First Brigade was forming those prostrate and bloody ranks which I have previously mentioned, we heard a mighty battle-yell, which never ceased for ten minutes, telling us that Crook and his men were advancing. To meet this yell there arose from the farthest sweep of the isolated wood, where it rounded away toward the rebel rear, the most terrific, continuous wail of musketry that I ever heard. It was not a volley, nor a succession of volleys, but an uninterrupted explosion without a single break or tremor. As I listened to it I despaired of the success of the attack, for it did not seem to me possible that any troops could endure such a fire. The captain of our right company, who was so placed that he could see the advance, afterward described it to me as magnificent in its steadiness; the division which accomplished it moving across the open fields in a single line without visible supports, the ranks kept well dressed, in spite of the stream of dead and wounded which dropped to the rear, the pace being the ordinary quick-step, and the men firing at will, but coolly and rarely.

At this moment our whole army assumed the offensive. Looking back I saw General Emory's reserves emerging from the wood in our rear. And now occurred one of those happy dashes, almost spontaneous in their character, which so frequently aid in deciding a battle. At the first yell of Crook's charge our men reopened fire violently, exhausting their ammunition in five minutes; and then Colonel Thomas, of the Eighth Vermont, regardless of unloaded muskets and empty cartridge-boxes, led on his command at a double quick with the bayonet. General officers and staff officers, misunderstanding the orders of General Emory, which were to advance, came up at a gallop, telling us that we were to be relieved by the One Hundred and Sixtieth New York, warning us to wait for our supports, and shouting, "Halt! Lie down!" But it was impossible to check the crowd of yelling, running madmen; a few would hesitate, and stare around at their advancing comrades, then they would dash on with renewed speed to make up the lost distance. While the regiment thus wavered between discipline and impulse, a mounted officer belonging, as I afterward heard, to Sheridan's staff—a florid, dashing young fellow, in a gayly-embroidered blue shirt, with trowsers tucked into his long boots—galloped in front of us from the direction of the Eighth Corps, and pointed to the wood with his drawn sabre. It was the most chivalrous, the most picturesque equestrianism of battle that I ever saw. It was as fine as a painting of Horace Vernet or of Wouvermans. As a contrasting picture, let me introduce an infantry officer whom I noticed at the same moment, running breathless, twenty feet in advance of the line, his blanket-roll over his shoulders, and his sword sheathed, but waving his men forward with a large brier-wood pipe, for he was smoking when the charge was ordered. From the instant that that American St. George in the embroidered shirt appeared all hope of stopping us vanished. The men sprang out with a yell like wild beasts, and the wood was carried on a full run, while the rebels rushed out of it at the top of their speed, many of them throwing away their guns and accoutrements. As we came in from one side Crook's troops entered from another, the two commands converging, and for a moment mingling together in the tumultuous triumph.

Thus passed the crisis of the battle. Early had used up at least two divisions of infantry in retaking and endeavoring to hold this wood, which was so essential to him; firstly, as covering his centre, and secondly, as being his most favorable base whence to launch an attack against our course of retreat, the Berryville and Winchester Pike. The slaughter in and around the grove proved the importance which each party attached to the possession of it. Looking down the gentle slopes over which our troops had advanced, retreated, and again advanced, we saw piles and lines of dead and wounded which could hardly be estimated at less than fifteen hundred men. In the wood lay the slaughtered skirmishers of Birge's brigade, mingled with the dead and severely wounded of the rebels, who also dotted the fields beyond. I noticed that most of our slain here had been stripped of their clothing, probably to cover the backs of Early's ragged soldiers. Colonel Thomas observed one of our officers propped against a tree with a wounded rebel on each side of him.

"Courage, my friend," said he. "We will take care of you soon; but first we want to finish the enemy."

The sufferer waved his hand feebly, and answered in a low voice, "Colonel, you are doing it gloriously."

Thomas started, for he now recognized in this mortally wounded man his old companion in arms, the brave Lieutenant-Colonel Babcock, of the Seventy-fifth New York, formerly of our brigade.

"Don't trouble yourself about me now," said Babcock. "But when you have done your fighting, will you spare me a couple of men to carry me away?"

Thomas promised, and followed his regiment. Colonel Babcock's watch and money had been taken by a rebel officer, probably with the intention of preserving them for him; but he had also been plundered in cruel earnest by the soldiers, who roughly dragged off his boots although one of his thighs was shattered by a musket-ball.

The Eighth Corps now moved against the heights, where Early made his final stand. The Eighth Vermont and One Hundred and Sixtieth New York, in conjunction with Upton's men of the Sixth Corps, followed the troops who had been forced out of the wood, and, flanking them with a heavy enfilading fire, drove them successively from a rail-fence and a stone-wall, where they attempted to rally. Lieutenant-Colonel Van Petten, of the One Hundred and Sixtieth, already had a bullet through the thigh, but refused to give up the command of his regiment until the fighting was over. As he led off at the head of it General Emory said to him, "Colonel, you are going into a hot fire; you had better dismount."

"Can't walk, Sir," replied Van Petten, pointing to his bandaged thigh, and rode onward.

Our regiment halted in the grove, and waited for ammunition. Twice it wheeled into column of companies to give passage to Birge's and Molineux's brigades of Grover's Division, which were now pushed up as supports to the general advance. I could not see that these commands bore any trace of the repulse of the morning; the ranks moved steadily, and the air of the men was composed and resolute. It must be observed, however, that up to this time I did not know that our line had suffered any disaster. They had just passed when a mounted officer, followed by a single orderly, galloped up to us. As he reined in his horse a rebel shell, one of the many which were now tearing through the wood, burst within a few feet of him, actually seeming to crown his head with its deadly halo of smoke and humming fragments.

"That's all right, boys," he said, with a careless laugh. "No matter; we can lick them."

The men laughed; then a whisper ran along the ranks that it was Sheridan; then they burst into a spontaneous cheer.

"What regiment is this?" he asked, and dashed off toward the firing.

Presently we advanced, in support of a battery of artillery, over high ground lately occupied by Early's centre. Our close fighting was over, and for the rest of the day we were spectators. At the distance of half a mile from us, too far away to distinguish the heroism of individuals, but near enough to observe all the grand movements and results, the last scene of the victorious drama was acted out. Crook's column carried the heights and the fort which crowned them. We could see the long, dark lines moving up the stony slopes; we could see and hear the smoke and clatter of musketry on the deadly summit; then we could hear our comrades' cheer of victory. Early's battle was rapidly reduced to a simple struggle to save himself from utter rout. His mounted force had been beaten as usual by Averill, Torbert, and Custer. His infantry, dreadfully weakened by killed, wounded, prisoners, and stragglers, was retreating in confusion, presenting no reliable line of resistance. And now, just in the nick of time, our cavalry formed its connection with the extreme right of our infantry, so that Sheridan was able to use it promptly to complete his victory. I saw a brigade of these gallant troopers gallop in a long, straight line along the crest of the hill, rush upon Early's rear, and break up and sweep away his disorganized regiments as easily, to all appearance, as a billow tosses its light burden of sea-weed. Seven hundred prisoners and two guns were the results of this well-timed and brilliant onslaught. It was, I believe, the most effective cavalry charge that has been delivered during the war; and it was certainly one of the most spirit-stirring and magnificent spectacles conceivable.

The victory was now won, and our infantry quietly bivouacked two miles beyond the field of battle, while the cavalry pushed on picking up materiel and prisoners.

The fruits of the battle, gathered on the spot or during the pursuit of the next day, were five cannon, fifteen flags, six or seven thousand small arms, and three thousand prisoners, besides two thousand wounded who were left on the field, or in the town of Winchester, or on the road between there and Strasburg. The entire loss of the enemy in killed, wounded, and prisoners, and in stragglers who did not again rejoin him, could not have been less than seven thousand men. But the results of this bloody and successful combat did not stop here. It thoroughly demoralized Early's remaining troops, thus rendering possible, indeed rendering easy, the extraordinary victory of Strasburg, which was but the sequel, the moral consequence, of that of Winchester.

Of the loss of our own army I can not speak with certainty for lack of official information. But the heaviest slaughter must have fallen, I think, upon the Nineteenth Corps, which had nineteen hundred and forty killed and wounded, besides losing some prisoners, most of whom, however, were recaptured.

It was the first battle of our corps in Virginia; and I must say that Lee's veterans somewhat disappointed us. They made desperate fighting, but not more desperate than we had been accustomed to see. They were neither better nor worse soldiers than the Texans, Louisianians, Arkansans, and Alabamians, whom we had met, and had beaten too, in the Department of the Gulf.

NORA AND I.

"We were two daughters of one race;
But she was fairest in the face."

THERE were only two of us—Nora and I. Our father had been dead five years, and we had been living all that time with our mother, on the farm—in the house which had been our home ever since we could remember. But life there had been such a different thing when father was alive. He was a lawyer, and, as country lawyers go, a successful one. Of course his profession, and not the farm, had supported us. When he was first married he had come to Eastbrook after having seen an advertisement of the farm for sale in the county paper. He had money enough to buy and stock it, to furnish his house prettily and substantially, and to live on, afterward, until he could get established in his profession. So the only question was whether they both liked it—he and my mother—for he had meant from the first to settle in the country, and he could practice law in Eastbrook as well as elsewhere.

He brought his bride with him to look at the place, and I like to think about them both, so young and so happy, walking together in that sunshine of youth and love, over the grounds which have always been my home—over the hill rising to the west, with the pine-grove on its summit—the pleasant meadow-lands at the eastward, sloping down to the green and white New England village lying below—the farm-lands stretching out northward, at the back of the house—and at the south, across the road, the pretty, pastoral landscape, which did not belong to us, but was none the less pleasant to our eyes.

They both liked it. Father was unconsciously the master-spirit, and whatever pleased him was pretty sure to find favor with mother, though he really thought that he always gave her her own way. But, indeed, the place was pretty enough to please any one—was, and is still. Of course there are grander scenes, more elegant grounds, statelier houses; but I think I have never seen a prettier or sunnier spot, or one more emphatically worthy of the name my mother gave it—"Home-nook." There they set up their household gods; and there, as time went on, in their own quiet way they prospered. Father did a good law-business, but neither from farm nor profession did he ever lay up much money. He had scholarly tastes. He loved art in a time when art was not fashionable; and he bought, now and then, a choice picture. He loved books; and he wanted his Coleridge, his Shelley, his gentle Elia, his genial Sir Walter, and the rest of his favorites, fitly clad. To a man not over rich, pictures, carved book-cases, and Russia-leather bindings are expensive luxuries. Yet they paid him good interest, I think, in actual enjoyment; for is not what we do and what we enjoy the sum of our living?

Then we came—I first, and two years afterward Nora; and as soon as we were old enough we must be educated. When we were through school, father said, he would begin to lay up money and make provision for old age; but in the mean while we must be well taught. So, when we were old enough, he sent us to the best schools. I liked study, and progressed rapidly enough in all solid acquirements. But Nora was the family genius. She learned music and drawing almost by instinct. Of course such gifts must be cultivated, and my father spent all the money he could spare to procure her the best masters. He felt paid when she returned to him at eighteen.

I had been at home for a year before, and had fallen into the habit of relieving my mother, who was growing delicate, of much of the household care. I was the good, solid, practical daughter of the house. My name, Martha, bestowed on me in remembrance of my maternal grandmother, seemed to have been prophetic. I was not beautiful, or showy, or fascinating; though they loved me well at home, and, I believe, saw no lack in me. I had arranged every thing in honor of Nora's coming. I meant her arrival should be a little festival. How richly her thanks repaid me! In my life I have never seen any thing more lovely than my sister Nora was that night. I wish some artist could have painted her, and made that loveliness immortal. No matter; for me it will live always. When I close my eyes I can see her as she was then, with the bloom on her cheeks, the chestnut hair waving in soft richness about the bright young face, the dark eyes so full of soul, the straight, delicate features, and the short, round chin with its pretty dimple. The best of all was her perfect unconsciousness of her attractions. I do not believe she had ever thought that she was handsomer than I. There was not one particle of vanity about her. She had no longing for a wider theatre in which to display her charms. She could not have been more bewitching in a ball-room than she was in our little home-circle. How well I remember the fond pride with which my father's eyes followed her! How he listened to her singing! how he watched her motions! how he rejoiced over her—as well he might—as over a pearl of great price! That night, I remember, he said, cheerfully,

"Now, girls, I have you both educated to my mind. Heaven has surely prospered me. Here is your mother, still by my side, as fair and as loving as when I brought her here first, twenty-three years ago. I have this sunny, happy home; my books and pictures; and you my two daughters, so dear and so different, cultivated so to my mind that, with you for companions, I shall envy no man his society. I ought to be contented, for I seem to have nothing left to wish for. Now I am going to turn economist. I shall be fifty next year; and I must provide in advance, for your sakes, against the time when I shall be too old to work."

Thus he talked, with my mother sitting on one side of him, myself on the other, and Nora on a stool at his feet, looking up at him with those tender brown eyes, and that face bright with youth and hope. It was long before I saw it so bright again.

It was in the gray of the early dawning that something—no noise, but a vague impression of sorrow and terror—awoke me, where I lay with my arm round Nora. My mother stood in the door of our chamber, with a lamp in her hand, her face as white as the white robe she wore. Nora had awaked too, and we both looked at her in wordless apprehension.

"Girls," she said, in a voice so calm that its very stillness was unutterably frightful—"Girls, I think your father is dead."

Oh, Heaven! what a shriek that was of Nora's! I seem to hear it yet. My mother, as one whom death had frozen, looked at her silently, standing there, lamp in hand, waiting for us. We got up, both of us, and went with her.

"I woke," she whispered, as we crossed the hall, in tones as low as if she still feared to disturb him—"I woke, and oh, he was so cold!"

We went into the room, and up to the bed. The lamplight flared across his set face. I felt at once that there was no hope. Yet we must try. I called to the girl, who slept in the attic, to come down and build a fire. Then I hurried on some clothes, and in five minutes more I had run down to the village and was knocking on Dr. Greene's door.

"Who is it?" he asked, with head out of the window.

"It is I, Sir, Martha Thompson; and we fear my father is dead."

I think it was not more than two minutes before he joined me; and I hurried him frantically up to the house. The fire was burning brightly now, and more lamps were lit; but they shone upon a pale, dead face, and two women as still, almost as pale, as the form by which they sat so silently. Dr. Greene bent for a few moments over the bed, touched the cold hands, the pulseless breast, the rigid limbs. Then he turned to us with pitying eyes.

"There is nothing I can do," he said. "I think he must have been dead for two hours or more. It was heart disease, probably."

We had all known and felt from the first that there was no hope, yet the assurance from Dr. Greene's lips seemed to bring us a new pang. Only the night before and he had been so happy, looking forward so hopefully into the future, planning for the coming years, and rejoicing over the blessings with which he was surrounded. Now he was gone from us. We should never more hear his kindly voice or meet his approving smiles. Three lonely, sorrow-stricken women, we must go on, without our stay, our guide, our strong arm of defense. Did he know it? Was his soul standing by and looking at us with heavenly pity? Did he know it when, after Dr. Greene was gone, my mother crept close to him, and laid her head down on that broad, loving breast, which had been her rest and her shelter for so many years? Its icy coldness had no terror for her. "Oh, Mark! Mark!" we heard her cry; and then we stole out of the room, Nora and I, and left her alone with him. Her right there was nearer and more sacred than ours.

As we stood in the next room, clinging to each other like two children, the September morning rose; the sun broke through the autumn haze, and bathed fields and trees, still glittering with the heavy dew, in prismatic splendor. Yesterday he had rejoiced in the glory of just such a morning, and called me to look at it with him. Now—I turned away from the scene, choking with sudden tears. Should I ever be able to look again on any fair and pleasant sight without remembering him and quivering to the old pain, as a reed bent by the wind?

I must not linger over those days when the house was so deathly still—and he lay in the darkened room waiting for his burial. I have not strength even now to speak of them. My mother sat beside him to the last. While he was there we could not persuade her to leave him. She would wet his forehead, brush back his hair, or arrange some fold of the drapery, as if it were a mournful satisfaction to feel herself still of use to him. Sometimes, when she was alone with him, we heard her talking to him as if he could hear her still. Her low voice would steal out to us from the darkness, and holding each other close we would weep to hear her call him her love, her darling, and tell him how good and tender he had been to her all the years of their life—saying thus to the dead those last words fate had not given her time to utter to the living.

At last he was buried. We thought then that mother would break down utterly. She went alone to her own room when we came back from his grave—the room she had shared with him so many happy years. She would not let either of us go with her. We sat alone all through the twilight mingling our sorrow for our great loss with our anxiety about her. She had been so delicate of late—it had taken so little to exhaust her. Then her nature was so clinging and dependent—how could she bear this great blow? Would she not be stricken by it to the earth? At last we lit the lamps and tried to make the room cheerful. We heard Nancy getting tea out in the kitchen. Soon she would bring it in. I thought that I would call my mother. It could do no harm. So I went out into the entry; but I met her on the stairs.

"I was coming down, Matty," she said, gently. "I did not mean to leave my children alone."

When she came into the sitting-room, and the lamplight shone upon her face, it seemed to me like the face of one who had been holding communion with Heaven. A strange, glorified look it wore, more exalted than sorrow, purer and brighter than joy. Just then tea came in, and she sat down with us to the table and tried to be cheerful. We all drank some tea, and made a pretense of eating; then we sent the things away, and gathered round the fire—we three, so sorrowful and bereft, and so united in our woe. Mother was the first to speak.

"We have got to begin a new life, girls," she said, trying to keep her voice steady. "Your father has always taken such care of us that we have not known hitherto any of the sorrows or privations of life. But he is gone now, and we must learn to depend on ourselves. There is very little property besides the farm. When your educations were finished we meant to have laid up something; but it has been expensive living hitherto:"—this with a deprecating air, as if she feared we might possibly blame him. Then with a pitiful sort of smile—"If my two girls now were two boys, they could carry on the farm and perhaps make a nice living from it. As it is, I see no way but to let out the land on shares, and live as well as we can on the part we receive. Of course Nancy must go: we must be our own servants now, and we must do our best to bear little privations cheerfully."

She was right, of course. We began at once to follow her plans. Contrary to our expectations she did not give way. She seemed determined to live for our sakes. What she suffered in the long nights, during which she would never let either of us bear her company, we could not know; but through the daytimes she was cheerful, and bore every little inconvenience and deprivation with a fortitude that would have shamed us if we had ever been tempted to complain.

That was the beginning; and after that five years went on—five years of experimenting on the capacities of a very little money to make three full-grown human beings comfortable. There would be something ludicrous, if it were not pathetic, in the very memory of those years. Our income was barely enough to keep us warmed and fed. When things wore out we had no money with which to renew them. We darned our table-cloths carefully, and when china broke we stuck the pieces together with white cement and tender care. We turned our dresses, and made them over; and after a year's wear turned them back, and made them over again.

At last it seemed as if five years had brought things to a crisis—as if some new resource must be discovered, or, indeed, we could keep up appearances no longer. We said so to each other one day when the dear mother was up stairs taking her after-dinner nap. It began with Nora's saying that she must have a new dress this winter: she had made over, and made over, to the uttermost limit of possibility.

"And I am twenty-five," I said, "and you are twenty-three, and neither of us ever yet earned a dollar. If I had been John instead of Martha, and you had been James instead of Nora, we should have been nicely in business by this time, and there would have been no lack of comforts at home."

"I wonder," Nora answered, thoughtfully, "why we never have done any thing as it is."

"We have—you know—woman's work. We have kept the house and made our clothes—"

"Made over," she interrupted; "you know there hasn't been any thing to make this many a year. But all this has never brought a dollar into the exchequer. Now I think of it, Mat, I am ashamed. We must go to work."

"Yes, beyond a doubt we must; at least one of us. I have been coming to that conclusion myself. One of us, you know, would have to stay at home and manage affairs here. That, I think, should be you. You have never had much experience of the world's rough paths. Yes, you must be the one to stay at home, and I will go out into the world and seek our fortune."

"Don't make your plans so positively, Mat. I am just as capable of going out into the world as you. I could teach as well—for that is what it comes to—it is all either of us could do for a living. I am not sure that I should be good for as much here. You have always been housekeeper, you know. Still I won't be hard on you—you shall have your chance. We will draw lots, and that will be a fair way to decide it."

"But, Nora, you are so young."

"Twenty-three, Mat. No one but you would think that such a very juvenile epoch," she interrupted.

"And so pretty," I went on. "The fact is, Nora, I don't want to have you go. It will be no such pleasant thing as you seem to imagine for a girl used, as we are, to home love, and home retirement, to make her way among strangers."

"The fact is, Mat, we will, as I said, draw lots. It's the only fair way. Let fate settle it. Then I shall be satisfied, and you can't complain."

As usual she had her way. We drew lots, and it fell to her lot to go. She laughed, with a pretty air of triumph, and asked me if I had any more faith in her wisdom, now fate had indorsed it. She looked so young, and bright, and winsome that I felt more than ever vexed at the idea of letting her go alone into untried paths. But she called me Mother Hubbard, and teased me about being fussy and frumpy, and envying her her chance to see the world, until she made me laugh, and then I had to give up my point.

When mother came down we told her our intentions, or rather Nora did. She remonstrated at first, but Nora brought out what she called her best gown, and exhibited its deficiencies at seams and elbows in such a moving way that by-and-by mother was won over to her views, and admitted that, since old things would not last forever, and there was no money to buy new ones, she did not see what other course there was than to try and earn some. We all sat for a few moments after this conclusion in the grave silence of a Quaker meeting; each of us, I suppose, ruminating about ways and means. At last mother said, rather disconsolately,

"I don't see how you are going to make a beginning. You have no influential friends. How are you to get a situation if you are ever so willing to take it?"

"I am going to make a beginning to-day," Nora answered, nothing daunted, "by going over to Squire Roscoe's."

We listened, mother and I, in profoundest wonder. Squire Roscoe was the great man of the town. No one knew how rich he was—we imagined it to be a sum past computation. In my father's day, however, he had come to see us not infrequently. He was a man past forty, and I suppose my sister and I had always seemed to him like children. He could remember us in our days of pantalets and pinafores, himself a rich man of business even then. He had never married, and rumor accounted for this in a dozen different ways. He was considered haughty; still every one gave him credit for being kind-hearted, and he was certainly influential. After all, Nora's plan of consulting him was not so bad.

She went up stairs, and came down presently in her well-preserved black silk, her sole dress for state occasions. She wore a bright-colored, fall-like shawl, and a simple straw-hat, with a black lace veil, through which dark eyes and bright cheeks shone bewitchingly. If she had had unlimited milliner's bills she could have looked no prettier. We watched her proudly, mother and I, as she walked down the path. She was the joy and grace of our lives, and no wonder.

Squire Roscoe's great, stately house was quite the other side of the village from ours. It also stood upon a hill, overlooking the village between us. It was built of gray stone, with a tower and high-arched windows—a gem of architectural beauty. It might have had a somewhat sombre effect, perhaps, but for the brilliant autumn flowers with which the lawn was gay. Nora was cool enough to pause and admire the vivid tints of the geraniums and verbenas as she walked up the avenue. She rang the bell, and inquired for Mr. Roscoe with as much self-possession as if her visit were a matter of everyday occurrence.

Fortunately he was at home, and she had not long to wait. He entered with interest into all her plans; and when they had discussed matters thoroughly, and she started to go, he walked back with her through the village to Home-nook. He came into the sitting-room, with the cordial air of an old friend, without making any apologies for the length of time since he had been there before.

"I have been telling Miss Nora," he said, addressing mother, "that it seems to me quite unnecessary for her to leave home. We are to have a new teacher in the academy next term, and there is a prospect of a number of new pupils; so many, in fact, that an assistant will be needed, and I undertook, several weeks since, to procure one. I had not as yet been able to suit myself, and I have offered the situation to her. The pay is not large, but a small salary at home may be better than a larger one away. She thinks she will accept the post. I have also a proposition to make to you. The new preceptor is a connection of my own, and has commissioned me to procure him a boarding-place. I thought you might possibly be willing to take him. He would pay six dollars a week. That is what Mr. Gibson has been paying at the hotel. The new-comer, Mr. Aytoun, much prefers to become an inmate of some private family. I will leave you to consider the matter, and call again to-morrow to ascertain your decision."

After he was gone we discussed it pro and con. Mother was the con, and both of us girls were decidedly pro. We thought it would be pleasant. It would enable us to have a servant again—it would help us in so many ways. We should scarcely feel the difference in providing, so much of our living came from the farm. We brought mother round to our way of thinking after a while, and the next day when Squire Roscoe called we made the bargain.

There were only a few days in which to get ready. Next week the term would begin—Mr. Aytoun would make his appearance—Nora would commence her new work. She was in a flutter of excitement. She had never been more charming, however. She made light of all difficulties and discouragements, and displayed a capacity to make old things look new quite beyond belief. Squire Roscoe seemed to take a real interest in our arrangements, for he came over almost every day. He got to be on such friendly and familiar footing that we did not mind when he caught us darning, and we even asked him to stay to tea, which he did, and moreover seemed to enjoy it. We began to like him very much, all of us. He was so thoroughly good and sensible, so truly a gentleman. To be sure he was no longer young. At twenty-five, perhaps, I was not youthful enough to have a right to consider a man of forty-two as altogether beyond the hopes and ambitions of youth—but I confess he did seem so to me. There was something, I thought, really paternal in his bland manner; and I admired the condescension with which he listened to and answered Nora's gay sallies, while I wondered at her audacity in talking to him so familiarly.

Punctually with the appointed day came Mr. Ralph Aytoun, the new teacher. As Squire Roscoe was an old friend of his we had invited him to accompany our new inmate and help us to make his acquaintance. I remember well the contrast between the two men as they sat that evening in our little parlor. Mr. Aytoun was about twenty-six, perhaps; of medium height, with form slender but well-knit, and full of muscular fibre and strength. His head was well-set, and cast in a mould of power and grace. He had dark eyes, full of a kindly brightness; clearly-cut features; and a heavy brown beard. He was certainly fine-looking, if not altogether handsome, with a certain bright charm of buoyant life and ambitious youth, which made me think at the moment how well he would suit Nora, and wonder what would be the consequence of his coming to Home-nook.

From him I glanced to Squire Roscoe. I saw a strongly-built man, no longer young, or slender, or particularly graceful; but with a kind, manly face; steadfast, authoritative eyes; a slightly autocratic air—evidently a man of power. I recognized in him the triumph of a resolute will over the difficulties and perplexities of life—over the temptations of his own nature as well. I respected him thoroughly, but he did not seem to me fascinating. When I looked at him his eyes were fixed on Nora, and something in their expression made it occur to me for the first time that it was possible he might not be quite so insensible to her attractions as I thought his forty-two years demanded. “It was very injudicious of you, if you had any such idea, Mr. Roscoe, to bring that young man here by way of contrast,” I said to myself.

Nora was bewitching that evening. Her spirits rose with the evening brightness and the two guests she had to entertain. She sang, she talked, she flashed witty little speeches at Mr. Roscoe, and made us all, even my mother, merry and happy. What a blessing it was, I often thought, that the dear child could be so cheery always! In our darkest hours she had ever been hopeful, and I think her smiling front in gloomy times had done more to keep up heart of grace in us than all other things put together.

At last Squire Roscoe went away; Mr. Aytoun took possession of his own room; and we gathered round the fire, which it was our habit to have kindled for the early September evenings, to talk them over, women fashion. We were all agreed in heartily liking Mr. Aytoun, and thinking he would be a pleasant inmate. Altogether life had begun to look brighter than it had for a long time. Nora’s salary, and the weekly stipend for our boarder, would put us quite in funds. A new merino dress apiece began to come into my calculations, and “yards and yards” of pink and blue ribbons into Nora’s. At last the fire burned out, and mother sent us to bed. The morrow would be Nora’s first school-day, and she must get well rested in advance.

She must have had a natural gift for teaching, or else her natural gift for being agreeable every where stood her in good stead in the school-room, and made all her pupils love her. Quite unused to regular tasks though she was, it did not wear on her in the least. She seemed to grow brighter and more winsome every day. Indeed we were becoming a very cheerful household. For my mother’s life, indeed, no sun could ever rise like the one that set above my father’s grave; but she cherished her sorrow as an angel visitant, whose only outward token was a fonder love, a care more tender for us who were left her. Her quiet, serene face, with its beauty pale and gracious as moonlight, never saddened or reproached us. Mr. Aytoun made himself genial and helpful as a son or brother. Squire Roscoe, either for our sake or our boarder’s, continued to be a frequent visitor, and our long winter evenings, with mother sitting serenely in her corner by the household hearth, the two gentlemen talking, and Nora singing, laughing, jesting, galvanizing us all into new life, passed blithesomely. It was a new experience to me. I took up the broken thread of youth where I had left it, and began to feel like a girl again.

At last came holiday-time. Mr. Aytoun was to stay with us through the two weeks’ vacation, and we planned to have a merry Christmas-eve. We had a veritable pine-tree from the grove on the hill-top, and we adorned it as gayly as we could. It was the first time for years that we had been able to make presents, and we enjoyed the luxury thoroughly. After the tree had been decorated with candles and bonbons it fell to mother’s lot to put on the gifts. We smuggled them in to her by Nancy—our own old Nancy, who had come back to us—and then awaited her summons. After a while she called us. The effect was beautiful. The little parlor was all aglow with warmth and brightness, and in one corner stood the tree, with all its candles lighted and its boughs heavy with promise. Nora looked like a queen, I thought, as she walked in and stood in the bright glow. A wreath of holly, shaped like a coronet, with shining green leaves and bright red berries, crowned her stately head. She wore a crimson skirt, which gave out warm flashes of color where the light struck it, and a black velvet jacket fitting daintily to her slender waist. Of course Squire Roscoe was of our party—he was too much a habitué to be left out on any festive occasion. I saw him look at Nora with undisguised admiration. After a while, when most of the gifts had been distributed, I saw him take from some secret repository a little box, a dainty, sparkling thing of pearl and silver, and hand it to her, under cover of the talking. I felt sure neither mother nor Mr. Aytoun observed the movement—they were occupied with a set of stereoscopic views just then. I watched the by-play. As Nora opened the box something glittered brilliantly, and I saw a burning flush rise to my sister’s cheek. Then I heard Squire Roscoe say, in a low tone,

“If you wear it I shall know what it means?”

Nora held it a moment thoughtfully—then flashed a sudden look at his face, and with a resolved air put on the jewel. It was a ring, a single diamond, glittering in solitary splendor in a quaint setting of black enamel. For an instant Mr. Roscoe’s hand closed over hers with the ring on it; then quietly, as if nothing had happened, he crossed over to the table and began talking about the views.

The evening passed away merrily. We had a Christmas cake and some mulled wine. The presents were duly admired, and there was plenty of mirth and music and friendly warmth. But the time seemed long to me until I was in our own room, with Nora to myself.

"Well?" I said, inquiringly.

She flashed at me the Roscoe diamond.

"What does it mean?" I asked.

"Marriage, I suppose," she said, with composure.

"And you mean to marry Lloyd Roscoe?"

"Why not, if he does me the honor of asking me?"

I thought she was sacrificing herself. I was afflicted with a duty to do. I would be kind, cautious, gentle; but the duty must be done. As a preparatory step I put both arms round her and kissed her. Then I said, trying to be gently reproachful,

"I did not think you could be mercenary, Nora!"

She smiled that beaming, brilliant smile of hers. She always had the sweetest temper in the world.

"So you think, Mat, that I am going to marry Lloyd Roscoe because of the position and the wealth he can give me—that I am bitten with social ambition, and want to see myself reigning in state in the great gray-stone house?"

I blushed for her, or myself, or both, but I did not answer her question. Then she smiled again and kissed me.

"Mat," she said, "you look tired. Let us go to sleep."

I read determination in her eyes, heard it in her tones. I knew I could have no influence just then, and I was tired.

The next afternoon Mr. Aytoun came into the parlor, where I happened to be sitting quite alone. Mother had gone out, and Nora was driving with Mr. Roscoe. I had a duty to do in Ralph Aytoun's behalf also, and now was my time. I felt sure that he had loved Nora, and in my heart I thought that Nora loved him also, only was determined to be mistress of the Roscoe fortune. It was my duty clearly to let him know how things were going. Gently as I could I hinted at Nora's probable destiny. He kept his face turned away from me, so that I could not see its expression. But his voice sounded unnaturally clear and distinct. I thought, as he asked—

"Then you really think she will marry Mr. Roscoe?"

"Yes," I cried, "unless some one has the will and the courage to prevent it."

"But why prevent it?" His tone was provokingly cool. "It seems to me matter of congratulation rather than of despair. I can imagine Miss Nora queening it royally in that old stone palace of his."

"A queen crowned with thorns," I cried, driven to desperation. "You know what Nora is. Can you imagine her happy in a marriage without love?"

"No," very quietly; and then, a moment after, he said, "I hope she will teach with me next term, we get on so well together. If she will wait till spring I shall be through then, and the new preceptor can find himself a new assistant."

So he meant to leave us in the spring. The prospect was not cheerful. I could imagine Home-nook quite a different place without him, and, with Nora gone also, I did not care to picture it. Just then, interrupting my gloomy reverie, Mr. Roscoe's carriage stopped at the gate, and its owner handed my sister out and came in with her. Well he might be proud of her, that creature "of spirit, and fire, and dew," with the gem-like sparkle in her eyes, the vivid tints of cheek and lip. She made him send the carriage away, and kept him for the evening. Soon mother came back. Mr. Aytoun roused himself from his abstraction, for which I, guessing the effort it must have cost him, honored him proportionately, and we were a cheery company. That night, in our own room, Nora flashed the Roscoe diamond in my face again with a saucy, defiant smile.

"Your fetter," I said, a little tartly; for her manner vexed me.

"Yes, my fetter—worn willingly though."

Then she came up to me and laid her head against my shoulder, not laughing now, but with a sweet, serious tenderness heightening the beauty of the face upturned to my own.

"I would not tell you last night, Mat," she whispered, "because I had not told him; but—I love him."

"Love him!" I cried, astounded; "love Lloyd Roscoe!"

"Yes. Is it so strange to you? To me he seems worthy of all love."

"And you are sure—sure it is not the stone-house, or the carriage, or the gold and silver?"

Her eyes were full of strange earnestness, almost reproachful, as she answered me:

"You must not misunderstand me, Mat. All the rest of the world may misjudge me, but not my sister. I love Lloyd Roscoe himself for himself. I honor him beyond any man I have ever known. If he were landless, penniless, I would marry him still. The nineteen years between his age and mine are no bugbear; just as he is he suits me. He would not suit me the less if he were without a dollar; yet wealth is pleasant, and I shall like to be mistress of the stone-house all the same."

I could not after that doubt or mistake her. There was truth in her eyes. I knew that her heart had chosen, and, if the choice seemed strange to me, it was none the less honest and genuine. I kissed her then with a real, heart-some kiss of congratulation; and then I thought how I should miss her, and cried over her as heartily as I had kissed her.

The next day I saw Mr. Aytoun alone a moment, and I snatched it to do my sister justice in his estimation.

"She loves him," I said.

"So I supposed," he answered, imperturbably.

Certainly he bore his disappointment with heroic fortitude.

Nora declared her intention of teaching next term, as she had agreed. Mr. Roscoe remonstrated a little, but when he found she was resolved yielded the point with a good grace. I asked her why she persisted, and she told me she wanted to have time to grow familiar with the thought of her new position; to know her lover better, and understand his tastes and ways more thoroughly. Besides, she wanted her next term's wages to buy a fitting wardrobe; and she would not be married till the white roses blossomed—she meant to wear them in her hair.

So all things went on much as before, save that every evening brought Squire Roscoe with it. Nora was infinitely bewitching and full of variety. She showed her betrothed all sides of her nature. She jested with him, teased him, laughed at him, and now and then sang him some tender song, that made his pulses thrill to a strange, delicious rhythm, or said some sentence to him so low that no one else heard it, or let him gaze through her dark eyes into the depths of her maiden heart. Mother was thoroughly pleased. Just at first, I confess, she had shared my apprehensions; but when she found how real Nora's love was, she was satisfied.

Mr. Aytoun alone seemed changed. At least he withdrew himself a little from our society. He was with us often, and always at such times as lively and pleasant as ever; but he passed a great deal of the time which he used to devote to us alone. He accounted for this by the demands his legal studies made upon him. He was reading law diligently, and hoped to be admitted to the bar in the spring—whether he should practice in Eastbrook or elsewhere being an unsettled question. I accepted this reasonable excuse for his absence—it was true, doubtless—still I could not divest myself of the idea that this reluctance to see my sister and Mr. Roscoe together had something to do with his seclusion.

At last the winter term was out—spring came—Nora and Mr. Aytoun alike hung their shepherd's crooks upon the willows, and abandoned to their own devices the young lambs of the Eastbrook academy. In the month of roses Nora was to become Mrs. Roscoe, and preparations were going on with all diligence. In the mean time Mr. Aytoun passed his legal Rubicon, and was ready to commence practice. One day he asked me to walk out with him. I tied on my hat with a vague foreboding. He could bear his grief no longer in silence, I imagined; at last it must find expression. As we walked along under the trees, odorous with May-time blossoms, he began the subject.

"I have not been insensible to your sympathy for me, Martha. You have been very sorry for me all winter, I know. I have read it every day in those kind eyes of yours. But I want you to tell me what first made you think I loved Nora."

I tried to think, but the chief reason I could call to mind was the inevitable necessity, as it seemed to me, that any one brought within the sphere of Nora's attractions must be subdued by them. He went on, gravely:

"Was it any especial attention to her, or was it loss of appetite, or did I keep you awake nights by restless paces to and fro? Those are the symptoms, are they not?"

I saw he was laughing, and it vexed me.

"As if I could give you a reason," I cried. "Do not women always know things by intuition? I'm sure I can't tell how I knew it—I only know—"

"That Nora is irresistible?" he interrupted me. "To most, perhaps, but not to me. Martha, I never saw one moment in which I wanted to marry your sister Nora."

So I had been wasting my sympathy all winter!

"Why not?" I said, a little sharply; "isn't she lovely and winning? Don't you like her?"

"Yes, but I don't love her. Did it ever occur to you as possible that any one should love you?"

"Not where Nora was," I answered, honestly.

"And yet, Martha, seeing you both, it was you I loved, and not Nora. She might dazzle me, but she never would suit me as you could. She is too high-pitched. I am commonplace, perhaps. At any rate, I understand myself and my own wants. I want you. It is for you to determine whether you can love me. You must decide whether I settle here, in Eastbrook, or go away, never to see any of you again."

I stood still a moment and tried to understand myself. Never until then had the first thought of his loving me crossed my mind. What did I feel for him? Why had I thought it so impossible that Nora should not have chosen him? Did I want him to stay or go? With the thought of not seeing him any more—of never again hearing that cheery voice or meeting those kindly eyes—a strange pang pierced me, a thrust which brought self-knowledge.

"Stay in Eastbrook," I said. "Mother would miss you sadly."

He smiled. I presume it was as much of an admission as he expected.

So we were married on the same day, Nora and I. I do not know which bride was the happier. We were both suited entirely. Our differing destinies were just what they should have been. It suited Nora to reign in her stately mansion, to wear diamonds, and glisten in silken raiment. Those things seemed to belong to her, as the bright tints to a humming-bird. They never detracted one particle from the true womanliness of her nature, or mingled one grain of alloy with the pure gold of her love for her husband.

But it pleased me better to live with Ralph on the farm—just such a quiet life as my father and mother had lived before us. Only Ralph is a more practical man than my father ever was. At fifty his future will not be unprovided for. My mother lives with us. Nora and I, dearly as we love her, are no longer in need of her; and sometimes I think she is getting ready to leave us—to go where he waits whose presence makes her home.

THE SUNBEAM.

A SUNBEAM burst through the clouds in the sky,
 Golden far than the goldenest wine,
 Warm with the fire of the sun's bright eye,
 And it burned in the tangled leaves of the vine,
 And kindled a glow in the clustering grapes,
 Which seemed in their color and perfect shapes
 Like crystal globes of wine.

It fell on the leaves of the open book,
 And flooded the pages I read with gold,
 It lay like a smile on the face of the brook
 Kissing its dimples, then grew more bold
 With the village maid who was crossing there,
 And wove in her tresses of auburn hair
 A web of the richest gold.

Swift as an arrow it sped through the wood;
 The bluebird lifted his azure wing,
 And wherever the golden orchards stood
 There the robin began to chirp and sing;
 And away in the distance it chased the frown
 From the mountain's brow, where it shone like a crown
 On the forehead of a king.

Oh, beautiful sunbeam, haste not away!
 What do you there where the diamond shines,
 Hidden far down from the glory of day
 In the depths of Golconda's glittering mines?
 It is said that your light, imprisoned, lives
 In the fair gems scintillant cells, and gives
 The splendor with which it shines.

I have read in old tales of the buried past
 Of two armies, which met on the battle-plain,
 Roman and Cymric, in numbers vast;
 How they fought till the field was heaped with slain,
 And how all through the day the crimson tide
 Of battle favored the Cymric side,
 Though their dead bestrewed the plain.

Till at length from out of the clouded skies
 A sunbeam darted across the world,
 Blinding the Cymbrian warriors' eyes,
 And backward their conquering hosts were hurled—
 And thus in the record of years is told
 How a sunbeam, back in the days of old,
 Decided the fate of the world.

JANIE THOMPSON'S LOVERS.

SINCE becoming the historian of "Peggoty Plimpton's Choir" I have been the recipient of some half-dozen pleasant notes telling of interest in the good old town of Q—, and complaining that the story broke off too abruptly. One, in the hand of a lady, wishes to know if Henry Foster went to Mildie Faunce's wedding; another asks if Peggoty Plimpton is still living. When I sat down to write of Peggoty's choir there were in my mind two very striking events that had happened in the village, and for the life of me I could not then easily decide which to write of. It finally fell to write of the concert; I will now write of the other.

Mildie Faunce and John Graham were married up in Deacon Faunce's great gabled mansion in the early October sunset. For full four weeks the old house had groaned in spirit at the drubbing and scrubbing it had been compelled to go through. Hardly a speck of good old-fashioned cobweb but had been irreverently swept by the merciless broom from its cozy corner; and soap-suds and soda and whitewash had been so outrageously spirited and dashed and swashed into its very face and eyes that the good old mansion hardly knew itself as the fine mouldy, red and white, begrimed and rusty dignity of so many years. Rachel Watkins, the housekeeper of fifty years' standing, when she heard the day set for the wedding, was seen to sink on the threshold of the kitchen in an attitude of despair, then suddenly to untie her apron, and, binding it around her head, rush wildly to the barrels of soft soap in the wash-house, exclaiming beneath her breath, "Lord a massy, four weeks and no white sand!" The small panes of glass looked like mirrors after the polishing they received at the hands of the housemaids, and blinked merrily in the sunlight as though conscious of the jolly times to come. The old set of India china was dusted off, the tassels of the window-shades untied from their fat little baggy coverings, the furniture rubbed down and waxed, and the hall floor scrubbed till you would have thought a small snow-storm had fallen—so white and glistening it looked. And through all the bustle and preparation Mildie moved quietly and briskly, putting in a word here and there about pet arrangements, and her good old father smiling and approving all, wishing only one wish to make all perfectly happy—that his honored wife was yet alive to see the happy bustle.

Mildie appeared even more truly to hold the palm as "the belle of the Village" on the eventful evening than ever before; and as she stood in the centre of the old back parlor leaning on her husband's stalwart arm, receiving the congratulations of her friends, she really looked like a little fairy. A quiet white muslin dress and gracefully-hanging veil, fastened with white rose-buds, made up all her wedding finery; and I question if it occurred to any in the room that rustle of satin or glitter of jewels were wanting to make more beautiful the effect. It certainly did not to John Graham, who looked down on his young wife with as proud a look as though "he had all the riches of the Indians," as Goody Collins expressed it. For you must know Goody Collins was there. In deference to John's wishes some of the "second stratum" had passed the social barrier, and were shining in the room in all the glory of regularly received invitations. First and foremost among the beauties, blushing deep-red as she grasped Mildie's hand, was Janie Thompson, dimpled and sparkling as ever with the gay autumn leaves hanging from her dark hair over her white shoulders, and with her was no less a personage than our old friend Ik Bryson, who could hardly look the bride in the face, his eyes were so fully occupied in admiration of his own companion. And Peggoty Plimpton, too, with her good-humored face, wishing "Mrs. John. Graham" "all the happiness on earth," and whispering in John's ear, as she passed to make room for others, "'twas a right good stroke that carried you into a singing regiment!"

And Mrs. Thompson (except once when she was heard to murmur under her breath, with her eyes fixed on the bride, "Two tucks and no gores") replied nothing but "Yes" to every thing that was said to her till she was asked by Ik Bryson in joke "if it really was her hundredth birthday?" when she suddenly came to her senses and talked like other people. And sitting over in one corner was old Dame Graham, with quiet happiness beaming over every feature, saying to her various well-wishers, "Ah! yes, and I kenned well he was a true lad if he was oftentimes forward a wee bit."

All went smoothly till the first dance, when Henry Foster, to the astonishment of all, asked Janie Thompson to be his partner. Janie colored, and said something simply enough about Ik Bryson, but took his proffered hand.

A moment later Ik looked about the room, and started visibly when he saw his partner standing up with Henry Foster. He walked over to the spot where they stood and asked Janie if this was not his dance.

"Well—yes—but won't the next do, Ik?" faltered the young girl, but rather coquettishly.

"No," said Ik, bluntly.

"Then I'm afraid it will have to," replied Miss Thompson, bridling up.

Ik took his hat, and, bidding the bride good-night, went home; and the party soon after broke up, hardly any one noticing the occurrence. But any one who knew Ik Bryson knew that, though a rough farmer boy, he could feel a slight as keenly as any one, and in his thoughts, as he walked home through the cool October night, was a feeling that prompted him to knock off every mullen-head he met with a smart blow of his stick, muttering "I wish 'twere Foster's head!"

And Janie Thompson, as she laid her head on her pillow, felt she had not done just the right thing by her old fast friend Ik; for Janie, uninfluenced by these upper stratum attentions, was as good and warm-hearted a girl as there was for many a mile around. But the attentions of young Squire Foster she was hardly proof against, for she well knew she would be the envy of her whole set for days after, only for this little occurrence.

But nothing more was heard of the matter, and Q—— settled down into its usual winter quiet. But early in the spring, among the other village gossip, young Foster's attention to Janie Thompson was again a fruitful topic. I think it was started about the time of John Graham's "barn-raising."

The Deacon had given John a fine plot of ground down near the Falls, and he had at once broken ground for his new home. His house, snug and pretty, was nearly completed, and his barn was only awaiting the kind strength of his neighbors to assume its upright form. A "barn-raising" in Q—— was quite a little circumstance. When a frame for a new building was all ready to join together the neighbors were invited one and all to the "raising," and one's own work was always left to help the friend with his new structure. At John Graham's barn-raising the neighbors turned out pretty generally, and after every joint had been fitted, and the usual number of axe-heads knocked off and spoiled, John brought out his great pitchers of cider, loaves of gingerbread, and pail of crackers and cheese.

"What's this tongue-wagging about the Thompson lass and young Foster?" John had asked, as grouped together on the smooth grass they sat eating and drinking.

"I dunno," said old Farmer Bryson; "but Ik says there's no good coming out on it. The gal is flustered by the young man's shining up to her!"

"I like to see folk stick to their own class," broke in Farmer Squires.

"As for that I can't blame the girl," said John, "if Foster is to be trusted; but I haven't a very high opinion of him."

"Oh! it's all wrong, John," said Ik Bryson, coloring a little; "it makes me mad to see such things. Janie don't mean wrong, and Foster is only a-fooling her."

"I'd speak to him, Ik, then—you like the girl so much—and ask him what he means."

"I couldn't trust my tongue, I'm afeard," replied Ik; "but if he comes in my way I think myself there'll be a breeze."

Nothing more about it was said; but that same afternoon Ik Bryson sauntering slowly down the road, when near the gate of Mrs. Thompson's house, to his astonishment who should he see coming out but Henry Foster!

Ik stopped short, and Harry as he passed bowed good-naturedly.

"A fine afternoon, Bryson," and passed on.

"Very," muttered Ik, and stood still, looking after him.

Suddenly he seemed struck with a sudden impulse, and followed him.

"Mr. Foster, are you in a hurry?" called Ik.

Henry Foster turned, and replied he was not.

"Then let's have a word or two," said Ik, and quite firmly too. "I want to ask a little about the girl in yonder house. Do you think you like her as well as I do?"

"I shouldn't wonder," said Harry, smiling.

"Then, do you think you like her as truly as I do?" continued Ik, looking him straight in the face.

"How do you mean, Bryson?" said Foster.

"I mean, do you like her more than any other person under the heavens, as I do? Would you marry her?"

Foster hesitated and looked down the road.

"Come, Mr. Foster, I want an answer from you about this here. I don't believe you or any other man can plow two furrows at the same time and with different teams. Your sweetheart is not here, if report don't lie, and mine is."

"Well, Ik, don't worry yourself. I don't mean to marry the girl, but I do like to see her once in a while."

Bryson's teeth came together tightly.

"Yes; and, Mr. Foster, by those same words," said he, "you are doing what no gentleman should do. You care little for her, but you don't know how she may feel. You know as well as I do what power that glib tongue of yours has."

Henry Foster felt the blood tingling at his finger tips, but he kept his temper down. He well knew that Ik Bryson could hoe as true a row, or plow as firm a furrow, or break as wild a colt, or knock a man down as easily as any boy in the village, and that there on the roadway, with but six feet of space between them, it behooved him to be careful what words he said.

"Well, Bryson, you must know this is very strange of you. I certainly can go where I will without consulting you."

"So you can, Mr. Foster, and do right. Into that there house and do wrong you can't. I mean to marry Janie Thompson."

"Indeed!—with her will or no?"

Ik's answer was slow and very deliberate:

"You know what I mean. Her will is all right, if not spoiled by you, and I don't wish it tried. I tell you now, Mr. Foster, once for all, and I mean it, you and I can't go through that there gate in future both, and I mean to. You understand. Good-night!"

Ik passed on; and Mr. Harry Foster felt sure that his impression was right when that impression told him that he had had altogether the worst of the controversy. But he whistled a bright air as he moved up the road, seemingly dismissing it all from his mind.

It was not very long after this that the village received their pleasant invitations to John Graham's "house-warming." The day he had chosen had broken clear and beautiful, and at evening the moonlight was brilliant as could be wished.

By early twilight the company began to arrive, some in teams, many walking. All our old acquaintances, Emma Sharp, and Jennie Keyes, and Ned Brice, and all came merrily in, a little awed at first to be the guests of Mildie Faunce, but soon assured by the easy welcome they received. Henry Foster was there too, and Janie Thompson, and Ik Bryson; and every one seemed bent on enjoying themselves.

The new clock was just nearing the small hours when Mildie was asked to favor them with one of her songs. She readily complied, and her sweet voice was just dwelling on the last words when, suddenly, with the room as still as still could be, all the company were startled by a heavy thunder-clap, that made the windows rattle and seemingly the whole house to shake to its foundations. Those sitting leaped to their feet, and for a moment or two it seemed as though the house itself was struck. Those nearest the door opened it and looked out. The moon in the middle sky just gilded the edge of an inky-black thunder-cloud that was fast filling the heavens, while the lightning ever and anon shot across the dull blackness in quick, pulsating gleams, and the whirl of the wind could be distinctly heard on the neighboring hills. There was a seeming dullness in the air too, that, with the sobbing moan of the distant wind, apparently weighed you down with a consciousness of near catastrophe.

As the cloud covered the moon another deafening crash and lurid flash made all start. Graham and some of the others as quickly as possible put such teams as were exposed under the best cover he had; but it was hardly a moment ere the rain came pouring down in torrents. The company, snug indoors, were rather inclined to joke than otherwise on the change of surroundings, and John was just rallying his wife as to the accommodations the new house afforded in way of beds for weather-beaten guests, when, all of a sudden, as though by common impulse, a quick whisper went around the room, "Where's Janie Thompson?" With the deafening peals sounding outside, the lightning flashing fearfully across the window-panes, while the moaning of the wind filled the hills, such a question was a startling one. Mrs. Graham was seen to leave the room, and soon returned, looking pale.

"Janie is nowhere in the house," said she; "where can she be?"

"And where the devil's Foster?" suddenly exclaimed Ik Bryson. "By Heaven, there's something wrong!"

The guests looked at each other in silence. At this moment a staggering blow sounded on the door, and Henry Foster, with drenched clothes, no hat, and with hair streaming with water, pale, even, as poor Mrs. Thompson, speechless in her chair, reeled into the room. All pressed around him, while he gazed vacantly upon them.

"Stand off, friends," said John Graham, "and give him space to breathe. Where's Janie Thompson, Foster?"

"O God! Graham, don't ask me," he replied, with difficulty, speaking almost in a whisper, and passing his hands hurriedly across his eyes. "The bridge has gone down stream in the roar, and we were 'mong the timbers when the crash came."

"Hush!—not so loud!" said Graham, quickly glancing at Mrs. Thompson. "Mildie, dear, some of you get her up stairs—any where, out of hearing."

With white frightened faces enough some of the women helped poor Mrs. Thompson out of the room. She was quite passive, apparently having lost all consciousness of what was going on.

"Now, for Heaven's sake, tell us all!" broke in Ik Bryson, in a strange, sepulchral voice, while the great drops of sweat stood out on his forehead.

Foster struggled to speak, but the words came with difficulty.

"Janie and I were on the bridge; we were out—her whim for the moonlight—a quick ride—when flash—in our very eyes—and wagon, Prince, timbers, all went out of sight. I grasped her, but lost her, and Prince dragged me out by the reins tangled round me. O God! but—"

"Did you see her or hear her after you lost your grasp?" broke in Ik.

"No—hear! why the river's running mountains!" gasped Foster.

"Lanterns, quick! Come, men, perhaps the dam's choked. Janie's a brave girl, and there may be hope yet. Quick's the word!" and Ik Bryson vanished in the darkness.

Leaving Foster, who, shivering in his wet clothes, seemed entirely unnerved, to the care of some of the women, the men hastily followed. By the time they reached the river bank the black cloud darkened and muttered in the east, and the moon was breaking through the thin after-drift of the storm. The bridge was not all swept away, but what remained threatened every moment to go down in the whirl of waters that, seething, hissing, and foaming, dashed wildly along.

Ik Bryson with straining eyes scanned the whirling mass of water. Suddenly seizing John Graham's arm, so tightly that he almost cringed, and pointing along midway to where the flood leaped the dam, he said, under his breath,

"Look!—right in the very middle. Don't you see something white, John?"

"There's timber caught there, Ik; and I guess it's the white birch you see glistening."

Ik cast his eyes upward.

"One minnit, and we'll have a second of the moon clear."

A few moments, and the moon rode out unclouded.

"By Heaven, it's Janie, sure as I'm a sinner!" cried Ik.

"I think it's her, sure!" said Farmer Squires. "By all that's merciful, men, quick, and let's have as big a fire-pile as wood can make!"

It was not long—for ready hearts and ready hands were now at work—ere a glowing, lurid flame shot up on the river bank. Brush and old boards—any thing that could be found to add to the glow were cast upon the flaming heap, and soon flood and shore glowed alike as light as noonday. And by the first strong vivid glare the men saw how matters stood. It was a fearful sight, indeed, that met their eyes! Out midway in the whirl a huge débris of tree trunks and drift had grounded on the well-known shallow just opposite the centre of the dam; and half sitting on, half clinging to, an immense old stump that had stuck its long roots far down and "jammed," was Janie Thompson.

And, brave girl that she was, as the fire illumined the waste, she untied her white kerchief from her neck, and waved it to them—waved it almost with an air of joy. She had evidently gone down the stream, striking the matted, tangled mass, and, clinging for dear life, had finally found a temporary resting-place. But what a situation! and what a scene! The waters foamed and leaped by her wildly, dashing almost above her head; and just beyond her uncertain hold yawned the deep down abyss, with the awful leap to the rocks below, sending the foam quivering into mid air, and sounding to the ears of those on shore like the mocking thunder of a very hell! And the fire-light reddening each surging murderous wave and the faces of the hurrying helpers, and the dark black swaying woods up above frowning down upon the scene!

"Men, hearken you to what I say," now said John Graham; "the girl can be saved yet, if the river don't rise more and carry over the drift. The tree she's on is stranded heavily. But we must lose no time. Quick some of you to Squires's stake above, and bring his boat down!"

"It went over hours ago, John," said Squires; "the water's a good two foot over the dock."

"Then quick to Foster's barn, and down here with the big skiff. That's the shape, come to think of it."

Several started at the work, when Ik Bryson's ringing voice was heard:

"Stop!—how can you cross that tumbling mass? You forget the bridge is gone!"

What was to be done?

"Is there no boat this side?" asked Graham.

"Not one," said Ik, hurriedly—"we must raft it."

"How would it do to try a floating bridge to her?" asked Deacon Faunce, who, with coat off, was as active as the youngest.

"I fear it's the only way left," answered Graham. "Quick, lads, any thing in the way of plank and rope."

Just below where the bridge had crossed the river took a bend before it reached the dam, and a sharp point of rock ran out into the stream where had once stood a sort of wash-house. From this point (where were heavy bolts sunk in the rock) all with a will set to work.

"Lash firm—and some of you keep the fire bright, and we may reach her yet," said Graham, who seemed the master-spirit of them all. The plan, as my readers probably have seen, was to lash plank to plank down the stream to reach the dam. The undertaking would have been a hazardous one in a smooth, swift stream, but here the great heaving surges made the heavy timber roll as though but the tiniest twigs, and their hearts sunk within them as they saw how fruitless this endeavor was.

"It's no use, boys," said Ik Bryson, standing with drenched clothes looking at the surges, "no one could go down that crazy thing."

"Look out down there! By the gracious God— Poor Janie!" suddenly ejaculated Squires; and borne amidst a seething mass of foam and whirling spray, a giant tree came thundering past them. Lapping over the part of their trembling bridge that extended out into the main course, the fastenings on shore snapped like whip-cord, and bridge and tree went plunging toward the dam. All held their breath in terror. Ik Bryson, with straining eyes, sunk on one knee, holding his clasped hands beseechingly toward the awful object. The women on the bank above wrung their hands or hid their pale faces. Janie saw it coming, and cowering lower, grasped more firmly the poor support she clung to. One long moment—then, as though directed by a merciful Providence, the plunging wreck shot by the stranded drift, and leaping high in air, went thundering down upon the rocks below.

All breathed freer;—but what was now to be done? The fire burned high, and through the curling smoke the early daybreak was now faintly glimmering. The brave girl shifted her position once and a while, at times waving her scarf. It seemed savagely cruel that you could not even make your voice heard over that small intervening space from shore to where she clung, to tell her she should yet be saved. Half-sitting half-clinging there, surrounded by the hissing, seething, hungry waters, death staring her in her face, and yet no help!

Suddenly Ik Bryson strode out before us, and throwing off his outer shirt, said, quite calmly, "Men, I haven't the heart to stand this longer. Something must be done, or she'll go over before our eyes, for I think the stream's rising. Father, choose out the best coil of rope!"

All started.

"Why, Ik, what are you going to do?" anxiously asked old Bryson.

A strange light shone in Ik's eyes as he answered,

"I am going down through the flood to her, father. I want firm hands to pay out, and strong ones to drag back; and you'll need quick eyes. But we haven't a minnit to lose—the river is rising fast!"

They all saw by the expression on his face Ik's mind was made up. But it was as though he was throwing his life away as you looked at the angry river.

"Under my arms, and over the shoulders, and across—that's it," said Ik, firmly. "Heavens! no, not that knot; here—this! I want breath, you know. There, pad the shoulders—'twill help the strain. And now, mark me! Pay out the rope as I go down just so fast, and no faster, or it will swag and carry me under. Follow down shore with me, and if I miss her haul to land for life! If I strike right, and can stay, hold taut and wait my beck, for I'll want breath. If I strike right, and all goes over by my weight, haul then for dear life again. You mark me, boys! Graham, s'pose you head the crowd."

Such were the words Ik Bryson said as he stood with the rope about him calmly looking out at the river's sweep. The day was just breaking. John Graham organized the men who held the rope into proper position, telling them how much depended on them. They did not need such caution.

And then, without any word of farewell or other—for there seemed none needed as each looked his good-by—Ik Bryson walked out to the further edge of the Point, and flung himself far out into the hurrying flood. There was a deep murmur among the throng on shore for a moment, all eyes watching where he sunk. He came up far out amidst the surges, striking out boldly for the middle, well knowing the importance of not missing his object by being carried along near shore. The torrent bore him along resistlessly, hurling him again and again out of sight, and hurrying him swiftly toward the dam. The line of men on shore, with Graham at their head, payed out the long line of rope carefully, and as smoothly as possible. Janie Thompson, from her perilous position, saw the movement, and half-rising half-crouching midst the roar, watched her rescuer intently.

"Careful, careful, for God's sake, boys!" said Graham, in a shrill whisper. "He's gained the middle, and he'll strike right. Heaven grant it! Keep your eyes open, and if the drift goes down with the two—for I think it will, the river's rising so—haul as though your own lives were on it!"

And now on a great curling leap of water Ik was borne straight down upon the stump. And as he struck—one second—and all eyes saw his arms clasp firmly, tightly around Janie; then, with a wild bound, drift and tree and all went out of sight.

"Now, steady, boys!—quick, but steady!" rung out John Graham's voice, in stentorian tones. "Up-stream—up! up!"—and the line of men went up the bank with a rush. Graham was the first at the water's-edge as the brave fellow, with his arms locked tightly around poor Janie Thompson, came through the foam. Strong and tender arms received them. Janie was insensible, but restoratives and thoughtful care revived her. Ik looked about him, putting his hand to his head when they unbound the rope, staring at the cheering crowd most vacantly. But gradually his memory came back, and his first words were, "And is she really safe?" Poor, brave, heroic, half-drowned Ik! Did he not deserve to be told she was!

And so, my readers, this fearful night passed away. A new bridge fills the place where the old one went down, and the green water-moss is beginning to gather on its piers; and Q—River falls with its accustomed deep voice over the same dam, adown upon the sharp rocks far below. But any of the villagers can tell you of the scene as though it was but last night's moon that looked upon it; and the little children point out just the spot where Janie Bryson clung till saved, when she was Janie Thompson.

CHAPTER I.

THE MYSTERY OF OZIAS MIDWINTER.

ON a warm May night, in the year eighteen hundred and fifty-one, the Reverend Decimus Brock—at that time a visitor to the Isle of Man—retired to his bedroom, at Castletown, with a serious personal responsibility in close pursuit of him, and with no distinct idea of the means by which he might relieve himself from the pressure of his present circumstances.

The clergyman had reached that mature period of human life at which a sensible man learns to decline (as often as his temper will let him) all useless conflict with the tyranny of his own troubles. Abandoning any further effort to reach a decision in the emergency that now beset him, Mr. Brock sat down placidly in his shirt-sleeves on the side of his bed, and applied his mind to consider next, whether the emergency itself was as serious as he had hitherto been inclined to think it. Following this new way out of his perplexities, Mr. Brock found himself unexpectedly traveling to the end in view, by the least inspiring of all human journeys—a journey through the past years of his own life.

One by one the events of those years—all connected with the same little group of characters, and all more or less answerable for the anxiety which was now intruding itself between the clergyman and his night's rest—rose, in progressive series, on Mr. Brock's memory. The first of the series took him back through a period of fourteen years, to his own rectory on the Somersetshire shores of the Bristol Channel, and closeted him at a private interview with a lady who had paid him a visit in the character of a total stranger to the parson and the place.

The lady's complexion was fair, the lady's figure was well-preserved; she was still a young woman, and she looked even younger than her age. There was a shade of melancholy in her expression, and an under-tone of suffering in her voice—enough in each case to indicate that she had known trouble, but not enough to obtrude that trouble on the notice of others. She brought with her a fine fair-haired boy of eight years old, whom she presented as her son, and who was sent out of the way at the beginning of the interview to amuse himself in the rectory garden. Her card had preceded her entrance into the study, and had announced her under the name of "Mrs. Armadale." Mr. Brock began to feel interested in her before she had opened her lips; and when the son had been dismissed he waited with some anxiety to hear what the mother had to say to him.

Mrs. Armadale began by informing the rector that she was a widow. Her husband had perished by shipwreck, a short time after their union, on the voyage from Madeira to Lisbon. She had been brought to England after her affliction under her father's protection; and her child—a posthumous son—had been born on the family estate in Norfolk. Her father's death shortly afterward had deprived her of her only surviving parent, and had exposed her to neglect and misconstruction on the part of her remaining relatives (two brothers), which had estranged her from them, she feared, for the rest of her days. For some time past she had lived in the neighboring county of Devonshire, devoting herself to the education of her boy—who had now reached an age at which he required other than his mother's teaching. Leaving out of the question her own unwillingness to part with him in her solitary position, she was especially anxious that he should not be thrown among strangers by being sent to school. Her darling project was to bring him up privately at home, and to keep him, as he advanced in years, from all contact with the temptations and the dangers of the world. With these objects in view her longer sojourn in her own locality (where the services of the resident clergyman in the capacity of tutor were not obtainable) must come to an end. She had made inquiries, had heard of a house that would suit her in Mr. Brock's neighborhood, and had also been told that Mr. Brock himself had formerly been in the habit of taking pupils. Possessed of this information she had ventured to present herself with references that vouched for her respectability, but without a formal introduction; and she had now to ask whether (in the event of her residing in the neighborhood) any terms that could be offered would induce Mr. Brock to open his doors once more to a pupil, and to allow that pupil to be her son.

If Mrs. Armadale had been a woman of no personal attractions, or if Mr. Brock had been provided with an intrenchment to fight behind, in the shape of a wife, it is probable that the widow's journey might have been taken in vain. As things really were, the rector examined the references which were offered to him, and asked time for consideration. When the time had expired he did what Mrs. Armadale wished him to do—he offered his back to the burden, and let the mother load him with the responsibility of the son.

This was the first event of the series, the date of it being the year eighteen hundred and thirty-seven. Mr. Brock's memory, traveling forward toward the present from that point, picked up the second event in its turn, and stopped next at the year eighteen hundred and forty-five.

The fishing village on the Somersetshire coast

was still the scene, and the characters were once again Mrs. Armadale and her son. Through the eight years that had passed Mr. Brock's responsibility had rested on him lightly enough. The boy had given his mother and his tutor but little trouble. He was certainly slow over his books, but more from a constitutional inability to fix his attention on his tasks than from want of capacity to understand them. His temperament, it could not be denied, was heedless to the last degree: he acted recklessly on his first impulses, and rushed blindfold at all his conclusions. On the other hand, it was to be said in his favor that his disposition was open as the day; a more generous, affectionate, sweet-tempered lad it would have been hard to find any where. A certain quaint originality of character, and a natural healthiness in all his tastes, carried him free of most of the dangers to which his mother's system of education inevitably exposed him. He had a thoroughly English love of the sea and of all that belongs to it; and, as he grew in years, there was no luring him away from the water-side, and no keeping him out of the boat-builder's yard. In course of time his mother caught him actually working there, to her infinite annoyance and surprise, as a volunteer. He acknowledged that his whole future ambition was to have a yard of his own, and that his one present object was to learn to build a boat for himself. Wisely foreseeing that such a pursuit as this for his leisure hours was exactly what was wanted to reconcile the lad to a position of isolation from companions of his own rank and age, Mr. Brock prevailed on Mrs. Armadale, with no small difficulty, to let her son have his way. At the period of that second event in the clergyman's life with his pupil, which is now to be related, young Armadale had practiced long enough in the builder's yard to have reached the summit of his wishes, by laying with his own hands the keel of his own boat.

Late on a certain summer day, not long after Allan had completed his sixteenth year, Mr. Brock left his pupil hard at work in the yard, and went to spend the evening with Mrs. Armadale, taking the Times newspaper with him in his hand.

The years that had passed since they had first met had long since regulated the lives of the clergyman and his neighbor. The first advances which Mr. Brock's growing admiration for the widow had led him to make, in the early days of their intercourse, had been met, on her side, by an appeal to his forbearance which had closed his lips for the future. She had satisfied him, at once and forever, that the one place in her heart which he could hope to occupy was the place of a friend. He loved her well enough to take what she would give him: friends they became, and friends they remained from that time forth. No jealous dread of another man's succeeding where he had failed embittered the clergyman's placid relations with the woman whom he loved. Of the few resident gentlemen in the neighborhood none were ever admitted by Mrs. Armadale to more than the merest acquaintance with her. Contentedly self-buried in her country retreat, she was proof against every social attraction that would have tempted other women in her position and at her age. Mr. Brock and his newspaper appearing with monotonous regularity at her tea-table three times a week told her all she knew, or cared to know, of the great outer world which circled round the narrow and changeless limits of her daily life.

On the evening in question Mr. Brock took the arm-chair in which he always sat, accepted the one cup of tea which he always drank, and opened the newspaper which he always read aloud to Mrs. Armadale, who invariably listened to him reclining on the same sofa, with the same sort of needle-work everlastingly in her hand.

"Bless my soul!" cried the rector, with his voice in a new octave, and his eyes fixed in astonishment on the first page of the newspaper.

No such introduction to the evening readings as this had ever happened before in all Mrs. Armadale's experience as a listener. She looked up from the sofa in a flutter of curiosity, and besought her reverend friend to favor her with an explanation.

"I can hardly believe my own eyes," said Mr. Brock. "Here is an advertisement, Mrs. Armadale, addressed to your son."

Without further preface he read the advertisement, as follows:

IF THIS should meet the eye of ALLAN ARMADALE, he is desired to communicate, either personally or by letter, with Messrs. Hammick and Ridge (Lincoln's Inn Fields, London), on business of importance which seriously concerns him. Any one capable of informing Messrs. H. and R. where the person herein advertised can be found, would confer a favor by doing the same. To prevent mistakes, it is further notified that the missing Allan Armadale is a youth aged fifteen years, and that this advertisement is inserted at the instance of his family and friends.

"Another family and other friends," said Mrs. Armadale. "The person whose name appears in that advertisement is not my son."

The tone in which she spoke surprised Mr. Brock. The change in her face when he looked up shocked him. Her delicate complexion had faded away to a dull white; her eyes were averted from her visitor with a strange mixture of confusion and alarm; she looked an older woman than she was by ten good years at least.

"The name is so very uncommon," said Mr. Brock, imagining he had offended her, and trying to excuse himself. "It really seemed impossible there could be two persons—"

"There are two," interposed Mrs. Armadale. "Allan, as you know, is sixteen years old. If you look back at the advertisement you will find the missing person described as being only fifteen. Although he bears the same surname and the same Christian name, he is, I thank God, in no way whatever related to my son. As long as I live it will be the object of my hopes and prayers that Allan may never see him, may never even hear of him. My kind friend, I see I surprise you; will you bear with me if I leave these strange circumstances unexplained? There is past misfortune and misery in my early life too painful for me to speak of even to you. Will you help me to bear the remembrance of it by never referring to this again? Will you do even more—will you promise not to speak of it to Allan, and not to let that newspaper fall in his way?"

Mr. Brock gave the pledge required of him, and considerably left her to herself.

The rector had been too long and too truly attached to Mrs. Armadale to be capable of regarding her with any unworthy distrust. But it would be idle to deny that he felt disappointed by her want of confidence in him, and that he looked inquisitively at the advertisement more than once on his way back to his own house. It was clear enough now that Mrs. Armadale's motive for burying her son as well as herself in the seclusion of a remote country village was not so much to keep him under her own eye as to keep him from discovery by his namesake. Why did she dread the idea of their ever meeting? Was it a dread for herself, or a dread for her son? Mr. Brock's loyal belief in his friend rejected any solution of the difficulty which pointed at some past misconduct of Mrs. Armadale's, and which associated it with those painful remembrances to which she had alluded, or with the estrangement from her brothers which had now kept her parted for years from her relatives and her home. That night he destroyed the advertisement with his own hand; that night he resolved that the subject should never be suffered to enter his mind again. There was another Allan Armadale about the world, a stranger to his pupil's blood, and a vagabond advertised in the public newspapers. So much accident had revealed to him. More, for Mrs. Armadale's sake, he had no wish to discover—and more he would never seek to know.

This was the second in the series of events which dated from the rector's connection with Mrs. Armadale and her son. Mr. Brock's memory, traveling on nearer and nearer to present circumstances, reached the third stage of its journey through the by-gone time, and stopped at the year eighteen hundred and fifty next.

The five years that had passed had made little if any change in Allan's character. He had simply developed (to use his tutor's own expression) from a boy of sixteen to a boy of twenty-one. He was just as easy and open in his disposition as ever; just as quaintly and inveterately good-humored; just as heedless in following his own impulses, lead him where they might. His bias toward the sea had strengthened with his advance to the years of manhood. From building a boat, he had now got on—with two journeymen at work under him—to building a decked vessel of five-and-thirty tons. Mr. Brock had conscientiously tried to divert him to higher aspirations; had taken him to Oxford to see what college life was like; had taken him to London to expand his mind by the spectacle of the great metropolis. The change had diverted Allan, but had not altered him in the least. He was as impenetrably superior to all worldly ambition as Diogenes himself. "Which is best," asked this unconscious philosopher, "to find out the way to be happy for yourself, or to let other people try if they can find it out for you?" From that moment Mr. Brock permitted his pupil's character to grow at its own rate of development, and Allan went on uninterruptedly with the work of his yacht.

Time, which had wrought so little change in the son, had not passed harmless over the mother. Mrs. Armadale's health was breaking fast. As her strength failed her temper altered for the worse: she grew more and more fretful, more and more subject to morbid fears and fancies, more and more reluctant to leave her own room. Since the appearance of the advertisement, five years since, nothing had happened to force her memory back to the painful associations connected with her early life. No word more on the forbidden topic had passed between the rector and herself; no suspicion had ever been raised in Allan's mind of the existence of his namesake; and yet, without the shadow of a reason for any special anxiety, Mrs. Armadale had become of late years obstinately and fretfully uneasy on the subject of her son. At one time she would congratulate herself on the fancy for yacht-building and sailing which kept him happy and occupied under her own eye. At another she spoke with horror of his trusting himself habitually to the treacherous ocean on which her husband had met his death. Now in one way, and now in another, she tried her son's forbearance as she had never tried it in her healthier and happier days. More than once Mr. Brock dreaded a serious disagreement between them; but Allan's natural sweetness of temper, fortified by his love for his mother, carried him triumphantly through all trials. Not a hard word or a harsh look ever escaped him in her presence; he was unchangeably loving and forbearing with her to the very last.

Such were the positions of the son, the mother, and the friend, when the next notable event happened in the lives of the three. On a dreary afternoon, early in the month of November, Mr. Brock was disturbed over the composition of his sermon by a visit from the landlord of the village inn.

After making his introductory apologies the landlord stated the urgent business on which he had come to the rectory clearly enough. A few hours since a young man had been brought to the inn by some farm-laborers in the neighborhood, who had found him wandering about one of their master's fields, in a disordered state of mind, which looked to their eyes like downright madness. The landlord had given the poor creature shelter while he sent for medical help; and the doctor, on seeing him, had pronounced that he was suffering from fever on the brain, and that his removal to the nearest town at which a hospital or a work-house infirmary could be found to receive him would, in all probability, be fatal to his chances of recovery. After hearing this expression of opinion, and after observing for himself that the stranger's only luggage consisted of a small carpet-bag which had been found in the field near him, the landlord had set off on the spot to consult the rector, and to ask, in this serious emergency, what course he was to take next.

Mr. Brock was the magistrate as well as the clergyman of the district, and the course to be taken, in the first instance, was to his mind clear enough. He put on his hat and accompanied the landlord back to the inn.

At the inn-door they were joined by Allan, who had heard the news through another channel, and who was waiting Mr. Brock's arrival to follow in the magistrate's train, and to see what the stranger was like. The village surgeon joined them at the same moment, and the four went into the inn together.

They found the landlord's son on one side and the hostler on the other, holding the man down in his chair. Young, slim, and undersized, he was strong enough at that moment to make it a matter of difficulty for the two to master him. His tawny complexion, his large bright brown eyes, his black mustaches and beard, gave him something of a foreign look. His dress was a little worn, but his linen was clean. His dusky hands were wiry and nervous, and were vividly discolored in more places than one by the scars of old wounds. The toes of one of his feet, off which he had kicked the shoe, grasped at the chair-rail through his stocking, with the sensitive muscular action which is only seen in those who have been accustomed to go barefoot. In the frenzy that now possessed him it was impossible to notice, to any useful purpose, more than this. After a whispered consultation with Mr. Brock, the surgeon personally superintended the patient's removal to a quiet bedroom at the back of the house. Shortly afterward his clothes and his carpet-bag were sent down stairs, and were searched, on the chance of finding a clew by which to communicate with his friends, in the magistrate's presence.

The carpet-bag contained nothing but a change of clothing and two books—the Plays of Sophocles, in the original Greek, and the "Faust" of Goethe, in the original German. Both volumes were much worn by reading; and on the fly-leaf of each were inscribed the initials O. M. So much the bag revealed, and no more.

The clothes which the man wore when he was discovered in the field were tried next. A purse (containing a sovereign and a few shillings), a pipe, a tobacco-pouch, a handkerchief, and a little drinking-cup of horn, were produced in succession. The next object, and the last, was found crumpled up carelessly in the breast-pocket of the coat. It was a written testimonial to character, dated and signed, but without any address. So far as this document could tell it, the stranger's story was a sad one indeed. He had apparently been employed for a short time as usher at a school, and had been turned adrift in the world at the outset of his illness, from the fear that the fever might be infectious, and that the prosperity of the establishment might suffer accordingly. Not the slightest imputation of any misbehavior in his employment rested on him. On the contrary, the schoolmaster had great pleasure in testifying to his capacity and his character, and in expressing a fervent hope that he might (under Providence) succeed in recovering his health in somebody else's house.

The written testimonial which afforded this glimpse at the man's story served one purpose more—it connected him with the initials on the books, and identified him to the magistrate and the landlord under the strangely uncouth name of Ozias Midwinter.

Mr. Brock laid aside the testimonial, suspecting that the schoolmaster had purposely abstained from writing his address on it, with the view of escaping all responsibility in the event of his usher's death. In any case it was manifestly useless, under existing circumstances, to think of tracing the poor wretch's friends—if friends he had. To the inn he had been brought, and, as a matter of common humanity, at the inn he must remain for the present. The difficulty about expenses, if it came to the worst, might possibly be met by charitable contributions from the neighbors, or by a collection after a sermon at church. Assuring the landlord that he would consider this part of the question, and would let him know the result, Mr. Brock quitted the inn, without noticing for the moment that he had left Allan there behind him.

Before he had got fifty yards from the house his pupil overtook him. Allan had been most uncharacteristically silent and serious all through the search at the inn, but he had now recovered his usual high spirits. A stranger would have set him down as wanting in common feeling.

"This is a sad business," said the rector. "I really don't know what to do for the best about that unfortunate man."

"You may make your mind quite easy, Sir," said young Armadale, in his offhand way. "I settled it all with the landlord a minute ago."

"You!" exclaimed Mr. Brock, in the utmost astonishment.

"I have merely given a few simple directions," pursued Allan. "Our friend the usher is to have every thing he requires, and is to be treated like a prince; and when the doctor and the landlord want their money they are to come to me."

"My dear Allan," Mr. Brock gently remonstrated. "When will you learn to think before you act on those generous impulses of yours? You are spending more money already on your yacht-building than you can afford—"

"Only think! we laid the first planks of the deck the day before yesterday," said Allan, flying off to the new subject in his usual bird-witted way. "There's just enough of it done to walk on, if you don't feel giddy. I'll help you up the ladder, Mr. Brock, if you'll only come and try."

"Listen to me," persisted the rector; "I'm not talking about the yacht now. That is to say, I am only referring to the yacht as an illustration—"

"And a very pretty illustration too," remarked the incorrigible Allan. "Find me a smarter little vessel of her size in all England and I'll give up yacht-building to-morrow. Whereabouts were we in our conversation, Sir? I'm rather afraid we have lost ourselves somehow."

"I am rather afraid one of us is in the habit of losing himself every time he opens his lips," retorted Mr. Brock. "Come, come, Allan, this is serious. You have been rendering yourself liable for expenses which you may not be able to pay. Mind, I am far from blaming you for your kind feeling toward this poor friendless man—"

"Don't be low-spirited about him, Sir. He'll get over it—he'll be all right again in a week or so. A capital fellow, I have not the least doubt!" continued Allan, whose habit it was to believe in every body and to despair of nothing. "Suppose you ask him to dinner when he gets well, Mr. Brock? I should like to find out (when we are all three snug and friendly together over our wine, you know) how he came by that extraordinary name of his. Ozias Midwinter! Upon my life, his father ought to be ashamed of himself."

"Will you answer me one question before I go in?" said the rector, stopping in despair at his own gate. "This man's bill for lodging and medical attendance may mount to twenty or thirty pounds before he gets well again, if he ever does get well. How are you to pay it?"

"What's that the Chancellor of the Exchequer says when he finds himself in a mess with his accounts, and doesn't see his way out again?" asked Allan. "He always tells his honorable friend he's quite willing to leave a something or other—"

"A margin?" suggested Mr. Brock.

"That's it," said Allan. "I'm like the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I'm quite willing to leave a margin. The yacht (bless her heart!) doesn't eat up every thing. If I'm short by a pound or two, don't be afraid, Sir. There's no pride about me. I'll go round with the hat, and get the balance in the neighborhood. Deuce take the pounds, shillings, and pence! I wish they could all three get rid of themselves like the Bedouin brothers at the show. Don't you remember the Bedouin brothers, Mr. Brock? 'Ali will take a lighted torch, and jump down the throat of his brother Muli—Muli will take a lighted torch, and jump down the throat of his brother Hassan—and Hassan, taking a third lighted torch, will conclude the performances by jumping down his own throat, and leaving the spectators in total darkness.' Wonderfully good that—what I call real wit, with a fine strong flavor about it. Wait a minute! Where are we? We have lost ourselves again. Oh, I remember—money. What I can't beat into my thick head," concluded Allan, quite unconscious that he was preaching socialist doctrines to a clergyman, "is the meaning of the fuss that's made about giving money away. Why can't the people who have got money to spare give it to the people who haven't got money to spare, and make things pleasant and comfortable all the world over in that way? You're always telling me to cultivate ideas, Mr. Brock. There's an idea, and, upon my life, I don't think it's a bad one."

Mr. Brock gave his pupil a good-humored poke with the end of his stick. "Go back to your yacht," he said. "All the little discretion you have got in that flighty head of yours is left on board in your tool-chest. How that lad will end," pursued the rector when he was left by himself, "is more than any human being can say. I almost wish I had never taken the responsibility of him on my shoulders."

Three weeks passed before the stranger with the uncouth name was pronounced to be at last on the way to recovery. During this period Allan had made regular inquiries at the inn, and as soon as the sick man was allowed to see visitors Allan was the first who appeared at his bedside. So far Mr. Brock's pupil had shown no more than a natural interest in one of the few romantic circumstances which had varied the monotony of the village life: he had committed no imprudence, and he had exposed himself to no blame. But as the days passed young Armadale's visits to the inn began to lengthen considerably, and the surgeon (a cautious elderly man) gave the rector a private hint to bestir himself. Mr. Brock acted on the hint immediately, and discovered that Allan had followed his usual impulses in his usual headlong way. He had taken a violent fancy to the castaway usher; and had invited Ozias Midwinter to reside permanently in the neighborhood, in the new and interesting character of his bosom friend.

Before Mr. Brock could make up his mind how to act in this emergency he received a note from Allan's mother, begging him to use his privilege as an old friend, and to pay her a visit in her room. He found Mrs. Armadale suffering under violent nervous agitation, caused entirely by a recent interview with her son. Allan had been sitting with her all the morning, and had talked of nothing but his new friend. The man with the horrible name (as poor Mrs. Armadale described him) had questioned Allan in a singularly inquisitive manner on the subject of himself and his family, but had kept his own personal history entirely in the dark. At some former period of his life he had been accustomed to the sea and to sailing. Allan had, unfortunately, found this out, and a bond of union between them was formed on the spot. With a merciless distrust of the stranger—simply because he was a stranger—which appeared rather unreasonable to Mr. Brock, Mrs. Armadale besought the rector to go to the inn without a moment's loss of time, and never to rest until he had made the man give a proper account of himself. "Find out every thing about his father and mother!" she said, in her vehement, female way. "Make sure before you leave him that he is not a vagabond roaming the country under an assumed name."

"My dear lady," remonstrated the rector, obediently taking his hat, "whatever else we may doubt, I really think we may feel sure about the man's name! It is so remarkably ugly that it must be genuine. No sane human being would assume such a name as Ozias Midwinter."

"You may be quite right, and I may be quite wrong; but pray go and see him," persisted Mrs. Armadale. "Go, and don't spare him, Mr. Brock. How do we know that this illness of his may not have been put on for a purpose?"

It was useless to reason with her. The whole College of Physicians might have certified to the man's illness, and, in her present frame of mind, Mrs. Armadale would have disbelieved the College, one and all, from the president downward. Mr. Brock took the wise way out of the difficulty—he said no more, and he set off for the inn immediately.

Ozias Midwinter, recovering from brain-fever, was a startling object to contemplate on a first view of him. His shaven head, tied up roughly in an old yellow silk handkerchief; his tawny, haggard cheeks; his bright brown eyes, preternaturally large and wild; his tangled black beard; his long, supple, sinewy fingers, wasted by suffering till they looked like claws—all tended to discompose the rector at the outset of the interview. When the first feeling of surprise had worn off the impression that followed it was not an agreeable one. Mr. Brock could not conceal from himself that the stranger's manner was against him. The general opinion has settled that if a man is honest he is bound to assert it by looking straight at his fellow-creatures when he speaks to them. If this man was honest his eyes showed a singular perversity in looking away and denying it. Possibly they were affected in some degree by a nervous restlessness in his organization, which appeared to pervade every fibre in his lean, lithe body. The rector's healthy Anglo-Saxon flesh crept responsively at every casual movement of the usher's supple brown fingers, and every passing distortion of the usher's haggard, yellow face. "God forgive me!" thought Mr. Brock, with his mind running on Allan and Allan's mother, "I wish I could see my way to turning Ozias Midwinter adrift in the world again!"

The conversation which ensued between the two was a very guarded one. Mr. Brock felt his way gently, and found himself, try where he might, always kept politely, more or less, in the dark. From first to last the man's real character shrank back with a savage shyness from the rector's touch. He started by an assertion which it was impossible to look at him and believe—he declared that he was only twenty years of age. All he could be persuaded to say on the subject of the school was, that the bare recollection of it was horrible to him. He had only filled the usher's situation for ten days when the first appearance of his illness caused his dismissal. How he had reached the field in which he had been found was more than he could say. He remembered traveling a long distance by railway, with a purpose (if he had a purpose) which it was now impossible to recall, and then wandering coastward on foot all through the day, or all through the night—he was not sure which. The sea kept running in his mind when his mind began to give way. He had been employed on the sea as a lad. He had left it, and had filled a situation at a bookseller's in a country town. He had left the bookseller's and had tried the school. Now the school had turned him out he must try something else. It mattered little what he tried—failure (for which nobody was ever to blame but himself) was sure to be the end of it sooner or later. Friends to assist him, he had none to apply to; and as for relations, he wished to be excused from speaking of them. For all he knew they might be dead, and for all they knew he might be dead. That was a melancholy acknowledgment to make at his time of life, there was no denying it. It might tell against him in the opinions of others; and it did tell against him, no doubt, in the opinion of the gentleman who was talking to him at that moment.

These strange answers were given in a tone and manner far removed from bitterness on the one side, or from indifference on the other. Ozias Midwinter at twenty spoke of his life as Ozias Midwinter at seventy might have spoken, with a long weariness of years on him which he had learned to bear patiently.

Two circumstances pleaded strongly against the distrust with which, in sheer perplexity of mind, Mr. Brock blindly regarded him. He had written to a savings-bank in a distant part of England, had drawn his money, and had paid the doctor and the landlord. A man of vulgar mind, after acting in this manner, would have treated his obligations lightly when he had settled his bills. Ozias Midwinter spoke of his obligations—and especially of his obligation to Allan—with a fervor of thankfulness which it was not surprising only, but absolutely painful to witness. He showed a horrible sincerity of astonishment at having been treated with common Christian kindness in a Christian land. He spoke of Allan's having become answerable for all the expenses of sheltering, nursing, and curing him, with a savage rapture of gratitude and surprise, which burst out of him like a flash of lightning. "So help me God!" cried the cast-away usher, "I never met with the like of him; I never heard of the like of him before!" In the next instant the one glimpse of light which the man had let in on his own passionate nature was quenched again in darkness. His wandering eyes, returning to their old trick, looked uneasily away from Mr. Brock; and his voice dropped back once more into its unnatural steadiness and quietness of tone. "I beg your pardon, Sir," he said. "I have been used to be hunted, and cheated, and starved. Every thing else comes strange to me." Half-attracted by the man, half-repelled by him, Mr. Brock, on rising to take leave, impulsively offered his hand, and then, with a sudden misgiving, confusedly drew it back again. "You meant that kindly, Sir," said Ozias Midwinter, with his own hands crossed resolutely behind him. "I don't complain of your thinking better of it. A man who can't give a proper account of himself is not a man for a gentleman in your position to take by the hand."

Mr. Brock left the inn thoroughly puzzled. Before returning to Mrs. Armadale he sent for her son. The chances were that the guard had been off the stranger's tongue when he spoke to Allan; and with Allan's frankness, there was no fear of his concealing any thing that had passed between them from the rector's knowledge.

Here, again, Mr. Brock's diplomacy achieved no useful results. Once started on the subject of Ozias Midwinter, Allan rattled on about his new friend in his usual easy, light-hearted way. But he had really nothing of importance to tell—for nothing of importance had been revealed to him. They had talked about boat-building and sailing by the hour together; and Allan had got some valuable hints. They had discussed (with diagrams to assist them, and with more valuable hints for Allan) the serious impending question of the launch of the yacht. On other occasions they had diverged to other subjects—to more of them than Allan could remember on the spur of the moment. Had Midwinter said nothing about his relations in the flow of all this friendly talk? Nothing, except that they had not behaved well to him—hang his relations! Was he at all sensitive on the subject of his own odd name? Not the least in the world; he had set the example, like a sensible fellow, of laughing at it himself: deuce take his name, it did very well when you were used to it. What had Allan seen in him to take such a fancy to? Allan had seen in him what he didn't see in people in general. He wasn't like all the other fellows in the neighborhood. All the other fellows were cut out on the same pattern. Every man of them was equally healthy, muscular, loud, hard-headed, clean-skinned, and rough; every man of them drank the same draughts of beer, smoked the same short pipes all day long, rode the best horse, shot over the best dog, and put the best bottle of wine in England on his table at night; every man of them sponged himself every morning in the same sort of tub of cold water, and bragged about it in frosty weather in the same sort of way; every man of them thought getting into debt a capital joke, and betting on horse-races one of the most meritorious actions that a human being can perform. They were no doubt excellent fellows in their way; but the worst of them was, they were all exactly alike. It was a perfect godsend to meet with a man like Midwinter—a man who was not cut out on the regular local pattern, and whose way in the world had the one great merit (in those parts) of being a way of his own.

Leaving all remonstrances for a fitter opportunity the rector went back to Mrs. Armadale. He could not disguise from himself that Allan's mother was the person really answerable for Allan's present indiscretion. If the lad had seen a little less of the small gentry in the neighborhood, and a little more of the great outside world at home and abroad, the pleasure of cultivating Ozias Midwinter's society might have had fewer attractions for him.

Conscious of the unsatisfactory result of his visit to the inn, Mr. Brock felt some anxiety about the reception of his report when he found himself once more in Mrs. Armadale's presence. His forebodings were soon realized. Try as he might to make the best of it, Mrs. Armadale seized on the one suspicious fact of the usher's silence about himself, as justifying the strongest measures that could be taken to separate him from her son. If the rector refused to interfere, she declared her intention of writing to Ozias Midwinter with her own hand: Remonstrance irritated her to such a pitch that she astounded Mr. Brock by reverting to the forbidden subject of five years since, and referring him to the conversation which had passed between them when the advertisement had been discovered in the newspaper. She passionately declared that the vagabond Armadale of that advertisement, and the vagabond Midwinter at the village inn, might, for all she knew to the contrary, be one and the same. The rector vainly reiterated his conviction that the name was the very last in the world that any man (and a young man especially) would be likely to assume. Nothing quieted Mrs. Armadale but absolute submission to her will. Dreading the consequences if he still resisted her in her feeble state of health, and foreboding a serious disagreement between the mother and son, if the mother interfered, Mr. Brock undertook to see Midwinter again, and to tell him plainly that he must give a proper account of himself, or that his intimacy with Allan must cease. The two concessions which he exacted from Mrs. Armadale in return, were, that she should wait patiently until the doctor reported the man fit to travel, and that she should be careful in the interval not to mention the matter in any way to her son.

In a week's time Midwinter was able to drive out (with Allan for his coachman) in the pony-chaise belonging to the inn; and in ten days the doctor privately reported him as fit to travel. Toward the close of that tenth day Mr. Brock met Allan and his new friend enjoying the last gleams of wintry sunshine in one of the inland lanes. He waited until the two had separated, and then followed the usher on his way back to the inn.

The rector's resolution to speak pitilessly to the purpose was in some danger of failing him, as he drew nearer and nearer to the friendless man, and saw how feebly he still walked, how loosely his worn coat hung about him, and how heavily he leaned on his cheap clumsy stick. Humanely reluctant to say the decisive words too precipitately, Mr. Brock tried him first with a little compliment on the range of his reading, as shown by the volume of Sophocles and the volume of Goethe which had been found in his bag, and asked how long he had been acquainted with German and Greek. The quick ear of Midwinter detected something wrong in the tone of Mr. Brock's voice. He turned in the darkening twilight and looked suddenly and suspiciously in the rector's face.

"You have something to say to me," he answered; "and it is not what you are saying now."

There was no help for it but to accept the challenge. Very delicately, with many preparatory words, to which the other listened in unbroken silence, Mr. Brock came little by little nearer and nearer to the point. Long before he had really reached it—long before a man of no more than ordinary sensibility would have felt what was coming—Ozias Midwinter stood still in the lane, and told the rector than he need say no more.

"I understand you, Sir," said the usher. "Mr. Armadale has an ascertained position in the world; Mr. Armadale has nothing to conceal, and nothing to be ashamed of. I agree with you that I am not a fit companion for him. The best return I can make for his kindness is to presume on it no longer. You may depend on my leaving this place to-morrow morning."

He spoke no word more; he would hear no word more. With a self-control which, at his years and with his temperament, was nothing less than marvelous, he civilly took off his hat, bowed, and returned to the inn by himself.

Mr. Brock slept badly that night. The issue of the interview in the lane had made the problem of Ozias Midwinter a harder problem to solve than ever.

Early the next morning a letter was brought to the rector from the inn, and the messenger announced that the strange gentleman had taken his departure. The letter inclosed an open note addressed to Allan, and requested Allan's tutor (after first reading it himself) to forward it or not at his own sole discretion. The note was a startlingly short one: it began and ended in a dozen words: "Don't blame Mr. Brock; Mr. Brock is right. Thank you, and good-by. O. M."

The rector forwarded the note to its proper destination, as a matter of course; and sent a few lines to Mrs. Armadale at the same time, to quiet her anxiety by the news of the usher's departure. This done, he waited the visit from his pupil, which would probably follow the delivery of the note, in no very tranquil frame of mind. There might or might not be some deep motive at the bottom of Midwinter's conduct; but, thus far, it was impossible to deny that he had behaved in such a manner as to rebuke the rector's distrust and to justify Allan's good opinion of him.

The morning wore on, and young Armadale never appeared. After looking for him vainly in the yard where the yacht was building, Mr. Brock went to Mrs. Armadale's house, and there heard news from the servant which turned his steps in the direction of the inn. The landlord at once acknowledged the truth—young Mr. Armadale had come there with an open letter in his hand, and had insisted on being informed of the road which his friend had taken. For the first time in the landlord's experience of him the young gentleman was out of temper; and the girl who waited on the customers had stupidly mentioned a circumstance which had added fuel to the fire. She had acknowledged having heard Mr. Midwinter lock himself into his room overnight, and burst into a violent fit of crying. That trifling particular had set Mr. Armadale's face all of a flame; he had shouted and sworn; he had rushed into the stables; had forced the hostler to saddle him a horse, and had set off at full gallop on the road that Ozias Midwinter had taken before him.

After cautioning the landlord to keep Allan's conduct a secret, if any of Mrs. Armadale's servants came that morning to the inn, Mr. Brock went home again, and waited anxiously to see what the day would bring forth.

To his infinite relief his pupil appeared at the rectory late in the afternoon. Allan looked and spoke with a dogged determination which was quite new in his old friend's experience of him. Without waiting to be questioned he told his story in his usual straightforward way. He had overtaken Midwinter on the road, and after trying vainly, first to induce him to return, then to find out where he was going to, had threatened to keep company with him for the rest of the day, and had so extorted the confession that he was going to try his luck in London. Having gained this point Allan had asked next for his friend's address in London; had been entreated by the other not to press his request; had pressed it, nevertheless, with all his might, and had got the address at last, by making an appeal to Midwinter's gratitude, for which (feeling heartily ashamed of himself) he had afterward asked Midwinter's pardon. "I like the poor fellow, and I won't give him up," concluded Allan, bringing his clenched fist down with a thump on the rectory table. "Don't be afraid of my vexing my mother; I'll leave you to speak to her, Mr. Brock, at your own time and in your own way; and I'll just say this much more by way of bringing the thing to an end. Here is the address safe in my pocket-book, and here am I, standing firm, for once, on a resolution of my own. I'll give you and my mother time to reconsider this; and when the time is up, if my friend Midwinter doesn't come to me, I'll go to my friend Midwinter!"

So the matter rested for the present; and such was the result of turning the castaway usher adrift in the world again.

A month passed, and brought in the new year—'51. Overleaping that short lapse of time, Mr. Brock paused, with a heavy heart, at the next event; to his mind the one mournful, the one memorable event of the series—Mrs. Armadale's death.

The first warning of the affliction that was near at hand had followed close on the usher's departure in December, and had arisen out of a circumstance which dwelt painfully on the rector's memory from that time forth.

But three days after Midwinter had left for London Mr. Brock was accosted in the village by a neatly-dressed woman, wearing a gown and bonnet of black silk and a red Paisley shawl, who was a total stranger to him, and who inquired the way to Mrs. Armadale's house. She put the question without raising the thick black veil that hung over her face. Mr. Brock, in giving her the necessary directions, observed that she was a remarkably elegant and graceful woman, and looked after her as she bowed and left him, wondering who Mrs. Armadale's visitor could possibly be.

A quarter of an hour later the lady, still veiled as before, passed Mr. Brock again close to the inn. She entered the house and spoke to the landlady. Seeing the landlord shortly afterward hurrying round to the stables, Mr. Brock asked him if the lady was going away. Yes; she had come from the railway in the omnibus, but she was going back again more creditably in a carriage of her own hiring, supplied by the inn.

The rector proceeded on his walk, rather surprised to find his thoughts running inquisitively on a woman who was a stranger to him. When he got home again he found the village surgeon waiting his return, with an urgent message from Allan's mother. About an hour since the surgeon had been sent for in great haste to see Mrs. Armadale. He had found her suffering from an alarming nervous attack, brought on (as the servants suspected) by an unexpected, and, possibly, an unwelcome visitor, who had called that morning. The surgeon had done all that was needful, and had no apprehension of any dangerous results. Finding his patient eagerly desirous, on recovering herself, to see Mr. Brock immediately, he had thought it important to humor her, and had readily undertaken to call at the rectory with a message to that effect.

Looking at Mrs. Armadale with a far deeper interest in her than the surgeon's interest, Mr. Brock saw enough in her face, when it turned toward him on his entering the room, to justify instant and serious alarm. She allowed him no opportunity of soothing her; she heeded none of his inquiries. Answers to certain questions of her own were what she wanted, and what she was determined to have:—Had Mr. Brock seen the woman who had presumed to visit her that morning? Yes. Had Allan seen her? No: Allan had been at work since breakfast, and was at work still, in his yard by the water-side. This latter reply appeared to quiet Mrs. Armadale for the moment: she put her next question—the most extraordinary question of the three—more composedly. Did the rector think Allan would object to leaving his vessel for the present, and to accompanying his mother on a journey to look out for a new house in some other part of England? In the greatest amazement Mr. Brock asked what reason there could possibly be for leaving her present residence. Mrs. Armadale's reason, when she gave it, only added to his surprise. The woman's first visit might be followed by a second; and rather than see her again, rather than run the risk of Allan's seeing her and speaking to her, Mrs. Armadale would leave England if necessary, and end her days in a foreign land. Taking counsel of his experience as a magistrate, Mr. Brock inquired if the woman had come to ask for money. Yes: respectably as she was dressed, she had described herself as being "in distress;" had asked for money, and had got it—but the money was of no importance; the one thing needful was to get away before the woman came again. More and more surprised, Mr. Brock ventured on another question. Was it long since Mrs. Armadale and her visitor had last met? Yes; as long as all Allan's lifetime—as long as one-and-twenty years.

At that reply the rector shifted his ground, and took counsel next of his experience as a friend.

"Is this person," he asked, "connected in any way with the painful remembrances of your early life?"

"Yes, with the painful remembrance of the time when I was married," said Mrs. Armadale. "She was associated, as a mere child, with a circumstance which I must think of with shame and sorrow to my dying day."

Mr. Brock noticed the altered tone in which his old friend spoke, and the unwillingness with which she gave her answer.

"Can you tell me more about her without referring to yourself?" he went on. "I am sure I can protect you, if you will only help me a little. Her name, for instance; you can tell me her name?"

Mrs. Armadale shook her head. "The name I knew her by," she said, "would be of no use to you. She has been married since then; she told me so herself."

"And without telling you her married name?"

"She refused to tell it."

"Do you know any thing of her friends?"

"Only of her friends when she was a child. They called themselves her uncle and aunt. They were low people, and they deserted her at the school on my father's estate. We never heard any more of them."

"Did she remain under your father's care?"

"She remained under my care—that is to say, she traveled with us. We were leaving England just at that time for Madeira. I had my father's leave to take her with me, and to train the wretch to be my maid—"

At those words Mrs. Armadale stopped confusedly. Mr. Brock tried gently to lead her on. It was useless; she started up in violent agitation, and walked excitedly backward and forward in the room.

"Don't ask me any more!" she cried out, in loud, angry tones. "I parted with her when she was a girl of twelve years old. I never saw her again, I never heard of her again, from that time to this. I don't know how she has discovered me, after all the years that have passed; I only know that she has discovered me. She will find her way to Allan next; she will poison my son's mind against me. Help me to get away from her! help me to take Allan away before she comes back!"

The rector asked no more questions; it would have been cruel to press her farther. The first necessity was to compose her by promising compliance with all that she desired. The second was to induce her to see another medical man. Mr. Brock contrived to reach his end harmlessly in this latter case by reminding her that she wanted strength to travel, and that her own medical attendant might restore her all the more speedily to herself if he were assisted by the best professional advice. Having overcome her habitual reluctance to seeing strangers by this means, the rector at once went to Allan, and, delicately concealing what Mrs. Armadale had said at the interview, broke the news to him that his mother was seriously ill. Allan would hear of no messengers being sent for assistance: he drove off on the spot to the railway, and telegraphed himself to Bristol for medical help.

On the next morning the help came, and Mr. Brock's worst fears were confirmed. The village surgeon had fatally misunderstood the case from the first, and the time was past now at which his errors of treatment might have been set right. The shock of the previous morning had completed the mischief. Mrs. Armadale's days were numbered.

The son who dearly loved her, the old friend to whom her life was precious, hoped vainly to the last. In a month from the physician's visit all hope was over; and Allan shed the first bitter tears of his life at his mother's grave.

She had died more peacefully than Mr. Brock had dared to hope; leaving all her little fortune to her son, and committing him solemnly to the care of her one friend on earth. The rector had entreated her to let him write and try to reconcile her brothers with her before it was too late. She had only answered sadly that it was too late already. But one reference escaped her in her last illness to those early sorrows which had weighed heavily on all her after-life, and which had passed thrice already; like shadows of evil, between the rector and herself. Even on her death-bed she had shrunk from letting the light fall clearly on the story of the past. She had looked at Allan kneeling by the bedside, and had whispered to Mr. Brock: "Never let his Namesake come near him! Never let that Woman find him out!" No word more fell from her that touched on the misfortunes which had tried her in the past, or on the dangers which she dreaded in the future. The secret which she had kept from her son and from her friend was a secret which she carried with her to the grave.

When the last offices of affection and respect had been performed, Mr. Brock felt it his duty, as executor to the deceased lady, to write to her brothers, and to give them information of her death. Believing that he had to deal with two men who would probably misinterpret his motives if he left Allan's position unexplained, he was careful to remind them that Mrs. Arma-dale's son was well provided for, and that the object of his letter was simply to communicate the news of her sister's decease. The two letters were dispatched toward the middle of January, and by return of post the answers were received. The first which the rector opened was written, not by the elder brother, but by the elder brother's only son. The young man had succeeded to the estates in Norfolk on his father's death some little time since. He wrote in a frank and friendly spirit, assuring Mr. Brock that, however strongly his father might have been prejudiced against Mrs. Armadale, the hostile feeling had never extended to her son. For himself, he had only to add that he would be sincerely happy to welcome his cousin to Thorpe-Ambrose, whenever his cousin came that way.

The second letter was a far less agreeable reply to receive than the first. The younger brother was still alive, and still resolute neither to forget nor forgive. He informed Mr. Brock that his deceased sister's choice of a husband, and her conduct to her father at the time of her marriage, had made any relations of affection or esteem impossible on his side from that time forth. Holding the opinions he did, it would be equally painful to his nephew and himself if any personal intercourse took place between them. He had adverted, as generally as possible, to the nature of the differences which had kept him apart from his late sister, in order to satisfy Mr. Brock's mind that a personal acquaintance with young Mr. Armadale was, as a matter of delicacy, quite out of the question, and having done this, he would beg leave to close the correspondence.

Mr. Brock wisely destroyed the second letter on the spot, and, after showing Allan his cousin's invitation, suggested that he should go to Thorpe-Ambrose as soon as he felt fit to present himself to strangers. Allan listened to the advice patiently enough; but he declined to profit by it. "I will shake hands with my cousin willingly if I ever meet him," he said; "but I will visit no family and be a guest in no house in which my mother has been badly treated." Mr. Brock remonstrated gently, and tried to put matters in their proper light. Even at that time—even while he was still ignorant of events which were then impending—Allan's strangely isolated position in the world was a subject of serious anxiety to his old friend and tutor. The proposed visit to Thorpe-Ambrose opened the very prospect of his making friends and connections suited to him in rank and age which Mr. Brock most desired to see—but Allan was not to be persuaded; he was obstinate and unreasonable; and the rector had no alternative but to drop the subject.

One on another the weeks passed monotonously; and Allan showed but little of the elasticity of his age and character in bearing the affliction that had made him motherless. He finished and launched his yacht; but his own journeymen remarked that the work seemed to have lost its interest for him. It was not natural to the young man to brood over his solitude and his grief as he was brooding now. As the spring advanced, Mr. Brock began to feel uneasy about the future if Allan was not roused at once by change of scene. After much pondering the rector decided on trying a trip to Paris, and on extending the journey southward if his companion showed an interest in continental traveling. Allan's reception of the proposal made atonement for his obstinacy in refusing to cultivate his cousin's acquaintance—he was willing to go with Mr. Brock wherever Mr. Brock pleased. The rector took him at his word, and in the middle of March the two strangely assorted companions left for London on their way to Paris.

Arrived in London, Mr. Brock found himself unexpectedly face to face with a new anxiety. The unwelcome subject of Ozias Midwinter, which had been buried in peace since the beginning of December, rose to the surface again, and confronted the rector at the very outset of his travels more unmanageably than ever.

Mr. Brock's position, in dealing with this difficult matter, had been hard enough to maintain when he had first meddled with it. He now found himself with no vantage-ground left to stand on. Events had so ordered it, that the difference of opinion between Allan and his mother on the subject of the usher was entirely disassociated with the agitation which had hastened Mrs. Armadale's death. Allan's resolution to say no irritating words, and Mr. Brock's reluctance to touch on a disagreeable topic, had kept them both silent about Midwinter in Mrs. Armadale's presence, during the three days which had intervened between that person's departure and the appearance of the strange woman in the village. In the period of suspense and suffering that had followed no recurrence to the subject of the usher had been possible, and none had taken place. Free from all mental disquietude on this score, Allan had stoutly preserved his perverse interest in his new friend. He had written to tell Midwinter of his affliction, and he now proposed (unless the rector formally objected to it) paying a visit to his friend before he started for Paris the next morning. What was Mr. Brock to do? There was no denying that Midwinter's conduct had pleaded unanswerably against poor Mrs. Armadale's unfounded distrust of him. If the rector, with no convincing reason to allege against it, and with no right to interfere but the right which Allan's courtesy gave him, declined to sanction the proposed visit, then farewell to all the old sociability and confidence between tutor and pupil on the contemplated tour. Environed by difficulties, which might have been possibly worsted by a less just and a less kind-hearted man, Mr. Brock said a cautious word or two at parting; and (with more confidence in Midwinter's discretion and self-denial than he quite liked to acknowledge even to himself) left Allan free to take his own way.

After whiling away an hour, during the interval of his pupil's absence, by a walk in the streets, the rector returned to his hotel; and finding the newspaper disengaged in the coffee-room, sat down absently to look over it. His eye, resting idly on the title-page, was startled into instant attention by the very first advertisement that it chanced to light on at the head of the column. There was Allan's mysterious namesake again, figuring in capital letters, and associated this time (in the character of a dead man) with the offer of a pecuniary reward! Thus it ran:

SUPPOSED TO BE DEAD.—To parish clerks, sextons, and others. Twenty Pounds Reward will be paid to any person who can produce evidence of the death of ALLAN ARMADALE, only son of the late Allan Armadale, of Barbadoes, and born in that island in the year 1830. Further particulars on application to Messrs. Hamrick and Ridge, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London.

Even Mr. Brock's essentially unimaginative mind began to stagger superstitiously in the dark as he laid the newspaper down again. Little by little a vague suspicion took possession of him that the whole series of events which had followed the first appearance of Allan's namesake in the newspapers, six years since, were held together by some mysterious connection, and were tending steadily to some unimaginable end. Without knowing why, he began to feel uneasy at Allan's absence. Without knowing why, he became impatient to get his pupil away from England before any thing else happened between night and morning.

In an hour more the rector was relieved of all immediate anxiety by Allan's return to the hotel. The young man was vexed and out of spirits. He had discovered Midwinter's lodgings, but he had failed to find Midwinter himself. The only account his landlady could give of him was that he had gone out at his customary time to get his dinner at the nearest eating-house, and that he had not returned, in accordance with his usual regular habits, at his usual regular hour. Allan had therefore gone to inquire at the eating-house, and had found, on describing him, that Midwinter was well known there. It was his custom, on other days, to take a frugal dinner, and to sit half an hour afterward reading the newspaper. On this occasion, after dining, he had taken up the paper as usual, had suddenly thrown it aside again, and had gone, nobody knew where, in a violent hurry. No further information being attainable, Allan had left a note at the lodgings, giving his address at the hotel, and begging Midwinter to come and say good-bye before his departure for Paris.

The evening passed, and Allan's invisible friend never appeared. The morning came, bringing no obstacles with it, and Mr. Brock and his pupil left London. So far fortune had declared herself at last on the rector's side. Ozias Midwinter, after intrusively rising to the surface, had conveniently dropped out of sight again. What was to happen next?

Advancing once more, by three weeks only, from past to present, Mr. Brock's memory took up the next event on the seventh of April. To all appearance the chain was now broken at last. The new event had no recognizable connection (either to his mind or to Allan's) with any of the persons who had appeared, or any of the circumstances that had happened, in the by-gone time.

The travelers had as yet got no farther than Paris. Allan's spirits had risen with the change; and he had been made all the readier to enjoy the novelty of the scene around him by receiving a letter from Midwinter, containing news which Mr. Brock himself acknowledged promised fairly for the future. The ex-usher had been away on business when Allan had called at his lodgings, having been led by an accidental circumstance to open communications with his relatives on that day. The result had taken him entirely by surprise—it had unexpectedly secured to him a little income of his own for the rest of his life. His future plans, now that this piece of good fortune had fallen to his share, were still unsettled. But if Allan wished to hear what he ultimately decided on, his agent in London (whose direction he inclosed) would receive communications for him, and would furnish Mr. Armadale at all future times with his address.

On receipt of this letter Allan had seized the pen in his usual headlong way and had insisted on Midwinter's immediately joining Mr. Brock and himself on their travels. The last days of March passed and no answer to the proposal was received. The first days of April came, and on the seventh of the month there was a letter for Allan at last on the breakfast-table. He snatched it up, looked at the address, and threw the letter down again impatiently. The handwriting was not Midwinter's. Allan finished his breakfast before he cared to read what his correspondent had to say to him.

The meal over young Armadale lazily opened the letter. He began it with an expression of supreme indifference. He finished it with a sudden leap out of his chair and a loud shout of astonishment. Wondering, as he well might, at this extraordinary outbreak, Mr. Brock took up the letter, which Allan had tossed across the table to him. Before he had come to the end of it his hands dropped helplessly on his knees and the blank bewilderment of his pupil's expression was accurately reflected on his own face.

If ever two men had good cause for being thrown completely off their balance Allan and the rector were those two. The letter which had struck them both with the same shock of astonishment did, beyond all question, contain an announcement which, on a first discovery of it, was simply incredible. The news was from Norfolk, and was to this effect. In little more than one week's time, death had mown down no less than three lives in the family at Thorpe-Ambrose—and Allan Armadale was at that moment heir to an estate of eight thousand a year!

A second perusal of the letter enabled the rector and his companion to master the details which had escaped them on a first reading. The writer was the family lawyer at Thorpe-Ambrose. After announcing to Allan the deaths of his cousin Arthur, at the age of twenty-five; of his uncle Henry, at the age of forty-eight; and of his cousin John, at the age of twenty-one, the lawyer proceeded to give a brief abstract of the terms of the elder Mr. Blanchard's will. The claims of male issue were, as is not unusual in such cases, preferred to the claims of female issue. Failing Arthur, and his issue male, the estate was left to Henry and his issue male. Failing them, it went to the issue male of Henry's sister; and, in default of such issue, to the next heir male. As events had happened the two young men, Arthur and John, had died unmarried, and Henry Blanchard had died, leaving no surviving child but a daughter. Under these circumstances, Allan was the next heir male pointed at by the will, and was now legally successor to the Thorpe-Ambrose estate. Having made this extraordinary announcement, the lawyer requested to be favored with Mr. Armadale's instructions, and added, in conclusion, that he would be happy to furnish any further particulars that were desired.

It was useless to waste time in wondering at an event which neither Allan nor his mother had ever thought of as even remotely possible. The only thing to be done was to go back to England at once. The next day found the travelers installed once more in their London hotel, and the day after the affair was placed in the proper professional hands. The inevitable corresponding and consulting ensued; and one by one the all-important particulars flowed in until the measure of information was pronounced to be full.

This was the strange story of the three deaths.

At the time when Mr. Brock had written to Mrs. Armadale's relatives to announce the news of her decease (that is to say, in the middle of the month of January), the family at Thorpe-Ambrose numbered five persons—Arthur Blanchard (in possession of the estate), living in the great house with his mother; and Henry Blanchard, the uncle, living in the neighborhood, a widower with two children, a son and a daughter. To cement the family connection still more closely, Arthur Blanchard was engaged to be married to his cousin. The wedding was to be celebrated with great local rejoicings in the coming summer when the young lady had completed her twentieth year.

The month of February had brought changes with it in the family position. Observing signs of delicacy in the health of his son, Mr. Henry Blanchard left Norfolk, taking the young man with him, under medical advice, to try the climate of Italy. Early in the ensuing month of March, Arthur Blanchard also left Thorpe-Ambrose, for a few days only, on business which required his presence in London. The business took him into the City. Annoyed by the endless impediments in the streets, he returned westward by one of the river steamers; and, so returning, met his death.

As the steamer left the wharf he noticed a woman near him who had shown a singular hesitation in embarking, and who had been the last of the passengers to take her place in the vessel. She was neatly dressed in black silk, with a red Paisley shawl over her shoulders, and she kept her face hidden behind a thick veil. Arthur Blanchard was struck by the rare grace and elegance of her figure, and he felt a young man's passing curiosity to see her face. She neither lifted her veil nor turned her head his way. After taking a few steps hesitatingly backward and forward on the deck, she walked away on a sudden to the stern of the vessel. In a minute more there was a cry of alarm from the man at the helm, and the engines were stopped immediately. The woman had thrown herself overboard.

The passengers all rushed to the side of the vessel to look. Arthur Blanchard alone, without an instant's hesitation, jumped into the river. He was an excellent swimmer, and he reached the woman as she rose again to the surface after sinking for the first time. Help was at hand, and they were both brought safely ashore. The woman was taken to the nearest police-station, and was soon restored to her senses; her preserver giving his name and address, as usual in such cases, to the inspector on duty, who wisely recommended him to get into a warm bath, and to send to his lodgings for dry clothes. Arthur Blanchard, who had never known an hour's illness since he was a child, laughed at the caution, and went back in a cab. The next day he was too ill to attend the examination before the magistrate. A fortnight afterward he was a dead man.

The news of the calamity reached Henry Blanchard and his son at Milan; and within an hour of the time when they received it they were on their way back to England. The snow on the Alps had loosened earlier than usual that year, and the passes were notoriously dangerous. The father and son, traveling in their own carriage, were met on the mountain by the mail returning, after sending the letters on by hand. Warnings which would have produced their effect under any ordinary circumstances were now vainly addressed to the two Englishmen. Their impatience to be at home again, after the catastrophe which had befallen their family, brooked no delay. Bribes lavishly offered to the postillions tempted them to go on. The carriage pursued its way, and was lost to view in the mist. When it was seen again it was disinterred from the bottom of a precipice—the men, the horses, and the vehicle all crushed together under the wreck and ruin of an avalanche.

So the three lives were mown down by death. So, in a clear sequence of events, a woman's suicide-leap into a river had opened to Allan Armadale the succession to the Thorpe-Ambrose estates.

Who was the woman? The man who saved her life never knew. The magistrate who remanded her, the chaplain who exhorted her, the reporter who exhibited her in print—never knew. It was recorded of her with surprise that, though most respectably dressed, she had nevertheless described herself as being "in distress." She had expressed the deepest contrition, but had persisted in giving a name which was on the face of it a false one; in telling a commonplace story which was manifestly an invention; and in refusing to the last to furnish any clew to her friends. A lady connected with a charitable institution ("interested by her extreme elegance and beauty") had volunteered to take charge of her, and to bring her into a better frame of mind. The first day's experience of the penitent had been far from cheering, and the second day's experience had been conclusive. She had left the institution by stealth; and—though the visiting clergyman, taking a special interest in the case, had caused special efforts to be made—all search after her from that time forth had proved fruitless.

While this useless investigation (undertaken at Allan's express desire) was in progress the lawyer had settled the preliminary formalities connected with the succession of the property. All that remained was for the new master of Thorpe-Ambrose to decide when he would personally establish himself on the estate of which he was now the legal possessor.

Left necessarily to his own guidance in this matter, Allan settled it for himself in his usual hot-headed, generous way. He positively declined to take possession until Mrs. Blanchard and her niece (who had been permitted, thus far, as a matter of courtesy, to remain in their old home) had recovered from the calamity that had befallen them, and were fit to decide for themselves what their future proceedings should be. A private correspondence followed this resolution, comprehending, on Allan's side, unlimited offers of every thing he had to give (in a house which he had not yet seen); and, on the ladies' side, a discreetly reluctant readiness to profit by the young gentleman's generosity in the matter of time. To the astonishment of his legal advisers, Allan entered their office one morning, accompanied by Mr. Brock, and announced, with perfect composure, that the ladies had been good enough to take his own arrangements off his hands, and that, in deference to their convenience, he meant to defer establishing himself at Thorpe-Ambrose till that day two months. The lawyers stared at Allan, and Allan, returning the compliment, stared at the lawyers.

"What on earth are you wondering at, gentlemen?" he inquired, with a boyish bewilderment in his good-humored blue eyes. "Why shouldn't I give the ladies their two months if the ladies want them? Let the poor things take their own time, and welcome. My rights? and my position? Oh, pooh! pooh! I'm in no hurry to be squire of the parish—it's not in my way. What do I mean to do for the two months? What I should have done any how, whether the ladies had staid or not; I mean to go cruising at sea. That's what I like! I've got a new yacht at home in Somersetshire—a yacht of my own building. And I'll tell you what, Sir," continued Allan, seizing the head partner by the arm in the fervor of his friendly intentions, "you look sadly in want of a holiday in the fresh air, and you shall come along with me on the trial-trip of my new vessel. And your partners too, if they like. And the head clerk, who is the best fellow I ever met with in my life. Plenty of room—we'll all shake down together on the floor, and we'll give Mr. Brock a rug on the cabin table. Thorpe-Ambrose be hanged! Do you mean to say if you had built a vessel yourself (as I have) you would go to any estate in the three kingdoms, while your own little beauty was sitting like a duck on the water at home, and waiting for you to try her? You legal gentlemen are great hands at argument. What do you think of that argument? I think it's unanswerable—and I'm off to Somersetshire to-morrow."

With those words the new possessor of eight thousand a year dashed into the head clerk's office, and invited that functionary to a cruise on the high seas, with a smack on the shoulder which was heard distinctly by his masters in the next room. The Firm looked in interrogative wonder at Mr. Brock. A client who could see a position among the landed gentry of England waiting for him, without being in a hurry to occupy it at the earliest possible opportunity, was a client of whom they possessed no previous experience.

"He must have been very oddly brought up," said the lawyers to the rector.

"Very oddly," said the rector to the lawyers.

A last leap over one month more brought Mr. Brock to the present time—to the bedroom at Castletown, in which he was sitting thinking, and to the anxiety which was obstinately intruding itself between him and his night's rest. That anxiety was no unfamiliar enemy to the rector's peace of mind. It had first found him out in Somersetshire six months since, and it had now followed him to the Isle of Man under the inveterately-obtrusive form of Ozias Midwinter.

The change in Allan's future prospects had worked no corresponding alteration in his perverse fancy for the castaway at the village inn. In the midst of the consultations with the lawyers he had found time to visit Midwinter; and on the journey back with the rector there was Allan's friend in the carriage, returning with them to Somersetshire by Allan's own invitation. The ex-usher's hair had grown again on his shaven skull, and his dress showed the renovating influence of an accession of pecuniary means; but in all other respects the man was unchanged. He met Mr. Brock's distrust with the old uncomplaining resignation to it; he maintained the same suspicious silence on the subject of his relatives and his early life; he spoke of Allan's kindness to him with the same undisciplined fervor of gratitude and surprise. "I have done what I could, Sir," he said to Mr. Brock, while Allan was asleep in the railway carriage. "I have kept out of Mr. Armadale's way, and I have not even answered his last letter to me. More than that is more than I can do. I don't ask you to consider my own feeling toward the only human creature who has never suspected and never ill-treated me. I can resist my own feeling, but I can't resist the young gentleman himself. There's not another like him in the world. If we are to be parted again, it must be his doing or yours—not mine. The dog's master has whistled," said this strange man, with a momentary outburst of the hidden passion in him, and a sudden springing of angry tears in his wild brown eyes: "and it's hard, Sir, to blame the dog when the dog comes."

Once more Mr. Brock's humanity got the better of Mr. Brock's caution. He determined to wait, and see what the coming days of social intercourse might bring forth.

The days passed; the yacht was rigged and fitted for sea; a cruise was arranged to the Welsh coast—and Midwinter the Secret was the same Midwinter still. Confinement on board a little vessel of five-and-thirty tons offered no great attraction to a man of Mr. Brock's time of life. But he sailed on the trial trip of the yacht nevertheless, rather than trust Allan alone with his new friend.

Would the close companionship of the three on their cruise tempt the man into talking of his own affairs? No; he was ready enough on other subjects, especially if Allan led the way to them. But not a word escaped him about himself. Mr. Brock tried him with questions about his recent inheritance, and was answered as he had been answered once already at the Somersetshire inn. It was a curious coincidence, Midwinter admitted, that Mr. Armadale's prospects and his own prospects should both have unexpectedly changed for the better about the same time. But there the resemblance ended. It was no large fortune that had fallen into his lap, though it was enough for his wants. It had not reconciled him with his relations, for the money had not come to him as a matter of kindness but as a matter of right. As for the circumstance which had led to his communicating with his family it was not worth mentioning, seeing that the temporary renewal of intercourse which had followed had produced no friendly results. Nothing had come of it but the money—and, with the money, an anxiety which troubled him sometimes, when he woke in the small hours of the morning.

At those last words he became suddenly silent, as if, for once, his well-guarded tongue had betrayed him. Mr. Brock seized the opportunity, and bluntly asked him what the nature of the anxiety might be. Did it relate to money? No; it related to a Letter which had been waiting for him for many years. Had he received the letter? Not yet; it had been left under charge of one of the partners in the firm which had managed the business of his inheritance for him; the partner had been absent from England; and the letter, locked up among his own private papers, could not be got at till he returned. He was expected back toward the latter part of that present May, and if Midwinter could be sure where the cruise would take them to at the close of the month, he thought he would write and have the letter forwarded. Had he any family reasons to be anxious about it? None that he knew of; he was curious to see what had been waiting for him for many years, and that was all. So he answered the rector's questions, with his tawny face turned away over the low bulwark of the yacht, and his fishing-line dragging in his supple brown hands.

Favored by wind and weather, the little vessel had done wonders on her trial-trip. Before the period fixed for the duration of the cruise had half expired the yacht was as high up on the Welsh coast as Holyhead; and Allan, eager for adventure in unknown regions, had declared boldly for an extension of the voyage northward to the Isle of Man. Having ascertained from reliable authority that the weather really promised well for a cruise in that quarter, and that, in the event of any unforeseen necessity for return, the railway was accessible by the steamer from Douglas to Liverpool, Mr. Brock agreed to his pupil's proposal. By that night's post he wrote to Allan's lawyers and to his own rectory, indicating Douglas in the Isle of Man as the next address to which letters might be forwarded. At the post-office he met Midwinter, who had just dropped a letter into the box. Remembering what he had said on board the yacht, Mr. Brock concluded that they had both taken the same precaution, and had ordered their correspondence to be forwarded to the same place.

Late the next day they set sail for the Isle of Man. For a few hours all went well; but sunset brought with it the signs of a coming change. With the darkness the wind rose to a gale; and the question whether Allan and his journeymen had, or had not, built a stout sea-boat was seriously tested for the first time. All that night, after trying vainly to bear up for Holyhead, the little vessel kept the sea, and stood her trial bravely. The next morning the Isle of Man was in view, and the yacht was safe at Castletown. A survey by daylight of hull and rigging showed that all the damage done might be set right again in a week's time. The cruising party had accordingly remained at Castletown; Allan being occupied in superintending the repairs, Mr. Brock in exploring the neighborhood, and Midwinter in making daily pilgrimages on foot, to Douglas and back, to inquire for letters.

The first of the cruising party who received a letter was Allan. "More worries from those everlasting lawyers," was all he said, when he had read the letter, and had crumpled it up in his pocket. The rector's turn came next before the week's sojourn at Castletown had expired.

On the fifth day he found a letter from Somersetshire waiting for him at the hotel. It had been brought there by Midwinter, and it contained news which entirely overthrew all Mr. Brock's holiday plans. The clergyman who had undertaken to do duty for him in his absence had been unexpectedly summoned home again; and Mr. Brock had no choice (the day of the week being Friday) but to cross the next morning from Douglas to Liverpool, and get back by railway on Saturday night in time for Sunday's service.

Having read his letter, and resigned himself to his altered circumstances as patiently as he might, the rector passed next to a question that pressed for serious consideration in its turn. Burdened with his heavy responsibility toward Allan, and conscious of his own undiminished distrust of Allan's new friend, how was he to act in the emergency that now beset him toward the two young men who had been his companions on the cruise?

Mr. Brock had first asked himself that awkward question the Friday afternoon; and he was still trying, vainly, to answer it, alone in his own room, at one o'clock on the Saturday morning. It was then only the end of May, and the residence of the ladies at Thorpe-Ambrose (unless they chose to shorten it of their own accord) would not expire till the middle of June. Even if the repairs of the yacht had been completed (which was not the case), there was no possible pretense for hurrying Allan back to Somersetshire. But one other alternative remained—to leave him where he was. In other words, to leave him, at the turning-point of his life, under the sole influence of a man whom he had first met with as a castaway at a village inn, and who was still, to all practical purposes, a total stranger to him.

In despair of obtaining any better means of enlightenment to guide his decision, Mr. Brock reverted to the impression which Midwinter had produced on his own mind in the familiarity of the cruise.

Young as he was the ex-usher had evidently lived a wild and varied life. He had seen and observed more than most of men of twice his age; his talk showed a strange mixture of sense and absurdity—of vehement earnestness at one time, and fantastic humor at another. He could speak of books like a man who had really enjoyed them; he could take his turn at the helm like a sailor who knew his duty; he could sing, and tell stories, and cook, and climb the rigging, and lay the cloth for dinner, with an odd satirical delight in the exhibition of his own dexterity. The display of these, and other qualities like them, as his spirits rose with the cruise, had revealed the secret of his attraction for Allan plainly enough. But had all disclosures rested there? Had the man let no chance light in on his character in the rector's presence? Very little; and that little did not set him forth in a morally alluring aspect. His way in the world had lain evidently in doubtful places; familiarity with the small villainies of vagabonds peeped out of him now and then; words occasionally slipped off his tongue with an unpleasantly strong flavor about them; and, more significant still, he habitually slept the light suspicious sleep of a man who has been accustomed to close his eyes in doubt of the company under the same roof with him. Down to the very latest moment of the rector's experience of him—down to that present Friday night—his conduct had been persistently secret and unaccountable to the very last. After bringing Mr. Brock's letter to the hotel, he had mysteriously disappeared from the house without leaving any message for his companions, and without letting any body see whether he had, or had not, received a letter himself. At nightfall he had come back stealthily in the darkness—had been caught on the stairs by Allan, eager to tell him of the change in the rector's plans—had listened to the news without a word of remark—and had ended by sulkily locking himself into his own room. What was there in his favor to set against such revelations of his character as these—against his wandering eyes, his obstinate reserve with the rector, his ominous silence on the subject of family and friends? Little or nothing: the sum of all his merits began and ended with his gratitude to Allan.

Mr. Brock left his seat on the side of the bed, trimmed his candle, and, still lost in his own thoughts, looked out absently at the night. The change of place brought no new ideas with it. His retrospect over his own past life had amply satisfied him that his present sense of responsibility rested on no merely fanciful grounds; and having brought him to that point, had left him there, standing at the window, and seeing nothing but the total darkness in his own mind faithfully reflected by the total darkness of the night.

"If I only had a friend to apply to!" thought the rector. "If I could only find some one to help me in this miserable place!"

At the moment when the aspiration crossed his mind it was suddenly answered by a low knock at the door, and a voice said softly in the passage outside, "Let me come in."

After an instant's pause to steady his nerves Mr. Brock opened the door, and found himself at one o'clock in the morning standing face to face on the threshold of his own bedroom with Ozias Midwinter.

"Are you ill?" asked the rector, as soon as his astonishment would allow him to speak.

"I have come here to make a clean breast of it!" was the strange answer. "Will you let me in?"

With those words he walked into the room—his eyes on the ground, his lips ashy pale, and his hand holding something hidden behind him.

"I saw the light under your door," he went on, without looking up, and without moving his hand; "and I know the trouble on your mind which is keeping you from your rest. You are going away to-morrow morning, and you don't like leaving Mr. Armadale alone with a stranger like me."

Startled as he was, Mr. Brock saw the serious necessity of being plain with a man who had come at that time, and had said those words to him.

"You have guessed right," he answered. "I stand in the place of a father to Allan Armadale, and I am naturally unwilling to leave him, at his age, with a man whom I don't know."

Ozias Midwinter took a step forward to the table. His wandering eyes rested on the rector's New Testament, which was one of the objects lying on it.

"You have read that Book, in the years of a long life, to many congregations," he said. "Has it taught you mercy to your miserable fellow-creatures?"

Without waiting to be answered, he looked Mr. Brock in the face for the first time, and brought his hidden hand slowly into view.

"Read that," he said; "and, for Christ's sake, pity me when you know who I am."

He laid a letter of many pages on the table. It was the letter that Mr. Neal had posted at Wildbad nineteen years since.

AN AMERICAN WAR CORRESPONDENT IN ENGLAND.

THE boy's vague dream of foreign adventure had passed away; my purpose was of a tamer and more practical cast; it was resolved to this problem: "How could I travel abroad and pay my expenses?"

Evidently no money could be made by home correspondence. The new order of journals had no charity for fine moral descriptions of church steeples, ruined castles, and picture galleries; I knew too little of foreign politics to give the republic its semi-weekly "sensation;" and exchange was too high at the depreciated value of currency to yield me even a tolerable reward. But might I not reverse the policy of the peripatetics, and, instead of turning my European experiences into American gold, make my knowledge of America a bill of credit for England?

What capital had I for this essay? I was twenty-one years of age; the last three years of my minority had been passed among the newspapers; I knew indifferently well the distribution of parties, the theory of the government, the personalities of public men, the causes of the great civil strife. And I had mounted to my saddle in the beginning of the war, and followed the armies of McClellan and Pope over their sanguinary battle-fields. The possibility thrilled me, like a novel discovery, that the old world might be willing to hear of the new as I could depict it, fresh from the theatre of action. At great expense foreign correspondents had been sent to our shores whose ignorance and confidence had led them into egregious blunders; for their traveling outlay merely, I would have guaranteed thrice the information, and my sanguine conceit half persuaded me that I could present it as acceptably. I did not wait to ponder upon this suggestion. The guns of the second action of Bull Run growled a farewell to me as I resigned my horse and equipments to a successor. With a trifle more money than that with which Bayard Taylor set out, I took passage on a steamer, and landed at Liverpool on the 1st of October, 1862.

Among my acquaintances upon the ship had been a semi-literary adventurer from New England. I surmised that his funds were not more considerable than my own; and indeed, when he comprehended my plans, he confessed as much, and proposed to join enterprises with me.

"Did you ever make a public lecture?" he asked.

Now I had certain blushing recollections of having entertained a suburban congregation, long before, with didactic critiques upon Byron, Keats, and the popular poets. I replied, therefore, misgivingly, in the affirmative, and Hipp, the interrogator, exclaimed at once:

"Let us make a lecturing tour in England, and divide the expenses and the work; you will describe the war, and I will act as your agent."

With true Yankee persistence Hipp developed his idea, and I consented to try the experiment, though with grave scruples. It would require much nerve to talk to strange people upon an excitable topic; and a camp fever, which among other things I had gained on the Chickahominy, had enfeebled me to the last degree.

However, I went to work at once, inditing the pages in a snug parlor of a modest Liverpool inn, while Hipp sounded the patrons and landlord as to the probable success of our adventure. Opinions differed; public lectures in the old world had been generally gratuitous, except in rare cases, but the genial Irish proprietor of the Post advised me to go on without hesitation.

We selected for the initial night a Lancashire sea-side town, a summer resort for the people of Liverpool, and filled at that time with invalids and pleasure-seekers. Hipp, who was a sort of American Crichton, managed the business details with consummate tact. I was announced as the eye-witness and participator of a hundred actions, fresh from the bloodiest fields and still smelling of saltpetre. My horse had been shot as I carried a General's orders under the fire of a score of batteries, and I was connected with journals whose reputations were world-wide. Disease had compelled me to forsake the scenes of my heroism, and I had consented to enlighten the Lancashire public, through the solicitation of the nobility and gentry. Some of the latter had indeed honored the affair with their patronage.

We secured the three village newspapers by writing them descriptive letters. The parish rector and the dissenting preachers were waited upon and presented with family tickets; while we placarded the town till it was scarcely recognizable to the oldest inhabitant.

On the morning of the eventful day I arrived in the place. The best room of the best inn had been engaged for me, and waiters in white aprons, standing in rows, bowed me over the portal. The servant girls and gossips had fugitive peeps at me through the cracks of my door, and I felt for the first time all the oppressiveness of greatness. As I walked on the quay where the crowds were strolling, looking out upon the misty sea, at the donkeys on the beach, and at the fishing smacks huddled under the far-reaching pier, I saw my name in huge letters borne on the banner of a bill-poster, and all the people stopping to read as he wound in and out among them.

How few thought the thin, sallow young man, in wide breeches and square-toed boots, who shambled by them so shamefacedly, to be the veritable Mentor who had crossed the ocean for their benefit. Indeed the embarrassing responsibility I had assumed now appeared to me in all its vividness.

My confidence sensibly declined; my sensitiveness amounted to nervousness; I had half a mind to run away and leave the show entirely to Hipp. But when I saw that child of the Mayflower stolidly, shrewdly going about his business, working the wires like an old operator, making the largest amount of thunder from so small a cloud, I was rebuked of my faint-heartedness. In truth, not the least of my misgivings was Hipp's extraordinary zeal. He gave the townsmen to understand that I was a prodigy of oratory, whose battle-sketches would harrow up their souls and thrill them like a martial summons. It brought the blush to my face to see him talking to knots of old men after the fashion of a town-crier at a puppet-booth, and I wondered whether I occupied a more reputable rank, after all, than a strolling gymnast, giant, or dwarf.

As the twilight came on my position became ludicrously unenviable. The lights in the town-hall were lit. I passed pallidly twice or thrice, and would have given half my fortune if the whole thing had been over. But the minutes went on; the interval diminished: I faced the crisis at last and entered the arena.

There sat Hipp, taking money at the head of the stairs, with piles of tickets before him; and as he rose, gravely respectful, the janitor and some loiterers took off their hats while I passed. I entered the little bare dressing-room; my throat was parched as fever, my hands were hot and tremulous; I felt my heart sag. How the rumble of expectant feet in the audience-room shook me! I called myself a poltroon, and fingered my neck-tie, and smoothed my hair before the mirror. Another burst of impatient expectation made me start: I opened the door, and stood before my destiny.

The place was about one-third filled with a representative English audience, the males preponderating in number. They watched me intently as I mounted the steps of the rostrum and arranged my port-folio upon a musical tripod; then I seated myself for a moment, and tried to still the beating of my foolish heart.

How strangely acute were my perceptions of every thing before me! I looked from face to face and analyzed the expressions, counted the lines down the corduroy pantaloons, measured the heavily-shod English feet, numbered the rows of benches and the tubes of the chandeliers, and figured up the losing receipts from this unremunerative audience.

Then I rose, coughed, held the house for the last time in severe review, and repeated:

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—A grand contest agitates America and the world. The people of the two sections of the great North American Republic having progressed in harmony for almost a century, and become a formidable power among the nations, are now divided and at enmity; they have consecrated with blood their fairest fields, and built monuments of bones in their most beautiful valleys," etc.

For perhaps five minutes every thing went on smoothly. I was pleased with the clearness of my voice; then, as I referred to the origin of the war, and denounced the traitorous conspiracy to disrupt the republic, faint mutterings arose, amounting to interruptions at last. The sympathies of my audience were in the main with the secession. There were cheers and counter cheers; storms of "Hear, hear," and "No, no," until a certain youth, in a sort of legal monkey-jacket and with ponderously professional gold seals, so distinguished himself by exclamations that I singled him out as a mark for my bitterest periods.

But while I was thus the main actor in this curious scene, a strange, startling consciousness grew apace upon me; the room was growing dark; my voice replied to me like a far, hollow echo: I knew—I knew that I was losing my consciousness—that I was about to faint! Words can not describe my humiliation at this discovery. I set my lips hard and straightened my limbs; raised my voice to a shrill, defiant pitch, and struggled in the dimming horror to select my adversary in the monkey-jacket and overwhelm him with bitter apostrophes. In vain! The novelty, the excitement, the enervation of that long, consuming fever mastered my overtaxed physique. I knew that if I did not cease I should fall senseless to the floor. Only in the last bitter instant did I confess my disability with the best grace I could assume.

"My friends," I said, gaspingly, "this is my first appearance in your country, and I am but just convalescent; my head is a little weak. Will you kindly bear with me a moment while the janitor gets me a glass of water?"

A hearty burst of applause took the sting from my mortification. A bald old gentleman in the front row gravely rose and said, "Let me send for a drop of brandy for our young guest." They waited patiently and kindly till my faintness passed away, and when I rose a genuine English cheer shook the place.

I often hear it again when, here in my own country, I would speak bitterly of Englishmen, and it softens the harshness of my condemnation.

But I now addressed myself feverishly to my task, and my disgrace made me vehement and combative. I glared upon the individual in the monkey-jacket as if he had been Mr. Jefferson Davis himself, and read him a scathing indictment. The man in the monkey-jacket was not to be scathed. He retorted more frequently than before; he was guilty of the most hardy contempt of court. He was determined not to agree with me, and said so.

"Sir," I exclaimed at last, "pray reserve your remarks till the end of the lecture, and you shall have the platform."

"I shall be quite willing, I am sure," said the man in the monkey-jacket with imperturbable effrontery.

Then, as I continued, the contest grew interesting; explosions of "No, no" were interrupted with volleys of "Ay, ay" from my adherents. Hipp, who had squared accounts, made all the applause in his power, standing in the main threshold, and the little auditory became a ringing arena, where we fought without flinching, standing foot to foot and drawing fire for fire. The man in the monkey-jacket broke his word: silence was not his forte; he hurled denials and counter-charges vociferously; he was full of gall and bitterness, and when I closed the last page and resumed my chair he sprang from his place to claim the platform.

"Stop," cried Hipp, in his hard nasal tone, striding forward; "you have interrupted the lecturer after giving your parole; we recall our promise, as you have not stood by yours. Janitor, put out the lights!"

The bald old gentleman quietly rose. "In England," he said, "we give everybody fair play; tokens of assent and dissent are commonly made in all our public meetings; let us have a hearing for our townsman."

"Certainly," I replied, giving him my hand at the top of the stairs; "nothing would afford me more pleasure."

The man in the monkey-jacket then made a sweeping speech, full of loose charges against the Americans, and expressive of sympathy with the rebellion; but, at the finishing, he proposed, as the sentiment of the meeting, a vote of thanks to me, which was amended by another to include himself. Many of the people shook hands with me at the door, and the bald old gentleman led me to his wife and daughter, whose benignities were almost parental.

"Poor young man!" said the old lady; "a must take care of 'is 'ealth; will a come hoom wi' Tummas and me and drink a bit o' tea?"

I strolled about the place for twenty-four hours on good terms with many townsmen, while Hipp, full of pluck and business, was posting me against all the dead walls of a farther village. Again and again I sketched the war-episodes I had followed, gaining fluency and confidence as by degrees my itinerant profession lost its novelty, but we as steadily lost money. The houses were invariably bad; we had the same fiery discussions every evening, but the same meagre receipts, and in every market town of northwestern Lancashire we buried a portion of our little capital, till once, after talking myself hoarse to a respectable audience of empty benches, Hipp and I looked blankly into each other's faces and silently put our last gold pieces upon the table. We were three thousand miles from home, and the possessors of ten sovereigns apiece. I reached out my hand with a pale smile:

"Old fellow," I said, "let us comfort ourselves by the assurance that we have deserved success. The time has come to say good-by."

"As you will," said Hipp; "it is all the fault of this pig-headed nation. Now I dare say if we had brought a panorama of the war along it would have been a stunning success; but standing upon high literary and forensic ground, of course they can't appreciate us. Confound 'em!"

I think that Hipp has since had but two notions—the exhibition of that panorama, or, in the event of its failure, a declaration of war against the British people. He followed me to Liverpool, and bade me adieu at Birkenhead, I going Londonward with scarcely enough money to pay my passage, and he to start next day for Belfast, to lecture upon his own hook, or, failing (as he afterward did), to recross the Atlantic in the steerage of a ship.

My feelings, as the train bore me steadily through the Welsh border, by the clustering smoke-stacks of Birmingham, by the castled tower of Warwick, and along the head waters of the Thames and Avon, were not of the most enthusiastic description. I had no money and no friends; I had sent to America for a remittance, but in the interval of six weeks required for a reply, must eat and drink and lodge, and London was wide and pitiless, even if I dared stoop to beg assistance.

Let no young man be tempted to put the sea between his home and himself, how seductive soever be the experiences of book-makers and poetic pedestrians. One hour's contemplation of poverty in foreign lands will line the boy's face with the wrinkles of years, and burn into his soul that withering dependency which will rankle long after his privations are forgotten.

In truth my circumstances were so awkward that my very desperation kept me calm. I had a formal letter to one English publisher, but not any friendly line whatever to any body; and as the possibilities of sickness, debt, enemies, came to mind, I felt that I was no longer the hero of a romance, but face to face with a hard, practical, terrible reality. It was night when I landed at the Paddington Station, and taking an omnibus for Charing Cross, watched the long lines of lamps on Oxford Street, and the glitter of the Haymarket theatres, and at last the hard splash of the fountains in Trafalgar Square, with the stony statues grouped so rigidly about the column to Nelson.

I walked down Strand with my carpet-bags in my hands, through Fleet Street and under Temple Bar, till, weary at last of sheer exercise,

I dropped into a little ale-house under a great, grinning lantern which said, in the crisp tone of patronage, the one word, "beds." They put me under the tiles, with the chimney-stacks for my neighbors, and I lay awake all night meditating expedients for the morrow; so far from regret or foreboding, I longed for the daylight to come that I might commence my task, confident that I could not fail where so many had succeeded. They were, indeed, inspirations which looked in upon me at the dawn. The dome of St. Paul's guarding Paternoster Row, with Milton's school in the back-ground, and hard by the Player's Court, where, in lieu of Shakspeare's company, the American presses of the Times shook the kingdom and the continent. I thought of Johnson as I passed Bolt Alley, of Chatterton at Shoe Lane, of Goldsmith as I put my foot upon his grave under the eaves of the Temple.

The public has nothing to do with the sacrifices by which my private embarrassment received temporary relief. Though half the race of authors had been in similar straits, I would not, for all their success, undergo again such self-humiliation. It is enough to say that I obtained lodgings in Islington, close to the home of Charles Lamb, and near Irving's Canterbury tower; and that between writing articles on the American war, and strategic efforts to pay my board, two weeks of feverish loneliness drifted away.

I made but one friend: a young Englishman of radical proclivities, who had passed some years in America among books and newspapers, and was now editing the foreign column of the Illustrated London News. He was a brave, needy fellow, full of heart, but burdened with a wife and children, and too honestly impolitic to gain money with his fine abilities by writing down his own unpopular sentiments. He helped me with advice and otherwise.

"If you mean to work for the journals," he said, "I fear you will be disappointed. I have tried six years to get upon some daily London paper. The editorial positions are always filled; you know too little of the geography and society of the town to be a reporter, and such miscellaneous recollections of the war as you possess will not be available for a mere newspaper. But the magazines are always ready to purchase if you can get access to them. In that quarter you might do well."

I found that the serials to which my friend recommended me shared his own advanced sentiments, but were unfortunately without money. So I made my way to the counter of the Messrs. Chambers, and left for its junior partner an introductory note. The reply was to this effect. I violate no confidence, I think, in reproducing it:

"SIR,—I shall be glad to see any friend of ———, and may be found," etc., etc. "I fear that articles upon the American war, written by an American, will not, however, be acceptable in this journal, as the public here take a widely different view of the contest from that entertained in your own country, and the feeling of horror is deepening fast."

Undeterred by this frank avowal I waited upon the publisher at the appointed time—a fine, athletic, white-haired Scotchman, whose name is known where that of greater authors can not reach, and who has written with his own hand as much as Dumas père. He met me with warm cordiality, rare to Englishmen, and when I said, “Sir, I do not wish the use of your paper to circulate my opinions—only my experiences,” he took me at once to his editor, and gave me a personal introduction. Fortunately I had brought with me a paper which I submitted on the spot; it was entitled, “Literature of the American War,” collated from such campaign ballads as I could remember, eked out with my own, and strung together with explanatory and critical paragraphs. The third day following I received this announcement in shockingly bad handwriting:

“D’r Sir,

“Yr article will suit us.

“The ed. C. J.”

For every word in this communication I afterward obtained a guinea. The money not being due till after the appearance of the article, I anticipated it with various sketches, stories, etc., all of which were largely fanciful or descriptive, and contained no paragraph which I wish to recall. In other directions I was less successful. Of two daily journals to which I offered my services, one declined to answer my letter, and the other demanded a quarto of credentials.

So I lived a fugitive existence, a practical illustration of Irving’s “Poor Devil Author,” looking as often into pastry-shop windows, testing all manner of cheap Pickwickian veal-pies, breakfasting upon a chop, and supping upon a herring in my suburban residence, but keeping up pluck and chique so deceptively that nobody in the place suspected me of poverty.

I went for some American inventors to a rifle ground, and explained to the Lords of the Admiralty the merits of a new projectile; wrote letters to all the Continental sovereigns for an itinerant and independent ambassador, and was at last so poor that my only writing papers were a druggist’s waste bill-heads. An article with no other “backing” than this was fortunate enough to stray into the Cornhill Magazine. I found that its proprietor kept a banking-house in Pall Mall, and doubtful of my welcome on Cornhill, ventured one day in my unique American costume—slouched hat, wide garments, and square-toed boots—to send to him directly my card. He probably thought from its face that a relative of Mr. Mason’s was about to open an extensive account with him. As it was, once admitted to his presence, he could not escape me. The manuscript lay in his hands before he fully comprehended my purpose. He was a fine specimen of the English publisher—robust, ruddy, good-naturedly acute—and as he said with a smile that he would waive routine and take charge of my copy, I knew that the same hands had fastened upon the crude pages of Jane Eyre, and the best labors of Hazlitt, Ruskin, Leigh Hunt, and Thackeray.

Two more weary weeks elapsed; I found it pleasant to work, but very trying to wait. At the end my courage very nearly failed. I reached the era of self-accusation; to make myself forget myself I took long, ardent marches into the open country; followed the authors I had worshiped through the localities they had made reverend; lost myself in dreaminesses—those precursors of death in the snow—and wished myself back in the ranks of the North, to go down in the frenzy, rather than thus drag out a life of civil indigence, robbing at once my brains and my stomach.

One morning as I sat in my little Islington parlor, wishing that the chop I had just eaten had gone farther, and taking a melancholy inventory of the threadbare carpet and rheumatic chairs, the door-knocker fell; there were steps in the hall; my name was mentioned.

A tall young gentleman approached me with a letter: I received him with a strange nervousness; was there any crime in my record, I asked fitfully, for which I had been traced to this obscure suburb for condign arrest and decapitation? Ha! ha! it was my heart, not my lips, that laughed. I could have cried out like Enoch Arden in his dying apostrophe:

“A sail! a sail!

I am saved!”

for the note in the publisher’s own handwriting said this, and more:

“DEAR SIR,—I shall be glad to send you fifteen guineas immediately in return for your article on General Pope’s Campaign, if the price will suit you.”

But I suppressed my enthusiasm. I spoke patronizingly to the young gentleman. Dr. Johnson at the brewer’s vendue could not have been more learnedly sonorous.

“You may say in return, Sir, that the sum named will remunerate me.”

At the same time the instinct was intense to seize the youth by the throat and tell him that if the remittance was delayed beyond the morning I would have his heart’s-blood! I should have liked to thrust him into the coal-hole as a hostage for its prompt arrival, or send one of his ears to the publishing house with a warning, after the manner of the Neapolitan brigands.

That afternoon I walked all the way to Edmonton, over John Gilpin’s route, and boldly invested two-pence in beer at the time-honored Bell Inn. I disdained to ride back upon the omnibus for the sum of three-pence, but returned on foot the entire eight miles, and thought it only a league. Next day my check came duly to hand—a very formidable check, with two pen-marks drawn across its face. I carried it to Threadneedle Street by the unfrequented routes, to avoid having my pockets picked, and presented it to the cashier, wondering if he knew me to be a foreign gentleman who had written for the Cornhill Magazine. The cashier looked rather contemptuous, I thought, being evidently a soulless character with no literary affinities.

"Sir," he said, curtly, "this check is crossed."

"Sir!"

"We can't cash the check; it is crossed."

"What do you mean by crossed?"

"Just present it where you got it, and you will find out."

The cashier regarded me as if I had offered a ticket of leave rather than an order for the considerable amount of seventy-five dollars. I left that banking house a broken man, and stopped with a long, long face at a broker's to ask for an explanation.

"Yesh, yesh," said the little man, whose German silver spectacles sat upon a bulbously Oriental nose; "ze monish ish never paid on a croshed sheque. If one hash a bank-account, you know, zat ish different. Ze gentleman who gif you dis sheque had no bishness to crosh it if you have no banker."

I was too vain to go back to Cornhill and confess that I had neither purse nor purser; so I satisfied the broker that the affair was correct, and he cashed the bill for five shillings.

That was the end of my necessities; money came from home, from this and that serial; my published articles were favorably noticed, and opened the market to me. Whatever I penned found sale; and some correspondence that I had leisure to fulfill for America brought me steady receipts.

Had I been prudent with my means, and prompt to advantage myself of opportunities, I might have obtained access to the best literary society, and sold my compositions for correspondingly higher prices. Social standing in English literature is of equal consequence with genius. The poor Irish governess can not find a publisher, but Lady Morgan takes both critics and readers by storm. A duchess's name on the title-page protects the fool in the letter-press; irreverent republicanism is not yet so great a respecter of persons. I was often invited out to dinner, and went to the expense of a dress-coat and kids, without which one passes the genteel British portal at his peril; but found that both the expense and the stateliness of "society" were onerous. In this department I had no perseverance; but when one evening I sat with the author of "Vanity Fair" in the concert rooms at Covent Garden, as Colonel Newcome and Clive had done before me, and took my beer and mutton with those kindly eyes measuring me through their spectacles, I felt that such grand companionship lifted me from the errantry of my career into the dignity of a renowned art.

I moved my lodgings after three months to a pleasant square of the West End, where I had for associates, among others, several American artists. Strange men were they to be so far from home; but I have since found that the poorer one is the farther he travels, and the majority of these were quite destitute. Two of them only had permanent employment; a few, now and then, sold a design to a magazine; the mass went out sketching to kill time, and trusted to Providence for dinner. But they were good fellows for the most part, kindly to one another, and meeting in their lodgings, where their tenure was uncertain, to score Millais, or praise Rossetti, or overwhelm Frith.

My own life meantime passed smoothly. I had no rivals of my own nationality; though one expatriated person, whose name I have not heard, was writing a series of prejudiced articles for Fraser, which he signed "A White Republican." I thought him a very dirty white. One or two English travelers at the same time were making amusingly stupid notices of America in some of the second-rate monthlies; and Maxwell, a bustling Irishman, who owns Temple Bar, the Saint James, and Sixpenny Magazine, and some half dozen other serials, was employing a man to invent all varieties of rubbish upon a country which he had never beheld nor comprehended.

After a few months the passages of the war with which I was cognizant lost their interest by reason of later occurrences. I found myself, so to speak, wedged out of the market by new literary importations. The enforcement of the draft brought to Europe many naturalized countrymen of mine, whose dislike of America was not lessened by their unceremonious mode of departure from it; and it is to these, the mass of whom are familiarly known in the journals of this country, that we owe the most insidious, because the best informed, detraction of us. Macmillan's Magazine did us sterling service through the papers of Edward Dicey, the best literary feuilletonist in England; and Professor Newman, J. Stuart Mill, and others, gave us the limited influence of the Westminster Review. The Cornhill was neutral; Chambers's respectfully inimical; Bentley and Colburn antagonistically flat; Maxwell's tri-visaged publications grinningly abusive; Good Words had neither good nor bad words for us; Once a Week and All the Year Round gave us a shot now and then. Blackwood and Fraser disliked our form of government and all its manifestations. The rest of the Reviews, as far as I could see, pitied and berated us pompously. It was more than once suggested to me to write an experimental paper upon the failure of republicanism; but I knew only one American—a New York correspondent—who lent himself to a systematic abuse of the Government which permitted him to reside in it. He obtained a newsboy's fame, and, I suspect, earned considerable. He is dead: let any who love him shorten his biography by three years.

However, I at last concluded a book—if I may so call what never resulted in a volume—at which, from the first, I had been pegging away. I called it "The War Correspondent," and made it the literal record of my adventures in the saddle. When some six hundred MS. pages were done I sent it to a publisher; he politely sent it back. I forwarded it to a rival house; in this respect only both houses were agreed. Having some dim recollection of the early trials of authors I perseveringly gave that copy the freedom of the city; the verdict upon it was marvelously identical, but the manner of declension was always soothing. They separately advised me not to be content with one refusal, but to try some other house, though I came at last to think, by the regularity of its transit to and fro, that one house only had been its recipient from the first.

At last, assured of its positive failure, I took what seemed to be the most philosophic course—neither tossing it into the Thames, after the fashion of a famous novelist, nor littering my floor with its fragments, and dying amidst them like a chiffonnier in his den: I cut the best paragraphs out of it, strung them together, and published it by separate articles in the serials. My name failed to be added to the British Museum Catalogue; but that circumstance is, at the present time, a matter of no regret whatever.

When done with the war I took to story-writing, using many half-forgotten incidents of American police-reporting, of border warfare, of the development of civilization among the pioneers, of thralldom in the South, and the gold search on the Pacific. The majority of these traveled across the water, and were republished. And when America, in the garb of either fact or fiction, lost novelty, I entered the wide field of miscellaneous literature among a thousand competitors.

An author's ticket to the British Museum Reading-room put the whole world so close around me that I could touch it every where. I never entered the noble rotunda of that vast collection without an emotion of littleness and awe. Lit only from the roof, it reminded me of the Roman Pantheon; and truly all the gods whom I had worshiped sat, not in statue, but in substance, along its radiating tables, or trod its noiseless floors. Half the literature of our language flows from thence. One may see at a glance grave naturalists knee-deep in ichthyological tomes, or buzzing over entomology; pale zealots copying Arabic characters, with the end to rebuild Bethlehem or the ruins of Mecca; biographers gloating over some rare original letter; periodical writers filching from two centuries ago for their next "new" article. The Marquis of Lansdown is dead: you may see the Times reporter yonder running down the events of his career. Poland is in arms again, and the clever compiler farther on means to make twenty pounds out of it by summing up her past risings and ruins. The bruisers King and Mace fought yesterday, and the plodding person close by from Bell's Life is gleaning their antecedents. Half the litterati of our age do but like these bind the present to the past. A great library diminishes the number of thinkers; the grand fountains of philosophy and science ran before types were so facile or letters became a trade.

The novelty of this life soon wore away, and I found myself the creature of no romance, but plodding along a prosy road with very practical people.

I carried my MSS. into Paternoster Row like any body's book-keeper, and accused the world of no particular ingratitude that it could not read my name with my articles, and that it gave itself no concern to discover me. Yet there was a private pleasure in the congeniality of my labor, and in the consciousness that I could float upon my quill even in this vast London sea. Once or twice my articles went across the Channel and returned in foreign dress. I wonder if I shall ever again feel the thrill of that first recognition of my offspring coming to my knee with their strange French prattle.

I was not uniformly successful, but, if rejected, my MSS. were courteously returned, with a note from the editor. As a sample I give the following. The original is a lithographed facsimile of the handwriting of Mr. Dickens, printed in blue ink, the date and the title of the manuscript being in another handwriting:

OFFICE OF "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

A WEEKLY JOURNAL CONDUCTED BY CHARLES DICKENS.

No. 26 WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W. C.

January 27, 1863.

Mr. Charles Dickens begs to thank the writer of the paper entitled "A Battle Sunday" for having done him the favor to offer it as a contribution to these pages. He much regrets, however, that it is not suited to the requirements of "All the Year Round."

The manuscript will be returned, under cover, if applied for as above.

The prices of miscellaneous articles in London are remunerative. Twenty-four shillings a magazine page is the common valuation; but specially interesting papers rate higher. Literature as a profession, in England, is more certain and more progressive than with us. It is not debased with the heavy leaven of journalism. Among the many serial publications of London, ability, tact, and industry should always find a liberal market. There is less of the vagrancy of letters—Bohemianism, Mohicanism, or what not—in London than in either New York or Paris.

I think we have the cleverer fugitive writers in America, but those of England seemed to me to have more self-respect and conscientiousness. The soul of the scribe need never be in pledge if there are many masters.

While a good writer in any department can find work across the water, I would advise no one to go abroad with this assurance solely. My success—if so that can be called which yielded me life, not profit—was circumstantial, and can not be repeated. I should be loth to try it again upon purely literary merits.

After nine months of experiment I bade the insular metropolis adieu, and returned no more. The Continent was close and beckoning; I heard the confusion of her tongues, and saw the shafts of her Gothic Babels probing the clouds, and for another year I roamed among her cities, as ardent and errant as when I went afield on my pony to win the spurs of a War Correspondent.

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

IN FOUR BOOKS.—BOOK THE SECOND. BIRDS OF A FEATHER.

CHAPTER VII.

IN WHICH A FRIENDLY MOVE IS ORIGINATED.

THE arrangement between Mr. Boffin and his literary man, Mr. Silas Wegg, so far altered with the altered habits of Mr. Boffin's life, as that the Roman Empire usually declined in the morning and in the eminently aristocratic family mansion, rather than in the evening, as of yore, and in Boffin's Bower. There were occasions, however, when Mr. Boffin, seeking a brief refuge from the blandishments of fashion, would present himself at the Bower after dark, to anticipate the next sallying forth of Wegg, and would there, on the old settle, pursue the downward fortunes of those enervated and corrupted masters of the world who were by this time on their last legs. If Wegg had been worse paid for his office, or better qualified to discharge it, he would have considered these visits complimentary and agreeable; but, holding the position of a handsomely-remunerated humbug, he resented them. This was quite according to rule, for the incompetent servant, by whomsoever er employed, is always against his employer. Even those born governors, noble and right honorable creatures, who have been the most imbecile in high places, have uniformly shown themselves the most opposed (sometimes in belying distrust, sometimes in vapid insolence) to their employer. What is in such wise true of the public master and servant, is equally true of the private master and servant all the world over.

When Mr. Silas Wegg did at last obtain free access to "Our House," as he had been wont to call the mansion outside which he had sat shel-terless so long, and when he did at last find it in all particulars as different from his mental plans of it as according to the nature of things it well could be, that far-seeing and far-reaching character, by way of asserting himself and making out a case for compensation, affected to fall into a melancholy strain of musing over the mournful past; as if the house and he had had a fall in life together.

"And this, Sir," Silas would say to his patron, sadly nodding his head and musing, "was once Our House! This, Sir, is the building from which I have so often seen those great creatures, Miss Elizabeth, Master George, Aunt Jane, and Uncle Parker"—whose very names were of his own inventing—"pass and repass! And has it come to this, indeed! Ah dear me, dear me!"

So tender were his lamentations, that the kindly Mr. Boffin was quite sorry for him, and almost felt mistrustful that in buying the house he had done him an irreparable injury.

Two or three diplomatic interviews, the result of great subtlety on Mr. Wegg's part, but assuming the mask of careless yielding to a fortuitous combination of circumstances, impelling him toward Clerkenwell, had enabled him to complete his bargain with Mr. Venus.

"Bring me round to the Bower," said Silas, when the bargain was closed, "next Saturday evening, and if a sociable glass of old Jamaikay warm should meet your views, I am not the man to begrudge it."

"You are aware of my being poor company, Sir," replied Mr. Venus, "but be it so."

It being so, here is Saturday evening come, and here is Mr. Venus come, and ringing at the Bower-gate.

Mr. Wegg opens the gate, descries a sort of brown paper truncheon under Mr. Venus's arm, and remarks, in a dry tone: "Oh! I thought perhaps you might have come in a cab."

"No, Mr. Wegg," replies Venus. "I am not above a parcel."

"Above a parcel! No!" says Wegg, with some dissatisfaction. But does not openly growl, "a certain sort of parcel might be above you."

"Here is your purchase, Mr. Wegg," says Venus, politely handing it over, "and I am glad to restore it to the source from whence it—flowed."

"Thankee," says Wegg. "Now this affair is concluded, I may mention to you in a friendly way that I've my doubts whether, if I had consulted a lawyer, you could have kept this article back from me. I only throw it out as a legal point."

"Do you think so, Mr. Wegg? I bought you in open contract."

"You can't buy human flesh and blood in this country, Sir; not alive, you can't," says Wegg, shaking his head. "Then query, bone?"

"As a legal point?" asks Venus.

"As a legal point."

"I am not competent to speak upon that, Mr. Wegg," says Venus, reddening and growing something louder; "but upon a point of fact I think myself competent to speak; and as a point of fact I would have seen you—will you allow me to say, further?"

"I wouldn't say more than further, if I was you," Mr. Wegg suggests, pacifically.

"—Before I'd have given that packet into your hand without being paid my price for it. I don't pretend to know how the point of law may stand, but I'm thoroughly confident upon the point of fact."

As Mr. Venus is irritable (no doubt owing to his disappointment in love), and as it is not the cue of Mr. Wegg to have him out of temper, the latter gentleman soothingly remarks, "I only put it as a little case; I only put it ha'porthetically."

"Then I'd rather, Mr. Wegg, you put it another time, penn'orthetically," is Mr. Venus's retort, "for I tell you candidly I don't like your little cases."

Arrived by this time in Mr. Wegg's sitting-room, made bright on the chilly evening by gas-light and fire, Mr. Venus softens and compliments him on his abode; profiting by the occasion to remind Wegg that he (Venus) told him he had got into a good thing.

"Tolerable," Wegg rejoins. "But bear in mind, Mr. Venus, that there's no gold without its alloy. Mix for yourself and take a seat in the chimbley-corner. Will you perform upon a pipe, Sir?"

"I am but an indifferent performer, Sir," returns the other; "but I'll accompany you with a whiff or two at intervals."

So, Mr. Venus mixes, and Wegg mixes; and Mr. Venus lights and puffs, and Wegg lights and puffs.

"And there's alloy even in this metal of yours, Mr. Wegg, you was remarking?"

"Mystery," returns Wegg. "I don't like it, Mr. Venus. I don't like to have the life knocked out of former inhabitants of this house, in the gloomy dark, and not know who did it."

"Might you have any suspicions, Mr. Wegg?"

"No," returns that gentleman. "I know who profits by it. But I've no suspicions."

Having said which, Mr. Wegg smokes and looks at the fire with a most determined expression of Charity; as if he had caught that cardinal virtue by the skirts as she felt it her painful duty to depart from him, and held her by main force.

"Similarly," resumes Wegg, "I have observations as I can offer upon certain points and parties; but I make no objections, Mr. Venus. Here is an immense fortune drops from the clouds upon a person that shall be nameless. Here is a weekly allowance, with a certain weight of coals, drops from the clouds upon me. Which of us is the better man? Not the person that shall be nameless. That's an observation of mine, but I don't make it an objection. I take my allowance and my certain weight of coals. He takes his fortune. That's the way it works."

"It would be a good thing for me if I could see things in the calm light you do, Mr. Wegg."

"Again look here," pursues Silas, with an oratorical flourish of his pipe and his wooden leg: the latter having an undignified tendency to tilt him back in his chair; "here's another observation, Mr. Venus, unaccompanied with an objection. Him that shall be nameless is liable to be talked over. He gets talked over. Him that shall be nameless, having me at his right hand, naturally looking to be promoted higher, and you may perhaps say meriting to be promoted higher—"

(Mr. Venus murmurs that he does say so.)

"—Him that shall be nameless, under such circumstances passes me by, and puts a talking-over stranger above my head. Which of us two is the better man? Which of us two can repeat most poetry? Which of us two has, in the service of him that shall be nameless, tackled the Romans, both civil and military, till he has got as husky as if he'd been weaned and ever since brought up on saw-dust? Not the talking-over stranger. Yet the house is as free to him as if it was his, and he has his room, and is put upon a footing, and draws about a thousand a year. I am banished to the Bower, to be found in it like a piece of furniture whenever wanted. Merit, therefore, don't win. That's the way it works. I observe it, because I can't help observing it, being accustomed to take a powerful sight of notice; but I don't object. Ever here before, Mr. Venus?"

"Not inside the gate, Mr. Wegg."

"You've been as far as the gate then, Mr. Venus?"

"Yes, Mr. Wegg, and peeped in from curiosity."

"Did you see any thing?"

"Nothing but the dust-yard."

Mr. Wegg rolls his eyes all round the room, in that ever unsatisfied quest of his, and then rolls his eyes all round Mr. Venus; as if suspicious of his having something about him to be found out.

"And yet, Sir," he pursues, "being acquainted with old Mr. Harmon, one would have thought it might have been polite in you, too, to give him a call. And you're naturally of a polite disposition, you are." This last clause as a softening compliment to Mr. Venus.

"It is true, Sir," replies Venus, winking his weak eyes, and running his fingers through his dusty shock of hair, "that I was so, before a certain observation soured me. You understand to what I allude, Mr. Wegg? To a certain written statement respecting not wishing to be regarded in a certain light. Since that all is fled, save gall."

"Not all," says Mr. Wegg, in a tone of sentimental condolence.

"Yes, Sir," returns Venus, "all! The world may deem it harsh, but I'd quite as soon pitch into my best friend as not. Indeed, I'd sooner!"

Involuntarily making a pass with his wooden leg to guard himself as Mr. Venus springs up in the emphasis of this unsociable declaration, Mr. Wegg tilts over on his back, chair and all, and is rescued by that harmless misanthrope, in a disjointed state and ruefully rubbing his head.

"Why, you lost your balance, Mr. Wegg," says Venus, handing him his pipe.

"And about time to do it," grumbles Silas, "when a man's visitors, without a word of notice, conduct themselves with the sudden viciousness of Jacks-in-boxes! Don't come flying out of your chair like that, Mr. Venus!"

"I ask your pardon, Mr. Wegg. I am so soured."

"Yes, but hang it," says Wegg, argumentatively, "a well-governed mind can be soured sitting! And as to being regarded in lights, there's bumpey lights as well as bony. In which," again rubbing his head, "I object to regard myself."

"I'll bear it in memory, Sir."

"If you'll be so good." Mr. Wegg slowly subdues his ironical tone and his lingering irritation, and resumes his pipe. "We were talking of old Mr. Harmon being a friend of yours."

"Not a friend, Mr. Wegg. Only known to speak to, and to have a little deal with now and then. A very inquisitive character, Mr. Wegg, regarding what was found in the dust. As inquisitive as secret."

"Ah! You found him secret?" returns Wegg, with a greedy relish.

"He had always the look of it, and the manner of it."

"Ah!" with another roll of his eyes. "As to what was found in the dust now. Did you ever hear him mention how he found it, my dear friend? Living on the mysterious premises, one would like to know. For instance, where he found things? Or, for instance, how he set about it? Whether he began at the top of the mounds, or whether he began at the bottom. Whether he prodded;" Mr. Wegg's pantomime is skillful and expressive here; "or whether he scooped? Should you say scooped, my dear Mr. Venus; or should you—as a man—say prodded?"

"I should say neither, Mr. Wegg."

"As a fellow-man, Mr. Venus—mix again—why neither?"

"Because I suppose, Sir, that what was found, was found in the sorting and sifting. All the mounds are sorted and sifted?"

"You shall see 'em and pass your opinion. Mix again."

On each occasion of his saying "mix again," Mr. Wegg, with a hop on his wooden leg, hitches his chair a little nearer; more as if he were proposing that himself and Mr. Venus should mix again, than that they should replenish their glasses.

"Living (as I said before) on the mysterious premises," says Wegg when the other has acted on his hospitable entreaty, "one likes to know. Would you be inclined to say now—as a brother—that he ever hid things in the dust, as well as found 'em?"

"Mr. Wegg, on the whole I should say he might."

Mr. Wegg claps on his spectacles, and admiringly surveys Mr. Venus from head to foot.

"As a mortal equally with myself, whose hand I take in mine for the first time this day, having unaccountably overlooked that act so full of boundless confidence binding a fellow-creetur to a fellow-creetur," says Wegg, holding Mr. Venus's palm out, flat and ready for smiting, and now smiting it; "as such—and no other—for I scorn all lowlier ties betwixt myself and the man walking with his face erect that alone I call my Twin—regarded and regarding in this trustful bond—what do you think he might have hid?"

"It is but a supposition, Mr. Wegg."

"As a Being with his hand upon his heart," cries Wegg; and the apostrophe is not the less impressive for the Being's hand being actually upon his rum and water; "put your supposition into language, and bring it out, Mr. Venus!"

"He was the species of old gentleman, Sir," slowly returns that practical anatomist, after drinking, "that I should judge likely to take such opportunities as this place offered, of stowing away money, valuables, maybe papers."

"As one that was ever an ornament to human life," says Mr. Wegg, again holding out Mr. Venus's palm as if he were going to tell his fortune by chiromancy, and holding his own up ready for smiting it when the time should come; "as one that the poet might have had his eye on, in writing the national naval words:

Helm a-weather, now lay her close,
Yard arm and yard arm she lies;
Again, cried I, Mr. Venus, give her t'other dose, Man shrouds and grapple, Sir, or she flies!

—that is to say, regarded in the light of true British Oak, for such you are—explain, Mr. Venus, the expression 'papers'!"

"Seeing that the old gentleman was generally cutting off some near relation, or blocking out some natural affection," Mr. Venus rejoins, "he most likely made a good many wills and codicils."

The palm of Silas Wegg descends with a sounding smack upon the palm of Venus, and Wegg lavishly exclaims, "Twin in opinion equally with feeling! Mix a little more!"

Having now hitched his wooden leg and his chair close in front of Mr. Venus, Mr. Wegg rapidly mixes for both, gives his visitor his glass, touches its rim with the rim of his own, puts his own to his lips, puts it down, and spreading his hands on his visitor's knees thus addresses him:

"Mr. Venus. It ain't that I object to being passed over for a stranger, though I regard the stranger as a more than doubtful customer. It ain't for the sake of making money, though money is ever welcome. It ain't for myself, though I am not so haughty as to be above doing myself a good turn. It's for the cause of the right."

Mr. Venus, passively winking his weak eyes both at once, demands: "What is, Mr. Wegg?"

"The friendly move, Sir, that I now propose. You see the move, Sir?"

"Till you have pointed it out, Mr. Wegg, I can't say whether I do or not."

"If there is any thing to be found on these premises, let us find it together. Let us make the friendly move of agreeing to look for it together. Let us make the friendly move of agreeing to share the profits of it equally betwixt us.

In the cause of the right." Thus Silas assuming a noble air.

"Then," says Mr. Venus, looking up, after meditating with his hair held in his hands, as if he could only fix his attention by fixing his head; "if any thing was to be unburied from under the dust, it would be kept a secret by you and me? Would that be it, Mr. Wegg?"

"That would depend upon what it was, Mr. Venus. Say it was money, or plate, or jewelry, it would be as much ours as any body else's."

Mr. Venus rubs an eyebrow, interrogatively.

"In the cause of the right it would. Because it would be unknowingly sold with the mounds else, and the buyer would get what he was never meant to have, and never bought. And what would that be, Mr. Venus, but the cause of the wrong?"

"Say it was papers," Mr. Venus propounds.

"According to what they contained we should offer to dispose of 'em to the parties most interested," replies Wegg, promptly.

"In the cause of the right, Mr. Wegg?"

"Always so, Mr. Venus. If the parties should use them in the cause of the wrong, that would be their act and deed. Mr. Venus. I have an opinion of you, Sir, to which it is not easy to give mouth. Since I called upon you that evening when you were, as I may say, floating your powerful mind in tea, I have felt that you required to be roused with an object. In this friendly move, Sir, you will have a glorious object to rouse you."

Mr. Wegg then goes on to enlarge upon what throughout has been uppermost in his crafty mind:—the qualifications of Mr. Venus for such a search. He expatiates on Mr. Venus's patient habits and delicate manipulation; on his skill in piecing little things together; on his knowledge of various tissues and textures; on the likelihood of small indications leading him on to the discovery of great concealments. "While as to myself," says Wegg, "I am not good at it. Whether I gave myself up to prodding, or whether I gave myself up to scooping, I couldn't do it with that delicate touch so as not to show that I was disturbing the mounds. Quite different with you, going to work (as you would) in the light of a fellow-man, holily pledged in a friendly move to his brother man." Mr. Wegg next modestly remarks on the want of adaptation in a wooden leg to ladders and such like airy perches, and also hints at an inherent tendency in that timber fiction, when called into action for the purposes of a promenade on an ashy slope, to stick itself into the yielding foothold, and peg its owner to one spot. Then, leaving this part of the subject, he remarks on the special phenomenon that before his installation in the Bower, it was from Mr. Venus that he first heard of the legend of hidden wealth in the Mounds: "which," he observes with a vaguely pious air, "was surely never meant for nothing." Lastly, he returns to the cause of the right, gloomily foreshadowing the possibility of something being unearthed to criminate Mr. Boffin (of whom he once more candidly admits it can not be denied that he profits by a murder), and anticipating his denunciation by the friendly movers to avenging justice. And this, Mr. Wegg expressly points out, not at all for the sake of the reward—though it would be a want of principle not to take it.

To all this, Mr. Venus, with his shock of dusty hair cocked after the manner of a terrier's ears, attends profoundly. When Mr. Wegg, having finished, opens his arms wide, as if to show Mr. Venus how bare his breast is, and then folds them pending a reply, Mr. Venus winks at him with both eyes some little time before speaking.

"I see you have tried it by yourself, Mr. Wegg," he says when he does speak. "You have found out the difficulties by experience."

"No, it can hardly be said that I have tried it," replies Wegg, a little dashed by the hint. "I have just skimmed it. Skimmed it."

"And found nothing besides the difficulties?"

Wegg shakes his head.

"I scarcely know what to say to this, Mr. Wegg," observes Venus, after ruminating for a while.

"Say yes," Wegg naturally urges.

"If I wasn't soured, my answer would be no. But being soured, Mr. Wegg, and driven to reckless madness and desperation, I suppose it's Yes."

Wegg joyfully reproduces the two glasses, repeats the ceremony of clinking their rims, and inwardly drinks with great heartiness to the health and success in life of the young lady who has reduced Mr. Venus to his present convenient state of mind.

The articles of the friendly move are then severally recited and agreed upon. They are but secrecy, fidelity, and perseverance. The Bower to be always free of access to Mr. Venus for his researches, and every precaution to be taken against their attracting observation in the neighborhood.

"There's a footstep!" exclaims Venus.

"Where?" cries Wegg, starting.

"Outside. St!"

They are in the act of ratifying the treaty of friendly move, by shaking hands upon it. They softly break off, light their pipes which have gone out, and lean back in their chairs. No doubt, a footstep. It approaches the window, and a hand taps at the glass. "Come in!" calls Wegg; meaning come round by the door. But the heavy old-fashioned sash is slowly raised, and a head slowly looks in out of the dark back-ground of night.

"Pray is Mr. Silas Wegg here? Oh! I see him!"

The friendly movers might not have been quite at their ease, even though the visitor had entered in the usual manner. But, leaning on the breast-high window, and staring in out of the darkness, they find the visitor extremely embarrassing. Especially Mr. Venus: who removes his pipe, draws back his head, and stares at the starrer, as if it were his own Hindoo baby come to fetch him home.

"Good-evening, Mr. Wegg. The yard gate-lock should be looked to, if you please; it don't catch."

"Is it Mr. Rokesmith?" falters Wegg.

"It is Mr. Rokesmith. Don't let me disturb you. I am not coming in. I have only a message for you, which I undertook to deliver on my way home to my lodgings. I was in two minds about coming beyond the gate without ringing: not knowing but you might have a dog about."

"I wish I had," mutters Wegg, with his back turned as he rose from his chair. "St! Hush! The talking-over stranger, Mr. Venus."

"Is that any one I know?" inquires the staring Secretary.

"No, Mr. Rokesmith. Friend of mine. Passing the evening with me."

"Oh! I beg his pardon. Mr. Boffin wishes you to know that he does not expect you to stay at home any evening, on the chance of his coming. It has occurred to him that he may, without intending it, have been a tie upon you. In future, if he should come without notice, he will take his chance of finding you, and it will be all the same to him if he does not. I undertook to tell you on my way. That's all."

With that, and "Good-night," the Secretary lowers the window, and disappears. They listen, and hear his footsteps go back to the gate, and hear the gate close after him.

"And for that individual, Mr. Venus," remarks Wegg, when he is fully gone, "I have been passed over! Let me ask you what you think of him?"

Apparently, Mr. Venus does not know what to think of him, for he makes sundry efforts to reply, without delivering himself of any other articulate utterance than that he has "a singular look."

"A double look, you mean, Sir," rejoins Wegg, playing bitterly upon the word. "That's his look. Any amount of singular look for me, but not a double look! That's an underhanded mind, Sir."

"Do you say there's something against him?" Venus asks.

"Something against him?" repeats Wegg. "Something? What would the relief be to my feelings—as a fellow-man—if I wasn't the slave of truth, and didn't feel myself compelled to answer, Every thing!"

See into what wonderful maudlin refuges featherless ostriches plunge their heads! It is such unspeakable moral compensation to Wegg to be overcome by the consideration that Mr. Rokesmith has an underhanded mind!

"On this starlight night, Mr. Venus," he remarks, when he is showing that friendly mover out across the yard, and both are something the worse for mixing again and again: "on this starlight night to think that talking-over strangers, and underhanded minds, can go walking home under the sky, as if they was all square!"

"The spectacle of those orbs," says Mr. Venus, gazing upward with his hat tumbling off, "brings heavy on me her crushing words that she did not wish to regard herself nor yet to be regarded in that—"

"I know! I know! You needn't repeat 'em," says Wegg, pressing his hand. "But think how those stars steady me in the cause of the right against some that shall be nameless. It isn't that I bear malice. But see how they glisten with old remembrances! Old remembrances of what, Sir?"

Mr. Venus begins drearily replying, "Of her words, in her own handwriting, that she does not wish to regard herself, nor yet—" when Silas cuts him short with dignity.

"No, Sir! Remembrances of Our House, of Master George, of Aunt Jane, of Uncle Parker, all laid waste! All offered up sacrifices to the minion of fortune and the worm of the hour!"

CHAPTER VIII.

IN WHICH AN INNOCENT ELOPEMENT OCCURS.

THE minion of fortune and the worm of the hour, or in less cutting language, Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire, the Golden Dustman, had become as much at home in his eminently aristocratic family mansion as he was likely ever to be. He could not but feel that, like an eminently aristocratic family cheese, it was much too large for his wants, and bred an infinite amount of parasites; but he was content to regard this drawback on his property as a sort of perpetual Legacy Duty. He felt the more resigned to it, forasmuch as Mrs. Boffin enjoyed herself completely, and Miss Bella was delighted.

That young lady was, no doubt, an acquisition to the Boffins. She was far too pretty to be unattractive any where, and far too quick of perception to be below the tone of her new career. Whether it improved her heart might be a matter of taste that was open to question; but as touching another matter of taste, its improvement of her appearance and manner, there could be no question whatever.

And thus it soon came about that Miss Bella began to set Mrs. Boffin right; and even further, that Miss Bella began to feel ill at ease, and as it were responsible, when she saw Mrs. Boffin going wrong. Not that so sweet a disposition and so sound a nature could ever go very wrong even among the great visiting authorities who agreed that the Boffins were "charmingly vulgar" (which for certain was not their own case in saying so), but that when she made a slip on the social ice on which all the children of Podsnappery, with genteel souls to be saved, are required to skate in circles, or to slide in long rows, she inevitably tripped Miss Bella up (so that young lady felt), and caused her to experience great confusion under the glances of the more skillful performers engaged in those ice-exercises.

At Miss Bella's time of life it was not to be expected that she should examine herself very closely on the congruity or stability of her position in Mr. Boffin's house. And as she had never been sparing of complaints of her old home when she had no other to compare it with, so there was no novelty of ingratitude or disdain in her very much preferring her new one.

"An invaluable man is Rokesmith," said Mr. Boffin, after some two or three months. "But I can't quite make him out."

Neither could Bella, so she found the subject rather interesting.

"He takes more care of my affairs, morning, noon, and night," said Mr. Boffin, "than fifty other men put together either could or would; and yet he has ways of his own that are like tying a scaffolding pole right across the road, and bringing me up short when I am almost a-walking arm in arm with him."

"May I ask how so, Sir?" inquired Bella.

"Well, my dear," said Mr. Boffin, "he won't meet any company here but you. When we have visitors, I should wish him to have his regular place at the table like ourselves; but no, he won't take it."

"If he considers himself above it," said Miss Bella, with an airy toss of her head, "I should leave him alone."

"It ain't that, my dear," replied Mr. Boffin, thinking it over. "He don't consider himself above it."

"Perhaps he considers himself beneath it," suggested Bella. "If so, he ought to know best."

"No, my dear; nor it ain't that, neither. No," repeated Mr. Boffin, with a shake of his head, after again thinking it over: "Rokesmith's a modest man, but he don't consider himself beneath it."

"Then what does he consider it, Sir?" asked Bella.

"Dashed if I know!" said Mr. Boffin. "It seemed at first as if it was only Lightwood that he objected to meet. And now it seems to be every body, except you."

"Oho!" thought Miss Bella. "In-deed! That's it, is it!" For Mr. Mortimer Lightwood had dined there two or three times, and she had met him elsewhere, and he had shown her some attention. "Rather cool in a Secretary—and Pa's lodger—to make me the subject of his jealousy!"

That Pa's daughter should be so contemptuous of Pa's lodger was odd; but there were odder anomalies than that in the mind of the spoilt girl: the doubly spoilt girl: spoilt first by poverty, and then by wealth. Be it this history's part, however, to leave them to unravel themselves.

"A little too much, I think," Miss Bella reflected scornfully, "to have Pa's lodger laying claim to me, and keeping eligible people off! A little too much, indeed, to have the opportunities opened to me by Mr. and Mrs. Boffin appropriated by a mere Secretary and Pa's lodger!"

Yet it was not so very long ago that Bella had been fluttered by the discovery that this same Secretary and lodger seemed to like her. Ah! but the eminently aristocratic mansion and Mrs. Boffin's dress-maker had not come into play then.

In spite of his seemingly retiring manners a very intrusive person, this Secretary and lodger, in Miss Bella's opinion. Always a light in his office-room when we came home from the play or Opera, and he always at the carriage-door to hand us out. Always a provoking radiance too on Mrs. Boffin's face, and an abominably cheerful reception of him, as if it were possible seriously to approve what the man had in his mind!

"You never charge me, Miss Wilfer," said the Secretary, encountering her by chance alone in the great drawing-room, "with commissions for home: I shall always be happy to execute any commands you may have in that direction."

"Pray what may you mean, Mr. Rokesmith?" inquired Miss Bella, with languidly drooping eyelids.

"By home? I mean your father's house at Holloway."

She colored under the retort—so skillfully thrust, that the words seemed to be merely a plain answer, given in plain good faith—and said, rather more emphatically and sharply:

"What commissions and commands are you speaking of?"

"Only such little words of remembrance as I assume you send somehow or other," replied the Secretary with his former air. "It would be a pleasure to me if you would make me the bearer of them. As you know, I come and go between the two houses every day."

"You needn't remind me of that, Sir."

She was too quick in this petulant sally against "Pa's lodger;" and she felt that she had been so when she met his quiet look.

"They don't send many—what was your expression?—words of remembrance to me," said Bella, making haste to take refuge in ill-usage.

"They frequently ask me about you, and I give them such slight intelligence as I can."

"I hope it's truly given," exclaimed Bella.

"I hope you can not doubt it, for it would be very much against you, if you could."

"No, I do not doubt it. I deserve the reproach, which is very just indeed. I beg your pardon, Mr. Rokesmith."

"I should beg you not to do so, but that it shows you to such admirable advantage," he replied with earnestness. "Forgive me; I could not help saying that. To return to what I have digressed from, let me add that perhaps they think I report them to you, deliver little messages, and the like. But I forbear to trouble you, as you never ask me."

"I am going, Sir," said Bella, looking at him as if he had reproved her, "to see them to-morrow."

"Is that," he asked, hesitating, "said to me, or to them?"

"To which you please."

"To both? Shall I make it a message?"

"You can if you like, Mr. Rokesmith. Message or no message, I am going to see them to-morrow."

"Then I will tell them so."

He lingered a moment, as though to give her the opportunity of prolonging the conversation if she wished. As she remained silent, he left her. Two incidents of the little interview were felt by Miss Bella herself, when alone again, to be very curious. The first was, that he unquestionably left her with a penitent air upon her, and a penitent feeling in her heart. The second was, that she had not had an intention or a thought of going home until she had announced it to him as a settled design.

"What can I mean by it, or what can he mean by it?" was her mental inquiry: "He has no right to any power over me, and how do I come to mind him when I don't care for him?"

Mrs. Boffin, insisting that Bella should make to-morrow's expedition in the chariot, she went home in great grandeur. Mrs. Wilfer and Miss Lavinia had speculated much on the probabilities and improbabilities of her coming in this gorgeous state, and, on beholding the chariot from the window at which they were secreted to look out for it, agreed that it must be detained at the door as long as possible, for the mortification and confusion of the neighbors. Then they repaired to the usual family room, to receive Miss Bella with a becoming show of indifference.

The family room looked very small, and very mean, and the downward staircase by which it was attained looked very narrow and very crooked. The little house and all its arrangements were a poor contrast to the eminently aristocratic dwelling. "I can hardly believe," thought Bella, "that I ever did endure life in this place!"

Gloomy majesty on the part of Mrs. Wilfer, and native pertness on the part of Lavvy, did not mend the matter. Bella really stood in natural need of a little help, and she got none.

"This," said Mrs. Wilfer, presenting a cheek to be kissed, as sympathetic and responsive as the back of the bowl of a spoon, "is quite an honor! You will probably find your sister Lavvy grown, Bella."

"Ma," Miss Lavinia interposed, "there can be no objection to your being aggravating, because Bella richly deserves it; but I really must request that you will not drag in such ridiculous nonsense as my having grown when I am past the growing age."

"I grew, myself," Mrs. Wilfer sternly proclaimed, "after I was married."

"Very well, Ma," returned Lavvy, "then I think you had much better have left it alone."

The lofty glare with which the majestic woman received this answer might have embarrassed a less pert opponent, but it had no effect upon Lavinia: who, leaving her parent to the enjoyment of any amount of glaring that she might deem desirable under the circumstances, accosted her sister, undismayed.

"I suppose you won't consider yourself quite disgraced, Bella, if I give you a kiss? Well! And how do you do, Bella? And how are your Boffins?"

"Peace!" exclaimed Mrs. Wilfer. "Hold! I will not suffer this tone of levity."

"My goodness me! How are your Spoffins, then?" said Lavvy, "since Ma so very much objects to your Boffins."

"Impertinent girl! Minx!" said Mrs. Wilfer, with dread severity.

"I don't care whether I am a Minx or a Sphinx," returned Lavinia, coolly, tossing her head; "it's exactly the same thing to me, and I'd every bit as soon be one as the other; but I know this—I'll not grow after I am married!"

"You will not? You will not?" repeated Mrs. Wilfer, solemnly.

"No, Ma, I will not. Nothing shall induce me."

Mrs. Wilfer, having waved her gloves, became loftily pathetic. "But it was to be expected;" thus she spake. "A child of mine deserts me for the proud and prosperous, and another child of mine despises me. It is quite fitting."

"Ma," Bella struck in, "Mr. and Mrs. Boffin are prosperous, no doubt; but you have no right to say they are proud. You must know very well that they are not."

"In short, Ma," said Lavvy, bouncing over to the enemy without a word of notice, "you must know very well—or if you don't, more shame for you!—that Mr. and Mrs. Boffin are just absolute perfection."

"Truly," returned Mrs. Wilfer, courteously receiving the deserter, "it would seem that we are required to think so. And this, Lavinia, is my reason for objecting to a tone of levity. Mrs. Boffin (of whose physiognomy I can never speak with the composure I would desire to preserve) and your mother are not on terms of intimacy. It is not for a moment to be supposed that she and her husband dare to presume to speak of this family as the Wilfers. I can not therefore condescend to speak of them as the Boffins. No; for such a tone—call it familiarity, levity, equality, or what you will—would imply those social interchanges which do not exist. Do I render myself intelligible?"

Without taking the least notice of this inquiry, albeit delivered in an imposing and forensic manner, Lavinia reminded her sister, "After all, you know, Bella, you haven't told us how your Whatshisnames are."

"I don't want to speak of them here," replied Bella, suppressing indignation, and tapping her foot on the floor. "They are much too kind and too good to be drawn into these discussions."

"Why put it so?" demanded Mrs. Wilfer, with biting sarcasm. "Why adopt a circuitous form of speech? It is polite and it is obliging; but why do it? Why not openly say that they are much too kind and too good for us? We understand the allusion. Why disguise the phrase?"

"Ma," said Bella, with one beat of her foot, "you are enough to drive a saint mad, and so is Lavvy."

"Unfortunate Lavvy!" cried Mrs. Wilfer, in a tone of commiseration. "She always comes in for it. My poor child!" But Lavvy, with the suddenness of her former desertion, now bounced over to the other enemy: very sharply remarking, "Don't patronize me, Ma, because I can take care of myself."

"I only wonder," resumed Mrs. Wilfer, directing her observations to her elder daughter, as safer on the whole than her utterly unmanageable younger, "that you found time and inclination to tear yourself from Mr. and Mrs. Boffin, and come to see us at all. I only wonder that our claims, contending against the superior claims of Mr. and Mrs. Boffin, had any weight. I feel I ought to be thankful for gaining so much, in competition with Mr. and Mrs. Boffin." (The good lady bitterly emphasized the first letter of the word Boffin, as if it represented her chief objection to the owners of that name, and as if she could have borne Doffin, Moffin, or Poffin much better.)

"Ma," said Bella, angrily, "you force me to say that I am truly sorry I did come home, and that I never will come home again, except when poor dear Pa is here. For, Pa is too magnanimous to feel envy and spite toward my generous friends, and Pa is delicate enough and gentle enough to remember the sort of little claim they thought I had upon them and the unusually trying position in which, through no act of my own, I had been placed. And I always did love poor dear Pa better than all the rest of you put together, and I always do and I always shall!"

Here Bella, deriving no comfort from her charming bonnet and her elegant dress, burst into tears.

"I think, R. W.," cried Mrs. Wilfer, lifting up her eyes and apostrophizing the air, "that if you were present, it would be a trial to your feelings to hear your wife and the mother of your family depreciated in your name. But Fate has spared you this, R. W., whatever it may have thought proper to inflict upon her!"

Here Mrs. Wilfer burst into tears.

"I hate the Boffins!" protested Miss Lavinia. "I don't care who objects to their being called the Boffins. I WILL call 'em the Boffins. The Boffins, the Boffins, the Boffins! And I say they are mischief-making Boffins, and I say the Boffins have set Bella against me, and I tell the Boffins to their faces:" which was not strictly the fact, but the young lady was excited: "that they are detestable Boffins, disreputable Boffins, odious Boffins, beastly Boffins. There!"

Here Miss Lavinia burst into tears.

The front garden-gate clanked, and the Secretary was seen coming at a brisk pace up the steps. "Leave Me to open the door to him," said Mrs. Wilfer, rising with stately resignation as she shook her head and dried her eyes; "we have at present no stipendiary girl to do so. We have nothing to conceal. If he sees these traces of emotion on our cheeks, let him construe them as he may."

With those words she stalked out. In a few moments she stalked in again, proclaiming in her heraldic manner, "Mr. Rokesmith is the bearer of a packet for Miss Bella Wilfer."

Mr. Rokesmith followed close upon his name, and of course saw what was amiss. But he discreetly affected to see nothing, and addressed Miss Bella.

"Mr. Boffin intended to have placed this in the carriage for you this morning. He wished you to have it, as a little keepsake he had prepared—it is only a purse, Miss Wilfer—but as he was disappointed in his fancy, I volunteered to come after you with it."

Bella took it in her hand, and thanked him.

"We have been quarreling here a little, Mr. Rokesmith, but not more than we used; you know our agreeable ways among ourselves. You find me just going. Good-by, mamma. Good-by, Lavvy!" And with a kiss for each Miss Bella turned to the door. The Secretary would have attended her, but Mrs. Wilfer advancing and saying with dignity, "Pardon me! Permit me to assert my natural right to escort my child to the equipage which is in waiting for her," he begged pardon and gave place. It was a very magnificent spectacle indeed, to see Mrs. Wilfer throw open the house-door, and loudly demand with extended gloves, "The male domestic of Mrs. Boffin!" To whom presenting himself, she delivered the brief but majestic charge, "Miss Wilfer. Coming out!" and so delivered her over, like a female Lieutenant of the Tower relinquishing a State Prisoner. The effect of this ceremonial was for some quarter of an hour afterward perfectly paralyzing on the neighbors, and was much enhanced by the worthy lady airing herself for that term in a kind of splendidly serene trance on the top step.

When Bella was seated in the carriage, she opened the little packet in her hand. It contained a pretty purse, and the purse contained a bank-note for fifty pounds. "This shall be a joyful surprise for poor dear Pa," said Bella, "and I'll take it myself into the City!"

As she was uninformed respecting the exact locality of the place of business of Chicksey Veneering and Stobbles, but knew it to be near Mincing Lane, she directed herself to be driven to the corner of that darksome spot. Thence she dispatched "the male domestic of Mrs. Boffin" in search of the counting-house of Chicksey Veneering and Stobbles, with a message importing that if R. Wilfer could come out, there was a lady waiting who would be glad to speak with him. The delivery of these mysterious words from the mouth of a footman caused so great an excitement in the counting-house that a youthful scout was instantly appointed to follow Rumty, observe the lady, and come in with his report. Nor was the agitation by any means diminished when the scout rushed back with the intelligence that the lady was "a slap-up gal in a bang-up chariot."

Rumty himself, with his pen behind his ear under his rusty hat, arrived at the carriage-door in a breathless condition, and had been fairly lugged into the vehicle by his cravat and embraced almost unto choking, before he recognized his daughter. "My dear child!" he then panted, incoherently. "Good gracious me! What a lovely woman you are! I thought you had been unkind and forgotten your mother and sister."

"I have just been to see them, Pa dear."

"Oh! and how—how did you find your mother?" asked R. W., dubiously.

"Very disagreeable, Pa, and so was Lavvy."

"They are sometimes a little liable to it," observed the patient cherub; "but I hope you made allowances, Bella, my dear?"

"No. I was disagreeable too, Pa; we were all of us disagreeable together. But I want you to come and dine with me somewhere, Pa."

"Why, my dear, I have already partaken of a—if one might mention such an article in this superb chariot—of a—Saveloy," replied R. Wilfer, modestly dropping his voice on the word, as he eyed the canary-colored fittings.

"Oh! That's nothing, Pa."

"Truly, it ain't as much as one could sometimes wish it to be, my dear," he admitted, drawing his hand across his mouth. "Still, when circumstances over which you have no control interpose obstacles between yourself and Small Germans, you can't do better than bring a contented mind to bear on"—again dropping his voice in deference to the chariot—"Save-loys!"

"You poor good Pa! Pa do, I beg and pray, get leave for the rest of the day, and come and pass it with me!"

"Well, my dear, I'll cut back and ask for leave."

"But before you cut back," said Bella, who had already taken him by the chin, pulled his hat off, and begun to stick up his hair in her old way, "do say that you are sure I am giddy and inconsiderate, but have never really slighted you, Pa."

"My dear, I say it with all my heart. And might I likewise observe," her father delicately hinted, with a glance out at window, "that perhaps it might be calculated to attract attention, having one's hair publicly done by a lovely woman in an elegant turn-out in Fenchurch Street?"

Bella laughed and put on his hat again. But when his boyish figure bobbed away, its shabbiness and cheerful patience smote the tears out of her eyes. "I hate that Secretary for thinking it of me," she said to herself, "and yet it seems half true!"

Back came her father, more like a boy than ever, in his release from school. "All right, my dear. Leave given at once. Really very handsomely done!"

"Now where can we find some quiet place, Pa, in which I can wait for you while you go on an errand for me, if I send the carriage away?"

It demanded cogitation. "You see, my dear," he explained, "you really have become such a very lovely woman, that it ought to be a very quiet place." At length he suggested, "Near the garden up by the Trinity House on Tower Hill." So they were driven there, and Bella dismissed the chariot; sending a penciled note by it to Mrs. Boffin, that she was with her father.

"Now, Pa, attend to what I am going to say, and promise and vow to be obedient."

"I promise and vow, my dear."

"You ask no questions. You take this purse; you go to the nearest place where they keep every thing of the very very best, ready made; you buy and put on the most beautiful suit of clothes, the most beautiful hat, and the most beautiful pair of bright boots (patent leather, Pa, mind!) that are to be got for money; and you come back to me."

"But, my dear Bella—"

"Take care, Pa!" pointing her forefinger at him, merrily. "You have promised and vowed. It's perjury, you know."

There was water in the foolish little fellow's eyes, but she kissed them dry (though her own were wet), and he bobbed away again. After half an hour he came back, so brilliantly transformed, that Bella was obliged to walk round him in ecstatic admiration twenty times, before she could draw her arm through his, and delightedly squeeze it.

"Now, Pa," said Bella, hugging him close, "take this lovely woman out to dinner."

"Where shall we go, my dear?"

"Greenwich!" said Bella, valiantly. "And be sure you treat this lovely woman with every thing of the best."

While they were going along to take boat, "Don't you wish, my dear," said R. W., timidly, "that your mother was here?"

"No, I don't, Pa, for I like to have you all to myself to-day. I was always your little favorite at home, and you were always mine. We have run away together often, before now; haven't we, Pa?"

"Ah, to be sure we have! Many a Sunday when your mother was—was a little liable to it," repeating his former delicate expression after pausing to cough.

"Yes, and I am afraid I was seldom or never as good as I ought to have been, Pa. I made you carry me, over and over again, when you should have made me walk; and I often drove you in harness, when you would much rather have sat down and read your newspaper: didn't I?"

"Sometimes, sometimes. But Lor, what a child you were! What a companion you were!"

"Companion? That's just what I want to be to-day, Pa."

"You are safe to succeed, my love. Your brothers and sisters have all in their turns been companions to me, to a certain extent, but only to a certain extent. Your mother has, throughout life, been a companion that any man might—might look up to—and—and commit the sayings of, to memory—and—form himself upon—if he—"

"If he liked the model?" suggested Bella.

"We-ell, ye-es," he returned, thinking about it, not quite satisfied with the phrase: "or perhaps I might say, if it was in him. Supposing, for instance, that a man wanted to be always marching, he would find your mother an inestimable companion. But if he had any taste for walking, or should wish at any time to break into a trot, he might sometimes find it a little difficult to keep step with your mother. Or take it this way, Bella," he added, after a moment's reflection: "Supposing that a man had to go through life, we won't say with a companion, but we'll say to a tune. Very good. Supposing that the tune allotted to him was the Dead March in Saul. Well. It would be a very suitable tune for particular occasions—none better—but it would be difficult to keep time with in the ordinary run of domestic transactions. For instance, if he took his supper after a hard day to the Dead March in Saul, his food might be likely to sit heavy on him. Or, if he was at any time inclined to relieve his mind by singing a comic song or dancing a horn-pipe, and was obliged to do it to the Dead March in Saul, he might find himself put out in the execution of his lively intentions."

"Poor Pa!" thought Bella, as she hung upon his arm.

"Now, what I will say for you, my dear," the cherub pursued mildly and without a notion of complaining, "is, that you are so adaptable. So adaptable."

"Indeed I am afraid I have shown a wretched temper, Pa. I am afraid I have been very complaining, and very capricious. I seldom or never thought of it before. But when I sat in the carriage just now and saw you coming along the pavement, I reproached myself."

"Not at all, my dear. Don't speak of such a thing."

A happy and a chatty man was Pa in his new clothes that day. Take it for all in all, it was perhaps the happiest day he had ever known in his life; not even excepting that on which his heroic partner had approached the nuptial altar to the tune of the Dead March in Saul.

The little expedition down the river was delightful, and the little room overlooking the river into which they were shown for dinner was delightful. Every thing was delightful. The park was delightful, the punch was delightful, the dishes of fish were delightful, the wine was delightful. Bella was more delightful than any other item in the festival; drawing Pa out in the gayest manner; making a point of always mentioning herself as the lovely woman; stimulating Pa to order things, by declaring that the lovely woman insisted on being treated with them; and in short causing Pa to be quite enraptured with the consideration that he was the Pa of such a charming daughter.

And then, as they sat looking at the ships and steamboats making their way to the sea with the tide that was running down, the lovely woman imagined all sorts of voyages for herself and Pa. Now, Pa, in the character of owner of a lumbering square-sailed collier, was tacking away to Newcastle, to fetch black diamonds to make his fortune with; now, Pa was going to China in that handsome three-masted ship, to bring home opium, with which he would forever cut out Chicksey Veneering and Stobbles, and to bring home silks and shawls without end for the decoration of his charming daughter. Now, John Harmon's disastrous fate was all a dream, and he had come home and found the lovely woman just the article for him, and the lovely woman had found him just the article for her, and they were going away on a trip, in their gallant bark, to look after their vines, with streamers flying at all points, a band playing on deck, and Pa established in the great cabin. Now, John Harmon was consigned to his grave again; and a merchant of immense wealth (name unknown) had courted and married the lovely woman, and he was so enormously rich that every thing you saw upon the river sailing or steaming belonged to him, and he kept a perfect fleet of yachts for pleasure, and that little impudent yacht which you saw over there, with the great white sail, was called The Bella, in honor of his wife, and she held her state aboard when it pleased her, like a modern Cleopatra. Anon, there would embark in that troop-ship when she got to Gravesend, a mighty general, of large property (name also unknown), who wouldn't hear of going to victory without his wife, and whose wife was the lovely woman, and she was destined to become the idol of all the red coats and blue jackets afloat and aloft. And then again: you saw that ship being towed out by a steam-tug? Well! where did you suppose she was going to? She was going among the coral reefs and cocoa-nuts and all that sort of thing, and she was chartered for a fortunate individual of the name of Pa (himself on board, and much respected by all hands), and she was going, for his sole profit and advantage, to fetch a cargo of sweet-smelling woods, the most beautiful that ever were seen, and the most profitable that never were heard of, and her cargo would be a great fortune, as indeed it ought to be: the lovely woman who had purchased her and fitted her expressly for this voyage being married to an Indian Prince, who was a Something-or-Other, and who wore Cashmere shawls all over himself, and diamonds and emeralds blazing in his turban, and was beautifully coffee-colored and excessively devoted, though a little too jealous. Thus Bella ran on merrily, in a manner perfectly enchanting to Pa, who was as willing to put his head into the Sultan's tub of water as the beggar-boys below the window were to put their heads in the mud.

"I suppose, my dear," said Pa after dinner, "we may come to the conclusion at home that we have lost you for good?"

Bella shook her head. Didn't know. Couldn't say. All she was able to report was, that she was most handsomely supplied with every thing she could possibly want, and that whenever she hinted at leaving Mr. and Mrs. Boffin, they wouldn't hear of it.

"And now, Pa," pursued Bella, "I'll make a confession to you. I am the most mercenary little wretch that ever lived in the world."

"I should hardly have thought it of you, my dear," returned her father, first glancing at himself, and then at the dessert.

"I understand what you mean, Pa, but it's not that. It's not that I care for money to keep as money, but I do care so much for what it will buy!"

"Really I think most of us do," returned R. W.

"But not to the dreadful extent that I do, Pa. O-o!" cried Bella, screwing the exclamation out of herself with a twist of her dimpled chin. "I AM so mercenary!"

With a wistful glance R. W. said, in default of having any thing better to say: "About when did you begin to feel it coming on, my dear?"

"That's it, Pa. That's the terrible part of it. When I was at home, and only knew what it was to be poor, I grumbled but didn't so much mind. When I was at home expecting to be rich, I thought vaguely of all the great things I would do. But when I had been disappointed of my splendid fortune, and came to see it from day to day in other hands, and to have before my eyes what it could really do, then I became the mercenary little wretch I am."

"It's your fancy, my dear."

"I can assure you it's nothing of the sort, Pa!" said Bella, nodding at him, with her very pretty eyebrows raised as high as they would go, and looking comically frightened. "It's a fact. I am always avariciously scheming."

"Lor! But how?"

"I'll tell you, Pa. I don't mind telling you, because we have always been favorites of each other's, and because you are not like a Pa, but more like a sort of a younger brother with a dear venerable chubbiness on him. And besides," added Bella, laughing as she pointed a rallying finger at his face, "because I have got you in my power. This is a secret expedition. If ever you tell of me, I'll tell of you. I'll tell Ma that you dined at Greenwich."

"Well; seriously, my dear," observed R. W., with some trepidation of manner, "it might be as well not to mention it."

"Aha!" laughed Bella. "I knew you wouldn't like it, Sir! So you keep my confidence, and I'll keep yours. But betray the lovely woman, and you shall find her a serpent. Now, you may give me a kiss, Pa, and I should like to give your hair a turn, because it has been dreadfully neglected in my absence."

R. W. submitted his head to the operator, and the operator went on talking; at the same time putting separate locks of his hair through a curious process of being smartly rolled over her two revolving forefingers, which were then suddenly pulled out of it in opposite lateral directions. On each of these occasions the patient winced and winked.

"I have made up my mind that I must have money, Pa. I feel that I can't beg it, borrow it, or steal it; and so I have resolved that I must marry it."

R. W. cast up his eyes toward her, as well as he could under the operating circumstances, and said in a tone of remonstrance, "My de-ar Bella!"

"Have resolved, I say, Pa, that to get money I must marry money. In consequence of which, I am always looking out for money to captivate."

"My de-a-r Bella!"

"Yes, Pa, that is the state of the case. If ever there was a mercenary plotter whose thoughts and designs were always in her mean occupation, I am the amiable creature. But I don't care. I hate and detest being poor, and I won't be poor if I can marry money. Now you are deliciously fluffy, Pa, and in a state to astonish the waiter and pay the bill."

"But, my dear Bella, this is quite alarming at your age."

"I told you so, Pa, but you wouldn't believe it," returned Bella, with a pleasant childish gravity. "Isn't it shocking?"

"It would be quite so, if you fully knew what you said, my dear, or meant it."

"Well, Pa, I can only tell you that I mean nothing else. Talk to me of love!" said Bella, contemptuously: though her face and figure certainly rendered the subject no incongruous one. "Talk to me of fiery dragons! But talk to me of poverty and wealth, and there indeed we touch upon realities."

"My De-ar, this is becoming Awful—" her father was emphatically beginning: when she stopped him.

"Pa, tell me. Did you marry money?"

"You know I didn't, my dear."

Bella hummed the Dead March in Saul, and said, after all it signified very little! But seeing him look grave and downcast, she took him round the neck and kissed him back to cheerfulness again.

"I didn't mean that last touch, Pa; it was only said in joke. Now mind! You are not to tell of me, and I'll not tell of you. And more than that; I promise to have no secrets from you, Pa, and you may make certain that, whatever mercenary things go on, I shall always tell you all about them in strict confidence."

Fain to be satisfied with this concession from the lovely woman, R. W. rang the bell, and paid the bill. "Now, all the rest of this, Pa," said Bella, rolling up the purse when they were alone again, hammering it small with her little fist on the table, and cramming it into one of the pockets of his new waistcoat, "is for you, to buy presents with for them at home, and to pay bills with, and to divide as you like, and spend exactly as you think proper. Last of all take notice, Pa, that it's not the fruit of any avaricious scheme. Perhaps if it was, your little mercenary wretch of a daughter wouldn't make so free with it!"

After which, she tugged at his coat with both hands, and pulled him all askew in buttoning that garment over the precious waistcoat pocket, and then tied her dimples into her bonnet-strings in a very knowing way, and took him back to London. Arrived at Mr. Boffin's door, she set him with his back against it, tenderly took him by the ears as convenient handles for her purpose, and kissed him until he knocked muffled double knocks at the door with the back of his head. That done, she once more reminded him of their compact and gayly parted from him.

Not so gayly, however, but that tears filled her eyes as he went away down the dark street. Not so gayly, but that she several times said, "Ah, poor little Pa! Ah, poor dear struggling shabby little Pa!" before she took heart to knock at the door. Not so gayly, but that the brilliant furniture seemed to stare her out of countenance as if it insisted on being compared with the dingy furniture at home. Not so gayly, but that she fell into very low spirits sitting late in her own room, and very heartily wept, as she wished, now that the deceased old John Harmon had never made a will about her, now that the deceased young John Harmon had lived to marry her. "Contradictory things to wish," said Bella, "but my life and fortunes are so contradictory altogether, that what can I expect myself to be!"

CHAPTER IX.

IN WHICH THE ORPHAN MAKES HIS WILL.

THE Secretary, working in the Dismal Swamp betimes next morning, was informed that a youth waited in the hall who gave the name of Sloppy. The footman who communicated this intelligence made a decent pause before uttering the name, to express that it was forced on his reluctance by the youth in question, and that if the youth had had the good sense and good taste to inherit some other name it would have spared the feelings of him the bearer.

"Mrs. Boffin will be very well pleased," said the Secretary in a perfectly composed way. "Show him in."

Mr. Sloppy being introduced, remained close to the door: revealing in various parts of his form many surprising, confounding, and incomprehensible buttons.

"I am glad to see you," said John Rokesmith, in a cheerful tone of welcome. "I have been expecting you."

Sloppy explained that he had meant to come before, but that the Orphan (of whom he made mention as Our Johnny) had been ailing, and he had waited to report him well.

"Then he is well now?" said the Secretary.

"No he ain't," said Sloppy.

Mr. Sloppy having shaken his head to a considerable extent, proceeded to remark that he thought Johnny "must have took 'em from the Minders." Being asked what he meant, he answered, them that come out upon him and partickler his chest. Being requested to explain himself, he stated that there was some of 'em wot you couldn't kiver with a sixpence. Pressed to fall back upon a nominative case, he opined that they wos about as red as ever red could be. "But as long as they strikes out'ards, Sir," continued Sloppy, "they ain't so much. It's their striking in'ards that's to be kep off."

John Rokesmith hoped the child had had medical attendance? Oh yes, said Sloppy, he had been took to the doctor's shop once. And what did the doctor call it? Rokesmith asked him. After some perplexed reflection, Sloppy answered, brightening, "He called it something as wos wery long for spots." Rokesmith suggested measles. "No," said Sloppy, with confidence, "ever so much longer than them, Sir!" (Mr. Sloppy was elevated by this fact, and seemed to consider that it reflected credit on the poor little patient.)

"Mrs. Boffin will be sorry to hear this," said Rokesmith.

"Mrs. Higden said so, Sir, when she kep it from her, hoping as Our Johnny would work round."

"But I hope he will!" said Rokesmith, with a quick turn upon the messenger.

"I hope so," answered Sloppy. "It all depends on their striking in'ards." He then went on to say that whether Johnny had "took 'em" from the Minders, or whether the Minders had "took 'em" from Johnny, the Minders had been sent home and had "got 'em." Furthermore, that Mrs. Higden's days and nights being devoted to Our Johnny, who was never out of her lap, the whole of the mangling arrangements had devolved upon himself, and he had had "rather a tight time." The ungainly piece of honesty beamed and blushed as he said it, quite enraptured with the remembrance of having been serviceable.

"Last night," said Sloppy, "when I was a-turning at the wheel pretty late, the mangle seemed to go like Our Johnny's breathing. It begun beautiful, then as it went out it shook a little and got unsteady, then as it took the turn to come home it had a rattle-like and lumbered a bit, then it come smooth, and so it went on till I scarce know'd which was mangle and which was Our Johnny. Nor Our Johnny, he scarce know'd either, for sometimes when the mangle lumbers he says, 'Me choking, Granny!' and Mrs. Higden holds him up in her lap and says to me, 'Bide a bit, Sloppy,' and we all stops together. And when our Johnny gets his breathing again, I turns again, and we all goes on together."

Sloppy had gradually expanded with his description into a stare and a vacant grin. He now contracted, being silent, into a half-repressed gush of tears, and, under pretense of being heated, drew the under part of his sleeve across his eyes with a singularly awkward, laborious, and roundabout smear.

"This is unfortunate," said Rokesmith. "I must go and break it to Mrs. Boffin. Stay you here, Sloppy."

Sloppy staid there, staring at the pattern of the paper on the wall, until the Secretary and Mrs. Boffin came back together. And with Mrs. Boffin was a young lady (Miss Bella Wilfer by name) who was better worth staring at, it occurred to Sloppy, than the best of wall-papering.

"Ah, my poor dear pretty little John Harmon!" exclaimed Mrs. Boffin.

"Yes, mum," said the sympathetic Sloppy.

"You don't think he is in a very, very bad way, do you?" asked the pleasant creature with her wholesome cordiality.

Put upon his good faith, and finding it in collision with his inclinations, Sloppy threw back his head and uttered a mellifluous howl, rounded off with a sniff.

"So bad as that!" cried Mrs. Boffin. "And Betty Higden not to tell me of it sooner!"

"I think she might have been mistrustful, mum," answered Sloppy, hesitating.

"Of what, for Heaven's sake?"

"I think she might have been mistrustful, mum," returned Sloppy, with submission, "of standing in Our Johnny's light. There's so much trouble in illness, and so much expense, and she's seen such a lot of its being objected to."

"But she never can have thought," said Mrs. Boffin, "that I would grudge the dear child any thing?"

"No, mum, but she might have thought (as a habit-like) of its standing in Johnny's light, and might have tried to bring him through it unbeknownst."

Sloppy knew his ground well. To conceal herself in sickness, like a lower animal; to creep out of sight and coil herself away and die, had become this woman's instinct. To catch up in her arms the sick child who was dear to her, and hide it as if it were a criminal, and keep off all ministration but such as her own ignorant tenderness and patience could supply, had become this woman's idea of maternal love, fidelity, and duty. The shameful accounts we read, every week in the Christian year, my lords and gentle men and honorable boards, the infamous records of small official inhumanity, do not pass by the people as they pass by us. And hence these irrational, blind, and obstinate prejudices, so astonishing to our magnificence, and having no more reason in them—God save the Queen and Con-found their politics—no, than smoke has in coming from fire!

"It's not a right place for the poor child to stay in," said Mrs. Boffin. "Tell us, dear Mr. Rokesmith, what to do for the best."

He had already thought what to do, and the consultation was very short. He could pave the way, he said, in half an hour, and then they would go down to Brentford. "Pray take me," said Bella. Therefore a carriage was ordered, of capacity to take them all, and in the mean time Sloppy was regaled, feasting alone in the Secretary's room, with a complete realization of that fairy vision—meat, beer, vegetables, and pudding. In consequence of which his buttons became more importunate of public notice than before, with the exception of two or three about the region of the waistband, which modestly withdrew into a creasy retirement.

Punctual to the time appeared the carriage and the Secretary. He sat on the box, and Mr. Sloppy graced the rumble. So, to the Three Magpies as before: where Mrs. Boffin and Miss Bella were handed out, and whence they all went on foot to Mrs. Betty Higden's.

But, on the way down, they had stopped at a toy-shop, and had bought that noble charger, a description of whose points and trappings had on the last occasion conciliated the then worldly-minded orphan, and also a Noah's ark, and also a yellow bird with an artificial voice in him, and also a military doll so well dressed that if he had only been of life-size his brother-officers in the Guards might never have found him out. Bearing these gifts, they raised the latch of Betty Higden's door, and saw her sitting in the dimmest and furthest corner with poor Johnny in her lap.

"And how's my boy, Betty?" asked Mrs. Boffin, sitting down beside her.

"He's bad! he's bad!" said Betty. "I begin to be afeard he'll not be yours any more than mine. All others belonging to him have gone to the Power and the Glory, and I have a mind that they're drawing him to them—leading him away."

"No, no, no," said Mrs. Boffin.

"I don't know why else he clenches his little hand as if it had hold of a finger that I can't see. Look at it," said Betty, opening the wrappers in which the flushed child lay, and showing his small right hand lying closed upon his breast. "It's always so. It don't mind me."

"Is he asleep?"

"No, I think not. You're not asleep, my Johnny?"

"No," said Johnny, with a quiet air of pity for himself, and without opening his eyes.

"Here's the lady, Johnny. And the horse."

Johnny could bear the lady with complete indifference, but not the horse. Opening his heavy eyes, he slowly broke into a smile on beholding that splendid phenomenon, and wanted to take it in his arms. As it was much too big, it was put upon a chair where he could hold it by the mane and contemplate it. Which he soon forgot to do.

But, Johnny murmuring something with his eyes closed, and Mrs. Boffin not knowing what, old Betty bent her ear to listen and took pains to understand. Being asked by her to repeat what he had said, he did so two or three times, and then it came out that he must have seen more than they supposed when he looked up to see the horse, for the murmur was, "Who is the boofer lady?" Now, the boofer, or beautiful, lady was Bella; and whereas this notice from the poor baby would have touched her of itself, it was rendered more pathetic by the late melting of her heart to her poor little father, and their joke about the lovely woman. So, Bella's behavior was very tender and very natural when she kneeled on the brick floor to clasp the child, and when the child, with a child's admiration of what is young and pretty, fondled the boofer lady.

"Now, my good dear Betty," said Mrs. Boffin, hoping that she saw her opportunity, and laying her hand persuasively on her arm; "we have come to remove Johnny from this cottage to where he can be taken better care of."

Instantly, and before another word could be spoken, the old woman started up with blazing eyes, and rushed at the door with the sick child.

"Stand away from me every one of ye!" she cried out wildly. "I see what ye mean now. Let me go my way, all of ye. I'd sooner kill the Pretty, and kill myself!"

"Stay, stay!" said Rokesmith, soothing her. "You don't understand."

"I understand too well. I know too much about it, Sir. I've run from it too many a year. No! Never for me, nor for the child, while there's water enough in England to cover us!"

The terror, the shame, the passion of horror and repugnance, firing the worn face and perfectly maddening it, would have been a quite terrible sight, if embodied in one old fellow-creature alone. Yet it "crops up"—as our slang goes—my lords and gentlemen and honorable boards, in other fellow-creatures, rather frequently!

"It's been chasing me all my life, but it shall never take me nor mine alive!" cried old Betty. "I've done with ye. I'd have fastened door and window and starved out, afore I'd ever have let ye in, if I had known what ye came for!"

But, catching sight of Mrs. Boffin's wholesome face, she relented, and crouching down by the door and bending over her burden to hush it, said humbly: "Maybe my fears has put me wrong. If they have so, tell me, and the good Lord forgive me! I'm quick to take this fright,

I know, and my head is summ'at light with wearying and watching."

"There, there, there!" returned Mrs. Boffin. "Come, come! Say no more of it, Betty. It was a mistake, a mistake. Any one of us might have made it in your place, and felt just as you do."

"The Lord bless ye!" said the old woman, stretching out her hand.

"Now, see, Betty," pursued the sweet compassionate soul, holding the hand kindly, "what I really did mean, and what I should have begun by saying out, if I had only been a little wiser and handier. We want to move Johnny to a place where there are none but children; a place set up on purpose for sick children; where the good doctors and nurses pass their lives with children, talk to none but children, touch none but children, comfort and cure none but children."

"Is there really such a place?" asked the old woman, with a gaze of wonder.

"Yes, Betty, on my word, and you shall see it. If my home was a better place for the dear boy I'd take him to it; but indeed indeed it's not."

"You shall take him," returned Betty, fervently kissing the comforting hand, "where you will, my deary. I am not so hard but that I believe your face and voice, and I will, as long as I can see and hear."

This victory gained, Rokesmith made haste to profit by it, for he saw how woefully time had been lost. He dispatched Sloppy to bring the carriage to the door; caused the child to be carefully wrapped up; bade old Betty get her bonnet on; collected the toys, enabling the little fellow to comprehend that his treasures were to be transported with him; and had all things prepared so easily that they were ready for the carriage as soon as it appeared, and in a minute afterward were on their way. Sloppy they left behind, relieving his overcharged breast with a paroxysm of mangling.

At the Children's Hospital the gallant steed, the Noah's ark, the yellow bird, and the officer in the Guards, were made as welcome as their child-owner. But the doctor said aside to Rokesmith. "This should have been days ago. Too late!"

However, they were all carried up into a fresh airy room, and there Johnny came to himself, out of a sleep or a swoon or whatever it was, to find himself lying in a little quiet bed, with a little platform over his breast, on which were already arranged, to give him heart and urge him to cheer up, the Noah's ark, the noble steed, and the yellow bird; with the officer in the Guards doing duty over the whole, quite as much to the satisfaction of his country as if he had been upon Parade. And at the bed's head was a colored picture beautiful to see, representing as it were another Johnny seated on the knee of some Angel surely who loved little children. And, marvelous fact, to lie and stare at: Johnny had become one of a little family, all in little quiet beds (except two playing dominoes in little arm-chairs at a little table on the hearth): and on all the little beds were little platforms whereon were to be seen dolls' houses, woolly dogs with mechanical barks in them not very dissimilar from the artificial voice pervading the bowels of the yellow bird, tin armies, Moorish tumblers, wooden tea-things, and the riches of the earth.

As Johnny murmured something in his placid admiration, the ministering women at his bed's head asked him what he said. It seemed that he wanted to know whether all these were brothers and sisters of his? So they told him yes. It seemed then that he wanted to know whether God had brought them all together there? So they told him yes again. They made out then that he wanted to know whether they would all get out of pain? So they answered yes to that question likewise, and made him understand that the reply included himself.

Johnny's powers of sustaining conversation were as yet so very imperfectly developed, even in a state of health, that in sickness they were little more than monosyllabic. But he had to be washed and tended, and remedies were applied, and though those offices were far, far more skillfully and lightly done than ever any thing had been done for him in his little life, so rough and short, they would have hurt and tired him but for an amazing circumstance which laid hold of his attention. This was no less than the appearance on his own little platform in pairs, of All Creation, on its way into his own particular ark: the elephant leading, and the fly, with a diffident sense of its size, politely bringing up the rear. A very little brother lying in the next bed with a broken leg, was so enchanted by this spectacle that his delight exalted its enthralling interest; and so came rest and sleep.

"I see you are not afraid to leave the dear child here, Betty," whispered Mrs. Boffin.

"No, ma'am. Most willingly, most thankfully, with all my heart and soul."

So they kissed him, and left him there, and old Betty was to come back early in the morning, and nobody but Rokesmith knew for certain how that the doctor had said "This should have been days ago. Too late!"

But, Rokesmith knowing it, and knowing that his bearing it in mind would be acceptable thereafter to that good woman who had been the only light in the childhood of desolate John Harmon dead and gone, resolved that late at night he would go back to the bedside of John Harmon's namesake, and see how it fared with him.

The family whom God had brought together were not all asleep, but were all quiet. From bed to bed a light womanly tread and a pleasant fresh face passed in the silence of the night. A little head would lift itself up into the softened light here and there, to be kissed as the face went by—for these little patients are very loving—and would then submit itself to be composed to rest again. The mite with the broken leg was restless, and moaned; but after a while turned his face toward Johnny's bed, to fortify himself with a view of the ark, and fell asleep. Over most of the beds the toys were yet grouped as the children had left them when they last laid themselves down, and, in their innocent grotesqueness and incongruity, they might have stood for the children's dreams.

The doctor came in too, to see how it fared with Johnny. And he and Rokesmith stood together, looking down with compassion on him.

"What is it, Johnny?" Rokesmith was the questioner, and put an arm round the poor baby as he made a struggle.

"Him!" said the little fellow. "Those!"

The doctor was quick to understand children, and, taking the horse, the ark, the yellow bird, and the man in the Guards, from Johnny's bed, softly placed them on that of his next neighbor, the mite with the broken leg.

With a weary and yet a pleased smile, and with an action as if he stretched his little finger out to rest, the child heaved his body on the sustaining arm, and seeking Rokesmith's face with his lips, said:

"A kiss for the boofer lady."

Having now bequeathed all he had to dispose of, and arranged his affairs in this world, Johnny, thus speaking, left it.

CHAPTER X.

A SUCCESSOR.

SOME of the Reverend Frank Milvey's brethren had found themselves exceedingly uncomfortable in their minds, because they were required to bury the dead too hopefully. But, the Reverend Frank, inclining to the belief that they were required to do one or two other things (say out of nine-and-thirty) calculated to trouble their consciences rather more if they would think as much about them, held his peace.

Indeed, the Reverend Frank Milvey was a forbearing man, who noticed many sad warps and blights in the vineyard wherein he worked, and did not profess that they made him savagely wise. He only learned that the more he himself knew, in his little limited human way, the better he could distantly imagine what Omniscience might know.

Wherefore, if the Reverend Frank had had to read the words that troubled some of his brethren, and profitably touched innumerable hearts, in a worse case than Johnny's, he would have done so out of the pity and humility of his soul. Reading them over Johnny, he thought of his own six children, but not of his poverty, and read them with dimmed eyes. And very seriously did he and his bright little wife, who had been listening, look down into the small grave and walk home arm-in-arm.

There was grief in the aristocratic house, and there was joy in the Bower. Mr. Wegg argued, if an orphan were wanted, was he not an orphan himself, and could a better be desired? And why go beating about Brentford bushes, seeking orphans forsooth who had established no claims upon you and made no sacrifices for you, when here was an orphan ready to your hand who had given up in your cause Miss Elizabeth, Master George, Aunt Jane, and Uncle Parker?

Mr. Wegg chuckled, consequently, when he heard the tidings. Nay, it was afterward affirmed by a witness who shall at present be nameless, that in the seclusion of the Bower he poked out his wooden leg, in the stage-ballet manner, and executed a taunting or triumphant pirouette on the genuine leg remaining to him.

John Rokesmith's manner toward Mrs. Boffin at this time was more the manner of a young man toward a mother than that of a Secretary toward his employer's wife. It had always been marked by a subdued affectionate deference that seemed to have sprung up on the very day of his engagement; whatever was odd in her dress or her ways had seemed to have no oddity for him; he had sometimes borne a quietly-amused face in her company, but still it had seemed as if the pleasure her genial temper and radiant nature yielded him could have been quite as naturally expressed in a tear as in a smile. The completeness of his sympathy with her fancy for having a little John Harmon to protect and rear, he had shown in every act and word, and now that the kind fancy was disappointed, he treated it with a manly tenderness and respect for which she could hardly thank him enough.

"But I do thank you, Mr. Rokesmith," said Mrs. Boffin, "and I thank you most kindly. You love children."

"I hope every body does."

"They ought," said Mrs. Boffin; "but we don't all of us do what we ought; do us?"

John Rokesmith replied, "Some among us supply the shortcomings of the rest. You have loved children well, Mr. Boffin has told me."

"Not a bit better than he has, but that's his way; he puts all the good upon me. You speak rather sadly, Mr. Rokesmith."

"Do I?"

"It sounds to me so. Were you one of many children?"

He shook his head.

"An only child?"

"No, there was another. Dead long ago."

"Father or mother alive?"

"Dead."

"And the rest of your relations?"

"Dead—if I ever had any living. I never heard of any."

At this point of the dialogue Bella came in with a light step. She paused at the door a moment, hesitating whether to remain or retire; perplexed by finding that she was not observed.

"Now, don't mind an old lady's talk," said Mrs. Boffin, "but tell me. Are you quite sure,

Mr. Rokesmith, that you have never had a disappointment in love?"

"Quite sure. Why do you ask me?"

"Why, for this reason. Sometimes you have a kind of kept-down manner with you, which is not like your age. You can't be thirty?"

"I am not yet thirty."

Deeming it high time to make her presence known, Bella coughed here to attract attention, begged pardon, and said she would go, fearing that she interrupted some matter of business.

"No, don't go," rejoined Mrs. Boffin, "because we are coming to business, instead of having begun it, and you belong to it as much now, my dear Bella, as I do. But I want my Noddy to consult with us. Would somebody be so good as find my Noddy for me?"

Rokesmith departed on that errand, and presently returned accompanied by Mr. Boffin at his jog-trot. Bella felt a little vague trepidation as to the subject-matter of this same consultation, until Mrs. Boffin announced it.

"Now, you come and sit by me, my dear," said that worthy soul, taking her comfortable place on a large ottoman in the centre of the room, and drawing her arm through Bella's; "and Noddy, you sit here, and Mr. Rokesmith you sit there. Now, you see, what I want to talk about, is this. Mr. and Mrs. Milvey have sent me the kindest note possible (which Mr. Rokesmith just now read to me out loud, for I ain't good at handwritings), offering to find me another little child to name and educate and bring up. Well. This has set me thinking."

("And she is a steam-ingen at it," murmured Mr. Boffin, in an admiring parenthesis, "when she once begins. It mayn't be so easy to start her; but once started, she's a ingen.")

"—This has set me thinking, I say," repeated Mrs. Boffin, cordially beaming under the influence of her husband's compliment, "and I have thought two things. First of all, that I have grown timid of reviving John Harmon's name. It's an unfortunate name, and I fancy I should reproach myself if I gave it to another dear child, and it proved again unlucky."

"Now, whether," said Mr. Boffin, gravely propounding a case for his Secretary's opinion; "whether one might call that a superstition?"

"It is a matter of feeling with Mrs. Boffin," said Rokesmith, gently. "The name has always been unfortunate. It has now this new unfortunate association connected with it. The name has died out. Why revive it? Might I ask Miss Wilfer what she thinks?"

"It has not been a fortunate name for me," said Bella, coloring—"or at least it was not, until it led to my being here—but that is not the point in my thoughts. As we had given the name to the poor child, and as the poor child took so lovingly to me, I think I should feel jealous of calling another child by it. I think I should feel as if the name had become endeared to me, and I had no right to use it so."

"And that's your opinion?" remarked Mr.

Boffin, observant of the Secretary's face and again addressing him.

"I say again, it is a matter of feeling," returned the Secretary. "I think Miss Wilfer's feeling very womanly and pretty."

"Now, give us your opinion, Noddy," said Mrs. Boffin.

"My opinion, old lady," returned the Golden Dustman, "is your opinion."

"Then," said Mrs. Boffin, "we agree not to revive John Harmon's name, but to let it rest in the grave. It is, as Mr. Rokesmith says, a matter of feeling, but Lor how many matters are matters of feeling! Well; and so I come to the second thing I have thought of. You must know, Bella, my dear, and Mr. Rokesmith, that when I first named to my husband my thoughts of adopting a little orphan boy in remembrance of John Harmon, I further named to my husband that it was comforting to think that how the poor boy would be benefited by John's own money, and protected from John's own forlornness."

"Hear, hear!" cried Mr. Boffin. "So she did. Ancoar!"

"No, not Ancoar, Noddy, my dear," returned Mrs. Boffin, "because I am going to say something else. I meant that, I am sure, as much as I still mean it. But this little death has made me ask myself the question, seriously, whether I wasn't too bent upon pleasing myself. Else why did I seek out so much for a pretty child, and a child quite to my liking? Wanting to do good, why not do it for its own sake, and put my tastes and likings by?"

"Perhaps," said Bella; and perhaps she said it with some little sensitiveness arising out of those old curious relations of hers toward the murdered man; "perhaps, in reviving the name, you would not have liked to give it to a less interesting child than the original. He interested you very much."

"Well, my dear," returned Mrs. Boffin, giving her a squeeze, "it's kind of you to find that reason out, and I hope it may have been so, and indeed to a certain extent I believe it was so, but I am afraid not to the whole extent. However, that don't come in question now, because we have done with the name."

"Laid it up as a remembrance," suggested Bella, musingly.

"Much better said, my dear; laid it up as a remembrance. Well then: I have been thinking if I take any orphan to provide for, let it not be a pet and a plaything for me, but a creature to be helped for its own sake."

"Not pretty then?" said Bella.

"No," returned Mrs. Boffin, stoutly.

"Nor prepossessing then?" said Bella.

"No," returned Mrs. Boffin. "Not necessarily so. That's as it may happen. A well-disposed boy comes in my way who may be even a little wanting in such advantages for getting on in life, but is honest and industrious and requires a helping hand and deserves it. If I am very much in earnest and quite determined to be unselfish, let me take care of him."

Here the footman whose feelings had been hurt on the former occasion appeared, and crossing to Rokesmith apologetically announced the objectionable Sloppy.

The four members of Council looked at one another, and paused. "Shall he be brought here, ma'am?" asked Rokesmith.

"Yes," said Mrs. Boffin. Whereupon the footman disappeared, reappeared presenting Sloppy, and retired much disgusted.

The consideration of Mrs. Boffin had clothed Mr. Sloppy in a suit of black, on which the tailor had received personal directions from Rokesmith to expend the utmost cunning of his art, with a view to the concealment of the cohering and sustaining buttons. But, so much more powerful were the frailties of Sloppy's form than the strongest resources of tailoring science, that he now stood before the Council a perfect Argus in the way of buttons: shining and winking and gleaming and twinkling out of a hundred of those eyes of bright metal, at the dazzled spectators. The artistic taste of some unknown hatter had furnished him with a hat-band of wholesale capacity, which was fluted behind, from the crown of his hat to the brim, and terminated in a black bunch, from which the imagination shrunk discomfited and the reason revolted. Some special powers with which his legs were endowed had already hitched up his glossy trowsers at the ankles and bagged them at the knees; while similar gifts in his arms had raised his coat-sleeves from his wrists and accumulated them at his elbows. Thus set forth, with the additional embellishments of a very little tail to his coat, and a yawning gulf at his waistband, Sloppy stood confessed.

"And how is Betty, my good fellow?" Mrs. Boffin asked him.

"Thankee, mum," said Sloppy, "she do pretty nicely, and sending her dooty and many thanks for the tea and all faviors, and wishing to know the family's healths."

"Have you just come, Sloppy?"

"Yes, mum."

"Then you have not had your dinner yet?"

"No, mum. But I mean to it. For I ain't forgotten your handsome orders that I was never to go away without having had a good 'un off of meat and beer and pudding—no: there was four of 'em, for I reckoned 'em up when I had 'em; meat one, beer two, vegetables three, and which was four?—Why, pudding, he was four!" Here Sloppy threw his head back, opened his mouth wide, and laughed rapturously.

"How are the two poor little Minders?" asked Mrs. Boffin.

"Striking right out, mum, and coming round beautiful."

Mrs. Boffin looked on the other three members of Council, and then said, beckoning with her finger:

"Sloppy."

"Yes, mum."

"Come forward, Sloppy. Should you like to dine here every day?"

"Off of all four on 'em, mum? Oh, mum!" Sloppy's feelings obliged him to squeeze his hat, and contract one leg at the knee.

"Yes. And should you like to be always taken care of here, if you were industrious and deserving?"

"Oh, mum!—But there's Mrs. Higden," said Sloppy, checking himself in his raptures, drawing back, and shaking his head with very serious meaning. "There's Mrs. Higden. Mrs. Higden goes before all. None can ever be better friends to me, than Mrs. Higden's been. And she must be turned for, must Mrs. Higden. Where would Mrs. Higden be if she warn't turned for!" At the mere thought of Mrs. Higden in this inconceivable affliction, Mr. Sloppy's countenance became pale, and manifested the most distressful emotions.

"You are as right as right can be, Sloppy," said Mrs. Boffin, "and far be it from me to tell you otherwise. It shall be seen to. If Betty Higden can be turned for all the same, you shall come here and be taken care of for life, and be made able to keep her in other ways than the turning."

"Even as to that, mum," answered the ecstatic Sloppy, "the turning might be done in the night, don't you see? I could be here in the day, and turn in the night. I don't want no sleep, I don't. Or even if I any ways should want a wink or two," added Sloppy, after a moment's apologetic reflection, "I could take 'em turning. I've took 'em turning many a time, and enjoyed 'em wonderful!"

On the grateful impulse of the moment Mr. Sloppy kissed Mrs. Boffin's hand, and then detaching himself from that good creature that he might have room enough for his feelings, threw back his head, opened his mouth wide, and uttered a dismal howl. It was creditable to his tenderness of heart, but suggested that he might on occasion give some offense to the neighbors: the rather, as the footman looked in, and begged pardon, finding he was not wanted, but excused himself, on the ground "that he thought it was Cats."

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 26th of November. The Presidential election, held on the 8th, resulted in the complete triumph of the "Union" or Administration party over the "Democratic" or Opposition. General M'Clellan receives the electoral vote of Delaware (3), Kentucky (11), and New Jersey (7), 21 in all. Mr. Lincoln receives that of the remaining 22 States, 213 in all. Mr. Lincoln has the vote of all the States which he received in 1860, with the exception of the half vote of New Jersey, which was cast for him in consequence of a division in the Opposition party. Besides these he received the 7 electoral votes of Maryland, which in 1860 were cast for Mr. Breckinridge, the 11 votes of Missouri cast for Douglas, and the 11 votes of the new States of Kansas, West Virginia, and Nevada. In the States which voted at this election there was in 1860 a popular majority of about 100,000 against Mr. Lincoln; the popular majority in his favor now is about 300,000.

An act was passed March 25 to enable the people of Nevada to form a Constitution and State government, and providing for the admission of the State into the Union. The conditions having been complied with, the President, on the 31st of October, issued a proclamation declaring the State of Nevada to be "admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States." The number of loyal States is now 25. The State was organized into a Territory March 2, 1861, its name, in Spanish, signifies "Snowy." It lies immediately east of California and west of Utah, embracing all the region between the 115th parallel of longitude (west of Greenwich, the 38th west of Washington) and the eastern boundary of California, and between the 37th parallel of north latitude, and the 42d, which separates it from California. It contains about 83,500 square miles, being nearly equal to New York and Ohio. Its white population in 1863 was estimated at 40,000, but is now much greater. A considerable portion of the State is unsuited to agricultural purposes, but in mineral wealth it is probably the richest region in the world. The capital is Carson city, which, in 1863, had a population of 2500. The Constitution prohibits slavery or involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crime, and establishes the supreme authority of the United States in every respect not incompatible with the rights secured to the State by its Constitution.

The constitutional election in Maryland, held on the 13th of October, resulted in the adoption of the new Constitution, prohibiting slavery, and declaring all slaves in the State to be free. On the home vote there was a majority of 1095 against the Constitution; but including the soldiers' vote there was an aggregate majority of 475 in its favor. The entire vote cast was about 60,000, being not quite two-thirds given at the Presidential election of 1860.

The military movements which have taken place during the month have not, in the East, been of a decisive nature. General Grant again moved October 27 against the Confederate right and left flank. An interval of just one month had occurred since his capture of Fort Harrison, and the extension of his right to the Darbytown Road. The armies of the James and the Potomac moved simultaneously. The Tenth Corps took up a position on the Darbytown Road, skirmishing all day with a portion of the enemy which was in its immediate front and under cover of the woods. The Eighteenth Corps, with Kautz's Division of cavalry, advanced northward across the Charles City Road to find, and, if possible, to turn Lee's left flank. At 4 P.M. this column reached the Williamsburg Road in the neighborhood of the "Seven Pines" battle-field. Two brigades were ordered to assault a position which appeared to be imperfectly defended; in carrying out the order they were exposed to an unusually severe cross-fire and retired, having lost very heavily in prisoners. At the same time Holman's colored brigade, four miles farther in the advance, captured a redoubt mounting two guns. The entire command then withdrew to its intrenchments. The main attack took place on the right and was directed against the Southside Railroad. The Second, Fifth, and Ninth Corps were engaged. The Second Corps, with Gregg's cavalry, started at 2 P.M. on the 26th, leaving only Miles's Division in camp, and moved southwestwardly toward Hatcher's Run, followed by the Fifth and Ninth. The next morning Gregg, keeping away to the left, encountered Hampton's cavalry pickets at the bridge over the Run, and, skirmishing all the while, moved up into close connection with the Second Corps, which had reached the Boydton plank-road. This connection was established a little after noon. The Second Corps had encamped the previous night just west of the Weldon Railroad, and had started for the Boydton Road, Egan in the advance. The Run was crossed early in the morning, and Egan crossed directly westward to the Boydton Road. Mott soon after came up, having previously advanced up to the Run by the Duncan Road, and captured the rebel works at Armstrong's Mill. It was now past noon, and Grant and Meade were now on the ground. Here the enemy were strongly posted where the Boydton Road crossed the Run, at the bridge before mentioned. The line ran thus: Gregg on the extreme left, Mott just left of the road, and Egan on the right; the line facing northward toward the Hatcher's Run Bridge. The enemy had a battery bearing from the road in the rear. Egan's advanced brigade crossed the Run, and the line was disposed for a general advance against the enemy's works. The Fifth Corps was now expected on the right. It had marched down the Duncan Road to Armstrong's Mill, having during the forenoon, with the Ninth on its right, confronted the enemy's works on the Run from the northeast. They had not been able to carry these works; and mistaking its route, the Fifth also failed to connect with the right of the Second Corps. The enemy, taking advantage of this, attacked Mott's division about 4 P.M., while preparations were being made for an advance of the Second Corps. Mott was driven and Egan exposed. The latter, however, equal to the emergency, changed front and repulsed the enemy, who retreated, leaving nearly a thousand prisoners in our hands. Our loss in this day's fighting on the right had been about 1500; on the left, though we took a large number of prisoners, we suffered more severely than the enemy in killed and wounded. Meade's army then withdrew to its former position.

The opposing armies in the Shenandoah have had no serious engagement since October 19, when was fought the battle of Cedar Creek. After that battle Early fell back toward Newmarket, throwing out strong bodies of cavalry northward toward Front Royal on the right and Mount Jackson on the left. Sheridan broke camp at Cedar Creek November 9, and fell back to Newtown, and on the 10th to Kearns town, four miles south of Winchester, the enemy's cavalry under Lomax pressing close upon his rear. Lomax attacked on the 12th and was repulsed; Powell's cavalry division pursued him beyond Front Royal, capturing two guns and 150 men. On the 21st a cavalry reconnaissance was undertaken by Custer, Powell, and Devin, the latter moving toward Front Royal and up the Luray Valley, while the two former advanced beyond Mount Jackson, encountering Early's main column at Rood's Hill, on the north fork of the Shenandoah. A sharp skirmish ensued, in which the Federal loss was about 60.

In the mean time General Breckinridge, relieving Echols in southwestern Virginia, had organized a strong force, and was able to make an extensive raid in that portion of the State. October 2 he encountered General Burbridge, who was advancing on the rebel works at Saltville, Virginia. The battle was fought on the banks of the Holston River, and lasted from 11 A.M. till 5 P.M. The enemy was intrenched, yet was driven some distance, but he was reinforced toward evening, and Burbridge, having a scanty supply of food and ammunition, withdrew at night. We next find Breckinridge in East Tennessee, where, about the middle of November, he joined Vaughan, who, a few days before, had been defeated by General Gillem at Morristown and driven 76 miles to Bristol. After this pursuit Gillem began to fall back on Bull's Gap, closely pressed in rear and flank by Breckinridge's and Vaughan's commands. The retreat was continued to Morristown, where, on the night of the 13th, his position was turned by the enemy, who attacked him at midnight on both flanks, at the same time piercing his centre. The enemy had a body of cavalry under Duke, which increased the panic among Gillem's men, who were surrounded and lost all their artillery. The routed army, under cover of darkness, succeeded in escaping to Strawberry Plains, where the passage across the Holston was strongly defended, and a check was given to the pursuit of the enemy. Gillem's loss was estimated at 400.

General Price has been driven out of Missouri. He avoided Jefferson City early in October, and moved westward to the Kansas border. Pleasanton, with 8000 cavalry, immediately started from Sedalia in pursuit, while the Kansas troops, under General Blunt, attacked from the North. Price then turned southward toward Fort Scott, making a stand at every stream, but in each instance being defeated with considerable loss in men and guns. By the 8th of November he had been driven south of the Arkansas River, and beyond the Federal posts at Fayetteville, Fort Gibson, and Fort Smith.

When Sherman took Atlanta, September 3, he had finished one campaign. He then proposed to rest his army and gather supplies, preparatory to extending his lines of occupation farther southward and eastward. But Hood forced him to postpone this advance by contesting with him the possession of the Chattanooga Railroad. Thus began a new campaign, planned by General Hood, which proved to be of short duration. Forrest crossed the Tennessee, took Athens, and attacked the railroads running from Nashville to Decatur and Chattanooga; Hood crossed the Chattahoochee and advanced against the railroad south of Chattanooga. General Thomas, with the Army of the Ohio, was dispatched to reinforce Rousseau and to confront Forrest, who was compelled to recross the Tennessee. Thus the branch of the railroad north of Chattanooga was secure against attack. In the mean time General Corse repulsed Hood at Allatoona, October 5, and saved the southern section of the road. Resaca was attacked on the 13th, and successfully defended by the Federal garrison under Colonel Weaver; Hood succeeded, however, in temporarily injuring the railroad between that post and Dalton. Sherman, leaving only Slocum's Corps at Atlanta, kept close in Hood's rear, and at length forced him westward into Northern Alabama. In the mean time the railroad was repaired before the end of October, and the supplies for which Sherman waited were soon shipped to Atlanta. Time had also been given to organize a force under General Thomas adequate, independently of Sherman's main column, for the defense of Western Tennessee. Hood had failed to accomplish the purpose of his campaign; but he still remained in Northern Alabama, on and near the line of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad. General Beauregard assumed command of the Military Division of the West October 17.

General Sherman then began to leave Hood's rear and to move toward Atlanta, to pursue his original plan, which was now in a peculiar manner favored by the enemy's absence from his front. He issued his orders for the advance from Kingston November 9. The army was to march in two columns: the Fifteenth and Seventeenth Corps forming one column, under General Howard; and the Fourteenth and Twentieth another, under General Slocum. A column of 9000 cavalry accompanied the expedition. The march to be resumed every morning at seven o'clock, and fifteen miles to be made each day. No command ever to be without ten days' rations and three days' forage, and, so far as possible, the army to live off the country. No private property to be destroyed, except where the march is resisted. The advance was commenced on the 11th, toward Augusta, Georgia. While Slocum was preparing to evacuate Atlanta he was attacked by Iverson's cavalry, which was severely punished. Sherman destroyed the Chattanooga Railroad in his rear, and burned every thing which would be valuable to the enemy at Rome and Atlanta.

General Forrest, driven west of the Tennessee River, determined to occupy Johnsonville. A dispatch from Beauregard to Richmond, November 8, claims that on the 5th Forrest had destroyed four gun-boats, each mounting eight guns, at Johnsonville, besides fourteen steamers and twenty barges, with from 75,000 to 100,000 tons of quarter-masters' stores. The Federal garrison at that point being reinforced by 5000 men, Forrest withdrew.

On the night of October 27 Lieutenant Cushing, with a company of thirteen men, ascended the Roanoke River to Plymouth, and succeeded in destroying the ram Albemarle, the most formidable vessel which the enemy had in North Carolina waters, by means of a torpedo. His own launch was disabled at the same time, and the entire company, except himself and one other, were captured by the enemy on shore. Three days after this event four vessels of Admiral Porter's fleet went up Middle River, which connects with Roanoke River above Plymouth. When within range of the town they opened fire upon it, and the next morning, October 31, the regular attack was made, the fleet passing into and down the Roanoke in front of Plymouth.

After a short engagement the enemy abandoned the town. Washington also was abandoned November 9.

The Confederate privateer Florida, Captain Morris, was captured October 7 by the U. S. Steamer Wachusett, Captain Collins, at Bahia, in the Bay of St. Salvador, on the Brazilian coast. Captain Morris and a good portion of the crew were on shore at the time of the capture. The vessel was taken in Brazilian waters; but Captain Collins thought the act justified by the indulgence of the authorities at Bahia in allowing harborage to the Florida, which had in a number of instances burned American vessels within the limits of Brazilian jurisdiction.

The Confederate Congress reassembled at Richmond on the 7th of November. In the Senate 13 members were present, including three from Kentucky and Missouri. Mr. Stephens, the Vice-President, was absent, and the chair was occupied by Mr. Hunter. The House consists of 106 members, of whom 62 were present, including 15 from Missouri and Kentucky. Excluding these States, which are in no practical respect members of the Confederacy, hardly half of the members were present.—The Message of President Davis opened with a congratulatory review of the campaign of 1864. At the beginning of the year, he said, Texas was partially in the possession of the enemy; now no Federal soldiers were in the State except as prisoners. In Northwestern Louisiana a large Federal army and fleet had been defeated, and had only escaped with a loss of one-third of its numbers, and a large part of its munitions and vessels. Arkansas had been nearly recovered; and the Confederate forces had penetrated into Missouri. On the east of the Mississippi, in spite of some reverses, the Confederates had been on the whole successful; Northern and Western Mississippi, Northern Alabama, and Western Tennessee were in their possession. On the sea-coast the successes of the Federals had been confined to the capture of the outer defenses of Mobile Bay. Their armies had been defeated in different parts of Virginia; and after a series of defeats around Richmond, they were still engaged in the effort, commenced four months before, to capture Petersburg. The army of Sherman, though it had captured Atlanta, had gained no real advantage beyond the possession of a few fortified points which can be held only by large garrisons, and are menaced with recapture. The Confederacy, Mr. Davis said, has no vital points. If Richmond and Wilmington and Charleston and Savannah and Mobile were all captured, the Confederacy would remain as defiant as ever, and no peace would be made which did not recognize its independence.—In respect to the relations between the Confederacy and foreign nations there had been no change. European Powers had failed to do what might have been expected from them; and until they, by recognizing the independence of the South, declared that it was impossible for the Union to reduce the Confederacy, it could not be expected that the Union would do so.—Mr. Davis recommends the repeal of all laws granting exemption from military service. He says that “no position or pursuit should relieve any one who is able to do active duty from the enrollment in the army,” unless he can be more useful in another sphere, and this can not be the case with entire classes. The military authorities should have the power to exempt individuals only whose services may be more valuable in than out of the army.—In regard to the great question of the employment of slaves in the army, Mr. Davis recommends that slaves to the number of 40,000 should be “acquired” by the General Government, who should be employed not merely as ordinary laborers, cooks, and teamsters, but as engineer and pioneer laborers. He recommends that these slaves should be liberated on their discharge after faithful service, rather than that they should be manumitted at once or retained in servitude. He is opposed, under present circumstances, to arming the slaves; but he adds, “The subject is to be viewed solely in the light of policy and our social economy. Should the alternative ever be presented of subjugation or of the employment of the slave as a soldier, there seems to be no reason to doubt what then should be our decision.”

The Report of Mr. Trenholm, the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury, presents the following essential points: Six dollars in specie is worth one hundred dollars in 6 per cent. bonds, or one hundred and thirty-five dollars in currency. The total domestic debt of the Confederacy on the 1st of October was $1,147,976,000, besides bounty bonds due to soldiers, the amount of which is not given. Moreover, there is the foreign debt, put down at £2,200,000; this, when reduced to “currency,” amounts to about $250,000,000; so that the entire public debt is really more than $1,500,000,000. During the last six months the debt had increased at the rate of more than half a million of dollars a day. The Secretary presents an elaborate scheme for giving value to the currency. The essential features are: No more notes to be issued; one-fifth of the taxes to be pledged for the reduction of the outstanding notes until the amount of “currency” is reduced to $150,000,000. The specific taxes which the Secretary recommends should be appropriated to the redemption of currency are the “tithes” levied upon cotton, wheat, and corn. Estimating cotton at 50 cents a pound, wheat at $4 and corn at $2 a bushel, these tithes will produce $90,000,000 a year. This amount applied annually would redeem the outstanding notes in four or five years. “If Congress does not,” says Mr. Trenholm, “interpose to restore the currency by means of voluntary action, it will assuredly rectify itself by some violent and disastrous revulsion.”—The expenditures for the year beginning January 1, 1865, are estimated, “with an improved currency,” at $774,000,000. To meet this the Secretary proposes taxation, including tax in kind of $360,000,000; duties and miscellaneous receipts are estimated at $5,000,000; the remaining $409,000,000 to be derived from the sale of bonds and from certificates of indebtedness.

The Report of Mr. Seddon, the Confederate Secretary of War, details the military events of the year. It is absolutely necessary, he says, that the Confederacy should put its entire fighting population into the field; he therefore urges that all men between the ages of 18 and 45 capable of bearing arms “should, without distinction of occupation or profession, be subjected to service, and called to the field,” and that consequently “all exemptions, except of officers absolutely essential to the conduct of the Confederate and State governments, be abolished.” The slaves and the free population over or under military age, and those unfit by physical disability for actual service, he thinks will be able to furnish supplies for the armies and the people.—He discusses at length the question of arming the slaves, with its necessary adjunct, their emancipation. Any legislation for this purpose, he says, must have the concurrence of the separate States. If this should become necessary he is in favor of it; but he adds, "It will not do, in my opinion, to risk our liberties and safety on the negro while the white man may be called to the sacred duty of defense. For the present it seems best to leave the subordinate labors of society to the negro, and to impose its highest, as now existing, on the superior class."

The steamer Roanoke, plying between New York and Havana, was seized on the 29th of September, when just out of Havana, by a party of Confederates, who had come on board as passengers. The vessel was taken off Bermuda, where her passengers were put on shore, and the steamer burned. The captors were commanded by Lieutenant Braine, who not long since seized in a similar manner the Chesapeake when just out of New York. The Confederates were arrested by the British authorities at Bermuda, but were set at liberty after a short detention.—The Confederate raiders who made the attack upon St. Albans have been demanded by the Governor of Vermont on charge of murder and robbery. Their leader, Lieutenant Young, produced a commission and orders from the Confederate Government authorizing and directing him to undertake such an enterprise. The decision of the question of extradition has been postponed in order to enable the prisoners to procure testimony from Richmond.

An arrangement has been effected, after many delays, between the Union and Confederate authorities, involving the exchange of many thousands of prisoners. The arrangement has primary reference to the sick and disabled, all of whom are exchangeable man for man, each officer to be reckoned at a certain number of privates, according to a schedule agreed upon. It is supposed that from 8000 to 10,000 on each side will be accordingly exchanged. The Confederate prisoners are sent on board Union vessels to the entrance of the port of Savannah, where the Union prisoners are to be delivered.—By another special arrangement, entered into between Generals Lee and Grant, each belligerent is allowed to send necessary supplies and comforts to its prisoners in the hands of the other. Blankets and clothing being articles of immediate necessity for the Confederate prisoners, and these not being procurable at the South, and not from Europe in time to be of use, the Government is allowed to send cotton to the North to be sold, and the proceeds applied to the purchase of these articles.

Literary Notices.

Memoirs of Lieutenant-General Scott, LL.D. Written by Himself. The career of Winfield Scott has been an honorable and singularly fortunate one. The two great disappointments of his political life—his superseding for the Presidential nomination by Taylor in 1848, and his defeat for the Presidency by Pierce in 1852—were blessings in disguise. For the ten years during which his public life lasted after the latter of these, no other man stood so high in the regard and esteem of his country. From first to last his record was pure. For half a century he has lived in the public eye, and no man dared charge him with a corrupt, and few with an injudicious act. He was born in 1786, near Petersburg, in Virginia. Left his own master at nineteen, with a moderate competency, he began the study of law; but the prospect of a war with England in 1808 induced him to change his profession for that of arms, and at the age of twenty-two he received a commission as Captain of Artillery. War having been declared in 1812, he was promoted to a Lieutenant-Colonelcy, and sent to the Northern frontier. It was chiefly owing to him that the campaigns here were not a series of disasters. Desperately wounded at the Battle of Lundy's Lane—in all except the numbers engaged one of the great battles of history—he was borne half dead on a litter for more than seventy miles by the gentlemen of the country, who relieved each other at the edge of every town. Three months before he had reached the age of twenty-eight he was appointed Brigadier-General; and four months later he was promoted to Major-General, a rank which he has held for forty-one years. In 1849 he was named Lieutenant-General, a grade which had been vacant since the death of Washington. In 1861, broken with age and infirmity, he was compelled to retire from active service. But his mental vigor was unimpaired, and he has worthily devoted his well-won repose to writing the memoirs of his long and honorable life. History would be better and more truly written if other men who have acted a great part in public affairs would narrate their actions as fairly and succinctly as General Scott has done. (Published by Sheldon and Company.)

Margaret Denzil's History; annotated by her Husband, issued anonymously in the "Cornhill Magazine," is the most original and powerful novel of the season. It contains plot and incident enough for half a score of "sensation tales," yet so skillfully are they managed that until the close the reader fails to perceive how masterly the skill was. It is a drama in which every event and episode is arranged from the first scene; the slightest circumstance, apparently incidental, or accidental, has a bearing upon all that follows. The characters, though mainly out of the common range of life, are artistically true, for all act throughout in perfect consistency with their natures. There are at least four characters which are absolutely fresh creations. These are John Denzil, the bluff, tender seaman, the annotator of his wife's sad story; Arthur Lamont, apparently so weak, yet really so strong, able and willing to bear the imputation of infamy rather than expose the infamy of others; Godfrey Wilmot, the pervading evil genius of the story—yet so far from being wholly evil—who never appears in person on the scene, but whose shadow is forever projected upon the wall; and, above all, Mercy, the "Torment" of poor John Denzil. The sombre conclusion of the story, which could not have been other than it is, will not please those who prefer the old stage ending of Lear to that devised by the perfect genius of Shakspeare. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Webster's Dictionary. It is too late to speak of the general merits of Webster's Dictionary. The completeness of its vocabulary, and the compactness and accuracy of its definitions, have long been acknowledged. The new edition, prepared under the supervision of Professors Goodrich and Porter, of Yale, with the co-operation of thirty or more scholars in special departments, presents many features of great value. The most striking of these is the profuse introduction of pictorial illustrations, the number of which is stated at more than 3000. These are usually inserted in their appropriate place in the Vocabulary, and all of them are grouped together in an Appendix at the close, arranged according to subjects: those relating to Architecture, Botany, Natural History, etc., being placed together. The type adopted for the catch-words is such as to allow the diacritical marks indicating pronunciation and accentuation to be distinctly shown. The Vocabulary has been greatly enlarged, so as to keep up with the continual growth of a living language. The whole number of words given is now stated to be 114,000, being 10,000 more than are found in any other Dictionary of the language. The "apparatus" prefixed or appended to the Vocabulary presents, in addition to that contained in former editions, some entirely new articles. Professor Goodrich's Table of Synonyms has been distributed throughout the text in the appropriate places. An admirable outline History of the English Language, by Professor Hadley, forms a part of the Introduction. Mr. William G. Webster's collection of words and phrases which, without having become fairly English, are of frequent occurrence in books, is very full and satisfactory. The list of "Common English Christian Names," with an explanation of their significance, is exceedingly curious. An entirely new and very acceptable addition to this edition is Mr. Wheeler's "Vocabulary of the Names of Noted Fictitious Persons and Places." As a first attempt in this department the article is altogether remarkable. There is hardly a character, epithet, or place which has made its mark in literature, which is not here referred to author and work, with a brief descriptive note. We have touched only upon a few out of many of the merely incidental features which distinguish this new edition of Webster. The great essential characteristics, only more fully developed, are the same as in previous editions. Viewing it as a whole, we are confident that no other living language has a Dictionary which so fully and faithfully sets forth its present condition as this last edition of Webster does that of our spoken and written English tongue. Under the Ban. The popular literature of France at this day is "protestant," in the broadest literal sense of the word. No man can hope for a great audience unless he sets himself in fierce opposition to some of the forms in which society is organized. Thus Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables" is a fierce protest against the whole frame-work and structure of French social life. Renan's "Life of Jesus" is a protest against the theology of the Catholic Church. "Under the Ban" is a vehement protest against and fierce attack upon the ecclesiastical system of France, and, by consequence, of all Catholic Europe. Under the guise of a story, the author sets forth the Jesuits as unscrupulous intriguers; the higher orders of the clergy as selfish hypocrites; the lower orders as illiterate and prejudiced, without liberty, even if they had the capacity, of thinking for themselves; abjectly subject to the civil powers, by whom they are paid, and with no protection from the tyranny of their spiritual chiefs. The work, under its French title of Le Maudit, "The Accursed," purports to be the biography of a priest who has fallen "under the ban" of ecclesiastical authority. It was put forth anonymously, merely purporting to have been written by "M. l'Abbé ***." Its popularity was immense, and strenuous efforts have been made to discover the author, but hitherto without success. It has been acknowledged to be a heavy blow at the mixed civil and ecclesiastical system of France. One who reads it from a French stand-point and as a polemical work, will find it intensely interesting. Viewed simply as a novel—a delineation of incident and character—it is faulty, and in parts at least dull. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

From Dan to Beersheba, by Rev. J. P. NEWMAN. In the compass of a single moderate volume Mr. Newman presents a graphic description of the Land of Promise, as it now appears, drawn from personal observation and a faithful study of the works of others. Its special purpose is, by describing Palestine as it now is, and comparing it with the accounts of its former condition given in the Scriptures, to illustrate the accuracy with which the sacred writers record the facts of their own day, and the truthfulness with which they foretell what was to come. The book is written in a glowing and animated style, which removes it from the mere dry detail of a guide-book, rendering it not only useful but interesting. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Queens of Song, by ELLEN CREATHORNE CLAYTON. This is a series of biographies of about forty of the most celebrated vocalists who have appeared on the lyric stage during the last two centuries, beginning with the early French singer, Marthe le Rochois, and ending with Teresa Tietjens, including such names as Anastasia Robinson (who became Countess of Peterborough), and Lavinia Fenton (who became Duchess of Bolton), Catalani, Pasta, Sontag, Malibran, Grisi, Garcia, Alboni, Jenny Lind, and Piccolomini. The "queens" have been selected with the two-fold object of including those who have won the highest renown in their art, and others who, less famous as artists, have had a career and fortunes which furnish an instructive moral. The circumstances into which famous actresses and singers are thrown render their histories the most perfect epitome of certain phases of the society and manners of their times; their lives, unlike those of great writers, abound in incident and anecdote. With such a subject, and with a reasonable amount of industry, it would be almost impossible to make a dull book. The author has made one emphatically readable. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Idyls of Battle, by LAURA C. REDDEN. Apart from the poetical merits of this little volume, it derives a special interest from the personality of the author. Since the age of eleven, now some fifteen years ago, she has been absolutely deaf. During all those long years she has not heard the sound of a human voice; yet under the nom de plume of "Howard Glyndon" she has won a respectable place in literature. It is certainly remarkable that her poems, composed under such disadvantages, should be faultless in rhyme and, with hardly an exception, accurate in rhythm. (Published by Hurd and Houghton.)

Arctic Researches, and Life among the Esquimaux, by CHARLES FRANCIS HALL. In former numbers of this Magazine we have given, from proof-sheets, a general view of the scope and character of this work. Now that it is completed, and we may look upon it as a whole, we need only repeat that, as regards both matter and manner, it takes place in the first rank of the records of travel and adventure for which the last fifteen years has been so prolific. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOOD-MORROW and a happy New Year to all kind friends! A grateful Easy Chair can not but wish it, and invoke a benediction on the generous readers who hail this Magazine with ardent monthly salutations.

And why should they not, indeed? For the Magazine has now become a cairn, a monument. It is of itself a library, and each new number a chapter in the valuable volume which every six numbers compose. If you have a set of this Magazine from the beginning, you have already, with the present issue, one hundred and seventy-six numbers, bound, if you choose, in thirty handsome volumes. And, for variety and interest of reading and copiousness of illustration, you will not easily find thirty other volumes superior to them. Indeed, if the Easy Chair were called upon to furnish, say a Western home upon the frontier, or a Maine farm-house, or any household any where with thirty books, not of reference merely, not only of useful knowledge, but thirty books that should appeal to the interest of the youngest and the oldest and the middle-aged, with the best stories of the best living authors, with the finest poems, the most rollicking passages of travel, histories, biographies, essays, sketches of inventions, discoveries, and manufactures, with humorous and characteristic anecdotes, he would certainly select the volumes of Harper's Magazine as the library desired.

Nor is this said to the prejudice of any of its contemporaries. "There is room enough for thee and me," quoth my Uncle Toby, as he dismissed the fly. Let it be so with us, O zealous brethren! and the Easy Chair and his companions between these gay covers will be either the fly or Uncle Toby, as you will.

See! The blithe cherub, ever young, who sits upon our crown and bestrides the globe, still blows his airy bubbles that float bright and perfect as ever. The flowers his brethren scatter, flowers of spring and summer, of autumn and winter, are they less fair and fresh and fragrant than when those lavish hands began the scattering fifteen years ago? The blossom-woven shafts still stand erect. The goodly tomes beneath are as solid and mysterious as ever. One day doubtless they will be opened and all their wisdom poured into these pages. Are these, then, the manuscript volumes of "a disappointed man?"

The conditions upon which the Magazine may be brought to your hands regularly and without trouble to yourselves are all recorded upon the last side of the cover. Upon that interesting page the Easy Chair is amazed to read that you may have the Monthly delivered at your post-office for four dollars and twenty-four cents a year. Think of it, noble brethren, who with the Easy Chair spread this monthly feast! The total result of our combined labor every month, the pampered and luxurious Public may enjoy for such a trifle! But if the sly Public choose to unite in clubs of five subscribers they can send twenty dollars and receive six copies, giving them one extra copy every month, the disposition of which may profitably create a generous rivalry. And this, dear brethren, as the good pastor says, this is the accepted time. The beginning of a new volume (it began last month) is a most favorable season for forming clubs. And in this game clubs are certainly trumps, and are sure to take the odd trick.

Among the especial attractions of the volume so auspiciously begun is the new story "Armada," by Wilkie Collins, who, with Anthony Trollope and Charles Reade, forms the triumvirate of young English novelists, successors to Bulwer, Thackeray, and Dickens. Of these three Trollope is unsurpassed for photographic fidelity to the ordinary details of ordinary modern life; Reade is remarkable for a willful and sparkling power, and undeniable genius; while Wilkie Collins is superior to any English novelist for the interest and ingenuity of his plots. You know as you begin that he intends to inveigle your interest, and you are inveigled. You know that he is weaving a spell from the moment you begin to read, and you are consciously and delightfully entangled. So intense and remarkable is this interest, as, for instance, in "The Woman in White," that the characters themselves become subordinated to it, and are almost vague and shadowy, like passengers seen passing in an express railway train. It is the train and the rush, not the people, which the spectator sees.

The new story, "Armada," opens with unusual skill even for Wilkie Collins. When you have read the number you will be very sure to read every other number to the end. "How does it come out?" is the inevitable question as you lay it down. The contrast between the picturesque village groups in the little German village of Wildbad, gathered toward sunset of the first day of the season at the Baths to await the diligence, and the coming of the sick man with his terrible burden, which he throws off, and his life with it, in the village inn, is most artistically managed; and in the present number the wonder deepens as the mysterious figures glide across the stage.

Dickens's "Our Mutual Friend" has a most original character in Eugene Wrayburn, while there is a grotesque extravagance in such personages as Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lammle and Georgiana Podsnap. Yet the kind of life they represent is clearly indicated, and Podsnap himself is one of the creations of Dickens which enrich current conversation and literature with a new and expressive word.

Meanwhile, turning from the stories, the thousands of readers who recall the remarkable interest with which they pored over the pages of this Magazine which contained Abbott's "Life of Napoleon," will be glad to renew their monthly meetings with that author, as they will do in his "Heroic Deeds of Heroic Men," which is a series of sketches of the most striking and memorable events of the great war. The series began in the December number with the North Carolina expedition of the brave Burnside, one of the purest patriots and noblest men that the war has revealed.

Nor must a faithful Easy Chair forget to mention the "Tour through Arizona" of Ross Browne, whose fame is established as one of the most entertaining of living travelers who tell their travels. Mr. Browne's style is flavored by that of the frontier region in which he is so fond of wandering; and his quick, humorous eye, his undaunted patience, his familiarity with wild life and wild men, all combine to make his tales of adventure not only entertaining but valuable.

Is not a fond Easy Chair justified, then, in complacently congratulating itself upon its co-laborers, and the intelligent reader upon the literary rations provided for the Spring campaign? And those of which he has spoken are but a part of the noble army to whose dress parade the vast Public is invited. Let the drums beat, therefore, and the trumpets call, as the one hundred and seventy-sixth column moves forward! Let the banners wave and the cymbals clash! We propose to move every month and very early upon the enemy's lines of dullness and dryness, and to demand an unconditional surrender of stupidity. With our bubbles sparkling and our flowers blooming, forward, gentlemen!

THE Eighth of November was one of the great historic days. It was not the occasion of a partisan triumph, for no party did triumph. It was the day upon which a nation deliberately resolved that it would live and not die; that neither foreign foe nor domestic traitor should compel it to surrender its independent power.

How simple was the method of expressing its will! It was at the ballot-box, which is the symbol of our Government, whose destruction is the end of our Government, and which, while the American people are unconquered, will be defended as the palladium of their liberties. Indeed, it is so precious that we have yet something to do before it is really secure.

Experience, as well as common sense, proves to us that the passions of men are so excited at a general election that they will exclude from the polls as many of their opponents as they can; and in some instances, where the majority is largely of one mind, the minority are allowed no right whatever. For instance, in the late election the Easy Chair knows of polls which the challengers of the minority were not suffered to approach, and where as many votes were cast as the majority chose to throw. In every instance this thing should be prevented if it took the whole army of the United States to do it. At every poll where such a crime against the nation has been once committed there should a force be stationed at the next election to defend at all hazards the right of each party to have its challengers at the stand, and to arrest beyond hope of rescue every man who offers to vote fraudulently.

There was a great deal of foolish twaddle during the late election about military interference. But not only was there no military interference, but every sane man knew that none was intended. And no man worthy to be an American citizen could object for a moment to the most ample preparation in a time of high excitement to preserve the public peace and to protect the sanctity of the ballot-box. If there were no occasion for such preparation so much the better, and so much the more honorable for us all. If there were occasion, what should be said of the Government that had not been ready for it? And we ask any man who knows the population of the city of New York, whether it was foolish, under the peculiar circumstances of this election, to be prepared for disturbances which the mere hand of the police, strong and true and tried as it is, might not have been able at once to overpower?

As it was, perfect peace was secured because it was known that disorder would be at once controlled, and at any price, as it ought always to be in a free country. But we have yet another step to take. We shall be false to ourselves until voting at the most doubtful and dangerous city polls is made as absolutely safe as it is in the quietest rural district. If we are not willing to make it so, we are not willing to trust our own system. But whoever opposes securing this safety and impartiality at the polls is as much an enemy of this Government as Jefferson Davis. This Government is merely the will of the people constitutionally expressed; and if the people are so pusillanimous that they will not have their own laws enforced, their Government will not only be overthrown, but will deserve to be.

THE festival at the Century Club in this city, in honor of the seventieth birthday of Bryant, was one of the most interesting incidents of the year. It was a noble and illustrious company that met to honor him—not those only whose names are famous, but those also of no other than the friendly fame of the club. It was the homage of friendship as well as of admiration, and, care compagni! if some companion of yours, mayhap a luckless candidate, was speaking in a windy tent upon a plain, his heart was not unfaithful, and among the new and earnest friends did not forget the old.

The Easy Chair has gossiped of the Century before in these pages; and properly, for the Century is one of the places which are pleasantest in this great city, and one to which the genial and cultivated and refined of foreign parts and of other cities are pretty sure to find their way. The name, if it puzzles you, means, not the century in the sense of the impersonated spirit of the age, and final flower and fruit of time, as doubtless many modest members imagine—and as, indeed, it might properly be. No, it means only a century, or a hundred, of men. If you prefix the definite article and say the century of men—not a Centurion will quarrel with you.

But however fit and true the name might once have been—ten years since, let us say, in Clinton Place, Verplanck consule; or two or three years earlier in Broadway opposite what was Niblo's Garden—yet now there have been incursions and strange admissions. There are some melancholy rumors that even merely rich men have stolen in; men, that is to say, who have money merely, and no æsthetic geniality to redeem it. The original number is long since transcended; but let it increase never so largely it can not overpower that choice few who, as it were, were Centurions born, and who, amidst all the splendors of Sixteenth Street, smoke the placid pipe and drain the mild glass as in the homely days and nights over the milliner's shop in Broadway. How often now—not because the house is more splendid, but because they are no longer so young—how often, with that wild, passionate yearning, which draws the heart to what is past forever, are those ancient boys primed with the pathos of Béranger's wail—

"Dreams of my joyful youth! I'd freely give,
Ere my life's close,
All the dull days I'm destined yet to live
For one of those!
Where shall I now find raptures that were felt,
Joys that befell,
And hopes that dawned at twenty, when I dwelt
In attic cell?"

Béranger's own is not better than Prout's translation.

It is curious in turning the queer and sad volume of "Father Prout's Reliques" to come upon the picture at the beginning—the picture of "Our Contributors," from Fraser's Magazine of thirty years ago. For it is the picture of a club—of a literary club—of a kind of Century Club. The famous English writers of that time are represented as seated at a table, with fruit and wine. The portraits are rude resemblances, but they are recognizable. The ox-eyed Coleridge is there; the terrible Carlyle; Southey, looking like a smug Bank of England director; Lockhart, with his classic flippancy of profile; Barry Cornwall, a perplexed Methodist minister; the young Thackeray, with the inquisitive and unavoidable glass in his eye, from which it never dropped; the "fashionable author," Theodore Hook; Father Prout himself, calling himself Frank Mahony, looking in the picture like a callow Parke Godwin; Allan Cunningham, chatting with the Pall Mall Apollo D'Orsay; Gleig, the chaplain; Irving, of many tongues; Ainsworth, a beatified barber's block of a head; Fraser himself, in a fearful swallow-tail coat of the period; Hogg, Jerdan, Crofton Croker, and a few more; and rising in the centre of the group over a trinity of decanters, and leaning upon his finger tips, Maginn—the head of a table at which Carlyle and Coleridge sit!—with the Celtic leer in his eye; Maginn, the man in whom his contemporaries felt a power of which his writings have such small trace that his name is already almost obliterated, except from the memories of those who personally knew him.

How often at the Century, on some memorable Saturday evening, the musing eye and heart have marked the men who sat at ease at the table or before the fire; and remembering their names, now see forever a picture in its kind like that we have just beheld in Fraser! The Easy Chair will not call the roll. They are names familiar to the Century, and known to the country and to the world. But among them all, as no head is more striking, so no name is more honored than that of Bryant. It was a noble and touching scene, the evening of the festival. Seen in fancy from the windy tent upon the plain it was so, how much more seen by the living eye! It is another illuminated passage in the history of the Century, which already shines like a royal missal. It was homage to a man as well as a poet:

"His love of truth, too warm, too strong
For hope or fear to chain or chill,
His hate of tyranny and wrong
Burn in the breasts he kindled still."

A PLEASANT friend politely asks whether the "humbly lecturing business is not about run out?" Why this polite question should be put to an Easy Chair, which reposing quietly here in Franklin Square upon four good solid legs profoundly pities the "itinerants" as they go rushing about the land, is incomprehensible. "Itinerants" is the withering sarcasm hurled at the unfortunates by newspaper editors who, as the clergymen say, have no "call." "Itinerants"—the word has a sound of tin-peddler in it which is overpowering. These wretched "itinerants," who are paid a hundred dollars a night with their expenses, how pitiful their case must seem to the luxurious editor of the —, who gets home to bed at three o'clock in the morning!

However, the question is not itineracy, but lecturing. Why not then address your remarks to Demosthenes and Cicero, who are familiar with the whole matter, and suffer the Chair to remain Easy? Of course we have all been wondering when the public would tire of hearing certain people talk—prose, the wise it call—through an evening hour or two. Thackeray used to wonder in the same way. One evening he lectured in Philadelphia in a terrific storm. He expected to find nobody in the hall. "But," said he, "I went, and lo! eight hundred mild maniacs awaited my coming!" The further he went the greater his amazement grew. "It is incredible," he exclaimed; "but, my boy! let us make hay while the sun shines, for presently they'll find us all out."

There are some who have not been found out yet. No, and it is doubtful whether the first lecturers of all, those who began twenty and thirty years ago, are not the most sought and liked. They are the planets, the fixed stars in the Lyceum sky. Comets, meteors, shooting-stars, flash and dash and dazzle and expire around them, but their steady, lambent light beams cheerfully on. It is an interesting and curious study even for an Easy Chair to remark how faithful the Lyceum is to the men who not only amuse but instruct, and not instruct only but inspire.

If there were but a few more evenings in the week the Easy Chair would certainly have something to say of a special form of the Lyceum developed in the city of New York. It mentioned it last year in the case of Mr. De Cordova, and this year there is Mr. Artemus Ward, "which his number is 806 Broadway." Mr. Ward has had great success in the rural Lyceum, and has, as we are told, not found the city deaf to his charming. It is that we might know if the rumor be true, that the Easy Chair sighs for a few more evenings in the week to investigate the point in person.

But what is an Easy Chair of mature years to do amidst the manifold metropolitan delights and attractions? There is the Opera with the wonderful Zucchi, whom all the critics praise, and the equally wonderful Maretzek, whom no frowns of fortune can dismay, and no favors intoxicate. More than Bunn to Drury Lane, than Lumley to Her Majesty's, is Maretzek to the Academy. Why, he began in Chambers Street at Palmo's! There are solemn fathers of to-day who used to wear with pride the "Maretzek tie" in their golden youth. He belongs to our history. He is a part of the city.

Then there are the theatres. Yet it was but yesterday, was it? that the Park, the Bowery, and the Richmond Hill sufficed. Then the Chatham, the Franklin, the National, and the little Olympic. And now how many upon Broadway alone, and a nightly performance such as the older stages seldom saw! Behold, here are Mr. De Boots and Mr. Toodles at one house, and the manager stands at the door and says, urbanely, "Do you hear the inextinguishable laughter? More joyous is that laughter, Sir, and affording more genuine delight to innumerable thousands than any performance of modern times. Lo! the 'great special bill.' Here is the little office, Sir; pay, enter, and be happy." Or upon the other side of the street, Mr. Josh Butterby and Mr. Solon Shingle are to be seen, while this other manager stands serenely at this other door, and proudly says, "Remark, Sir, I pray, the twelfth and last week of the combined personations which are the most masterly comic characterizations of modern times, and which, notwithstanding their altogether unprecedented run continue to crowd the house nightly." Here are not only the mens conscia recti, but the men's and women's conscia recti, and what is a bewildered Easy Chair to do? How can he hope to push on to Mr. Ward's, which his number is 806?

Here, again, to balk his most earnest endeavors to reach the Mormon city, under charge of Mr.

Ward, the Easy Chair is confronted by the Great Moral Exhibition: The Vast Congregation of Living Beasts and Birds. The Most Magnificent Exposition of the Wonders of Creation. Clearly Artemus Ward and the Mormons must wait.

No, the lecturing business is not about run out. It will not run out so long as men are men. What is lecturing? It is teaching, or it is oratory. It has its dull examples, of course, as every human pursuit has, and must have. But it has its great powers and its profound influences. That old "itinerant" upon the Grecian shore who defied Philip, and the other in the Roman Senate who accused Catiline—they are not outgrown yet. Their "business" was moving, controlling, inspiring the human mind. Is that "about run out?"

THERE WAS no pleasanter incident in the Thanksgiving month than the breakfast to Professor Goldwin Smith, of Oxford University. There has been no more faithful and intelligent friend of this country in England than he, and his vigorous and eloquent vindication of the national cause has probably been not less serviceable to us than the stirring appeals of John Bright or the sagacious observation of Professor Cairnes.

Goldwin Smith is a young man, and Regius Professor of History. He is a liberal in the best sense of the word, and if there are many such Professors in the English universities, the young England of this next generation will be as much superior to the young England of Lord John Manners and Mr. Disraeli as Sir Philip Sidney was to Laird, the pirate contractor. Mr. Smith was already well known to scholars and well-read men from his lectures upon historical study and his little work upon Ireland, which is a brief, clear, and comprehensive summary of Irish history from the beginning, written not as a partisan or an Englishman, but as a man. There is no treatise upon so vast and confused a subject which is more luminous, symmetrical, and satisfactory than this. So with his series of letters, published in 1862 and '63, in the London Daily News, upon the relations of the British colonies to the Government—a series afterward issued in a volume as "The Empire." They show an intellectual heroism which vindicates the traditional English character. Their object is to show that the strength of England would be increased by cutting off some of her wide outlying and useless dependencies. Professor Smith shows that, in certain instances, in the British empire extent of territory is not extent of power. But lest any one should misuse his argument, he says: "Passion and prejudice may say, and possibly believe, that the Federal States of America are fighting for empire; but cooler observers will not fail to see that a struggle for the maintenance of national unity is a totally different thing from a struggle for empire."

There are other works of Professor Smith, and all of them bring the resources of the finest scholarship to the illustration of present duties. That is the noblest service of the scholar. When the scholars of England are content to edit a Greek play while every one Englishman in seven is a pauper, wise men will doubt and sigh. But when those scholars look with unswerving eyes to find the true path of national greatness, and to persuade Englishmen to walk in it, then they become what they ought always to be, the leading conservative element in the nation.

Professor Smith came to this country at the end of August, and after passing a few weeks in New England, he made a journey to the Mississippi under circumstances of peculiar advantage for seeing whatever was worth seeing. He returned to the East in time to witness the election, in which he was profoundly interested, and soon afterward he was invited to a breakfast by some gentlemen of the Union League Club. The club-house, upon Union Square, is very spacious and brilliantly decorated, and the company was composed of some hundred persons, representing every great interest in the city. Among the guests was Auguste Laugel, a French gentleman who, in the Revue de deux Mondes and elsewhere has forcibly stated and maintained, with great skill, against French skepticism the national cause of America. Professor Smith, to whom each person of the company was introduced as he entered the library, is tall, dark, and of a scholarly figure, with a reserve of manner that never degenerates into the stuttering gaucherie of John Bull.

The breakfast-table was laid through three rooms, and was covered with baskets and mounds of flowers, so profusely spread, that with the confectionery, the effect of the table, without much silver, was extremely beautiful. It was very evident, as the eye wandered along the line of noted guests, that the number of possible speeches was prodigious. And yet how uncomfortable they must all have really been, if, as seems beyond question, every man who is to make a table-speech is wretched until it is delivered. But upon this occasion they did not, when delivered, make the company wretched, as has been sometimes the case. Each speech was pointed, brief, and happy. In all of them there was but one unpleasant remark, and that was the statement of a clergyman that he had not voted, and apparently upon the ground that no side was ever altogether right. If he had said that no man is infallible we should all have agreed. But would the worthy Doctor have urged that therefore "the judicious Hooker" was about as wrong as he was right? Because men are fallible would he have all human action paralyzed and decision condemned? Men are no more fallible in politics than in theology; and it is as wise to say that you observe no religious rite for that reason, as that you refuse to vote.

It was a memorable and beautiful breakfast. By the lips of Professor Smith that better England, which we Americans love with all our hearts when we see it in John Milton and John Hampden, spoke friendly to America. The lower passions in both nations will often cry for war. If in either the lower passions control the Government, war will inevitably follow. But if the Government of each country represents, as it should, the reason and intelligence of the nation, then war will be avoided, as difficulties always are between men earnestly bent upon a single generous purpose. It is very easy to inflame American prejudice against England. Is it wise, is it noble, is it politic to do it? The English Government and press have been hostile to us in this war: have the American Government and press ever been peculiarly friendly to England? We can not strike an exact balance of friendship, nor is it profitable to recriminate. But no thoughtful and patriotic citizen of the United States can seriously believe that any body or any cause would be permanently benefited by a war between this country and England, except in the event of an assault upon our honor or our power.

If there were a more frequent, friendly, and personal intercourse between Americans and Englishmen, like Goldwin Smith, the golden links of the chain that unites us in a common civilization would be kept constantly brighter. And if all scholars and educated men, like Professor Smith, devoted themselves in both countries to the enlightenment of the public mind—not believing with the clerical orator at the breakfast that as men are fallible instruction is vain—then the practical value of schools and sound learning would be apparent to the dullest well-meaning noodle. For as Sir Philip Sidney grandly said for all scholars, and the career of Goldwin Smith refreshes the words with living meaning: "To what purpose should our minds be directed to various kinds of knowledge unless opportunity be afforded for putting it into practice, so that public advantage may be the result?"

JOHN LEECH is dead. Every body knew him, although perhaps unconsciously. He has been Punch for nearly twenty years, excepting the ill-natured pictures of the American troubles. His chief excellence was the exquisite satire of his social sketches, in which his genius revealed itself, entirely sweet, racy, and English. His weekly sketches show an exhaustless opulence of fancy. They were always different yet always the same. The typical British "old girl," and the pretty young one, were created by him and are immortal.

The wonderful felicity of his touch was unsurpassed. All the tender delicate shades of expression fell from it so gently that his drawings seemed often the slightest sketches. But how full they are of precise suggestion! The breezy briny days by the sea, the warm summer fields, the sparkling brook, the drawing-room, the dining-room, the nursery, the kitchen, the area, the street, they are all quivering with characteristic life before us by one wave of the delicate rod of this delightful magician.

Yet all of them, so keen, so genial, so broad, so humorous and airy, are hereafter to have the same sting in them that Hood's liveliest sallies have. They are spangles covering sorrow. They are glittering rainbow bubbles in which his life-breath was spent. Our Saturday's momentary laugh was his week-day toil, and the toil tired his brain and broke his heart. It is terrible to think how the blithe young Englishmen who joke and laugh and sing in the magazines and papers are dying all the time. There were Hood, and Laman Blanchard, and Angus Reach, and plenty more of them. Like the soldier boy at Ratisbon standing erect and bright before Napoleon, and telling him how the battle sped, so they stood gayly and rattled off song and jest for our amusement, and when the imperial world said, "But you are wounded," like the boy they smiled and answered, "Nothing, Sire," and fell dead.

Leech was a school-fellow of Thackeray's at the Charter House; and it is easy to see the sympathy of the pen of the one with the pencil of the other. Many of Leech's sketches are like sentences of Thackeray's drawn instead of written. The newspapers say that the artist has drooped visibly since the author died; and surely the circle of wits and good fellows can not but feel deeply the loss in one year of two such masters. "Good and great," one of the obituary notices calls Leech. Yes, and why not? Goodness is in every line he drew. Those whom he touched, could not but laugh while they winced. There is no malice, no meanness any where among his sketches. And his genius was as undoubted as it was fine. What a power it is which, from such apparently slight works, makes thousands of people thousands of miles away, who never saw the artist and knew nothing of him, grieve over his death as at a personal loss. Wellington died, and all eyes were dry and no heart felt any peculiar pang. Yet Wellington had served his country well. And now an artist, an illustrator of manners, whose name will be scarcely mentioned in history, dies tranquilly in his house, and there is a gush of sympathy and emotion wherever his works were known. Has not he also served his country well, and the world?

"Small service is true service while it lasts,
Of all thy friends though humble, scorn not one,
The daisy by the shadow that it casts Protects the lingering dew-drop from the sun."

Editor's Drawer.

SOMEbody writing the critical notices in one of the New York daily newspapers says, if any body can see the point of the humors in the Drawer he must be brighter than his neighbors.

Now this critic is to be pitied. Think of a man who has to live in this world and is unable to see the point of the jokes in the Drawer! Why, Sydney Smith felt profound compassion for the man who heard a joke at nine in the morning and burst out laughing as he saw the point at three in the afternoon. But how much more is he to be pitied who has a month in which to study out the points in the Drawer's jokes, and can't find them after all!

Gough—we mean John B., the lecturer—told a story in Boston (it has been in the Drawer), of the young author proposing to one who had years and fame that they should together make a book. "What!" said the surly old fellow, "you and I! would you hitch a horse and an ass together!" Instantly the young wit replies, "How dare you call me a horse!" Whereupon Gough's audience laughed appreciatingly. A rich old Bostonian took Gough home with him to spend the night, and when they were discussing a good supper the host said to his guest, "Mr. Gough, what made the people laugh so when you told that horse and ass story to-night?"

Mr. Gough was rather taken aback by his host's stupidity, but managed to make answer:

"I suppose they were pleased with the young author's ready wit in making the older one call himself an ass."

"Why, no," said the host, "he made a mistake; the old author meant to call himself the horse."

And so Gough had to eat his supper in silence, and let the Boston critic have it his own way. The old fellow couldn't see the point. We have just such clever critics in Gotham as they have in the Hub; or, to put it in another form, "all the good fellows are not in the Hub of the Universe." We have some here who can't see the point of the jokes in the Drawer! Very likely.

But we will not put too fine a point upon it, and will hasten to open the Drawer once more.

As an evidence that the "accursed rebellion" has not totally quenched the poetic fire of the South, I send you the following effusion, which was "captivated" in a mail-bag by one of Steele's scouts lately, being a part of a letter from an Arkansas young lady to her sweet-heart in the rebel army. What do "you-uns" think of it?

"'Tis hard for you-uns to live in camps;
'Tis hard for you-uns to fight the Yanks;
'Tis hard for you-uns and we-uns to part,
Now you-uns has got we-uns's heart."

A GENTLEMAN in Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, says:

When I was a Sabbath-school teacher a boy named Aleck, about seventeen years of age, was placed in my class, whose opportunities for acquiring knowledge had been very limited. He was desirous to learn, but thought good reading consisted in reading rapidly. The mistakes he made were numerous, and often ludicrous. The first day he entered the class it came to his turn to read the fourth verse of the third chapter of Matthew, which he read thus: "And the same John had a leathern gridle about his lungs!"

ONE day Aleck brought me the story of the old prophet and his sons, found in the thirteenth chapter of First Kings, and pointing out the twenty-seventh verse, said he did not exactly understand it. The verse reads, "And he spake to his sons, saying, Saddle me the ass. And they saddled him." After the explanation was given Aleck replied, "I thought maybe the boys, out of a joke, had put the saddle on the old man!"

At a political meeting recently held in Cambridge, Massachusetts, a gentleman from a Southern State, after enlarging on his rare privilege of addressing so intelligent an audience, proceeded to say, with a burst of eloquence, that a good Providence was now holding up to us a beacon-light to guide us to victory and peace, as of old the children of Israel were guided by a pillar of fire by night and a pillar of salt by day!

THE following epitaph was copied from a tombstone in a grave-yard in Rhode Island:

"I dreamt that, buried in my fellow-clay,
Close by a common beggar's side I lay.
Such a mean companion hurt my pride,
And, like a corse of consequence, I cried,
'Scoundrel, begone, and henceforth touch me not!
More manners learn, and at a distance rot!'—
'Scoundrel!' in still haughtier tones cried he,
'Proud lump of earth, I scorn thy words and thee!
All here are equal; thy place now is mine:
This is my rotting-place, and that is thine."

A LONDONER sends us the following:

Your paragraph in the Drawer upon the Æolian, puts me in mind of the following: We had a reporter in London who always "did" the executions and the sensation "pars" beforehand. He sent in his copy to a daily with his name written in the corner, as usual, "D. Bishop," and headed, "The Condemned Convict." Whether the compositor mistook it or not we know not, but the paper appeared the next morning with the paragraph headed, in double-leaded bourgeois, "The Condemned Convict, D. Bishop!" The laugh was against our Dan.

I ATTENDED a short time since an old-fashioned Cattle Show and Fair. After looking at the big pumpkins, squashes, etc., that go to make a fair brilliant, I went with my friend out to the field to see what the crowd there assembled were gazing at, and found a neat pair of cattle tugging away at a cart-load of stone as a trial of their strength. We had been there but a few moments when the marshal of the day rode up, and seeing so large a number crowded around the cattle, he roared, with all the dignity and pompousness of a country marshal: "Gentlemen, form a ring around, so that all can see!" The crowd did not heed his words much, and he again broke out: "Gentlemen, form a circle; there are enough here to make a circle fifty rods square!"

IN the far-famed cemetery of Mount Auburn, near the centre of the inclosure, is a tablet, on the upper part of which, above the names, is a circle formed of a chain, which is complete and unbroken, making a perfect ring. Above this circle are the words, "Parted below;" while beneath is the legend, "United above."

WHILE running to see where the fire was a short time since, I came up to Joe R——, going the same way. All out of breath he gasped out, "Oh dear, I hope it's not the rope-walk; I've seen that twice already!"

DURING the land speculation of '56 old Doctor Egan, of Chicago, became so much interested that he was somewhat absent-minded toward his patients. One morning he wrote a prescription omitting the directions for taking. Said the patient, "Doctor, you haven't told me how this is to be administered." As the Doctor hurried out to meet an engagement with a land operator, he said, "Take a quarter down; balance in one, two, and three years!"

NOR feeling just right yesterday morning, I tried a little brandy and sugar, and my little six-year-old daughter seeing me thought she would like some, but I concluded she had better not; and to draw her attention from it I took a picture from my pocket which had the word "Wisdom" printed on it, and asked her to spell it for me. She slowly spelled it, "w-i-s-d-o-m." "Well, what does it spell?" "I don't know—what does it?" "What do you think it spells?" Looking up to me very knowingly, she whispered—"Brandy!"

A BOSTON importing house furnishes the Drawer with the following true bill:

One of our correspondents in England, in appraising us of the shipment of some bales of merchandise, had his letter written in a fine business-like hand by his clerk. In revising it himself he comes across the sentence:

"They [the bales] were shipped yesterday, and we hope they will arrive in good condition."

Our friend, knowing that was not the name of the vessel, draws a line through "condition," and writes over it the vessel's name, in his own crabbed hand, Minnesota.

Thus happy and conscious of having corrected a mistake—in point of fact a gross error—he mails his epistle, leaving his letter to read, "They [the bales] were shipped yesterday, and we hope they will arrive in good Minnesota!"

HERE'S from old General G—— again, of New Hampshire, whose negro story was given in the September number:

In our last pleasant conversation with the General he gave us two anecdotes of New Hampshire's greatest man that might as well be on record, as they have the double advantage of being true, and not probably seen in print for many years, if ever before. While Daniel Webster resided in Washington a member of his family heard him say what I now record, and told it in person to my friend the General.

Hayne, of South Carolina, urged on by his Southern friends, had made his speech which called forth that immortal reply of the great "Northern Lion," and many of Webster's friends, struck with Hayne's real ability, began to say half-way to each other, "Can Webster answer that?"

Mrs. Webster was present at the Capitol, and was greatly agitated at the fire and force of the hero of South Carolina. She rode home with a friend in advance of her husband. At last the "Lion" came tramping up to the door, and marched in in an easy, unconcerned way. His wife hastened into the hall just as she was, taking a pinch of snuff, and, with tears in her eyes, says to him, "Can you, can you answer Mr. Hayne?"

With a sort of grunt, or quiet roar, her lord turned upon her: "Answer him! I'll gr-i-n-d him finer than that snuff in your box!"—[A very doubtful story, the Drawer thinks.]

ANOTHER friend of General G——'s resided in Washington at the same time, who was intimate with a number of Southerners. After Hayne's speech they came to this person to taunt him with what they supposed to be Mr. Webster's discomfiture. He acknowledged afterward that he trembled a little for the Northern statesman. But in due time the Websterian thunder rolled through the arches of the Capitol, and Hayne was ground fine.

"What do you think now," says the General's friend to his Southern acquaintances, "of our 'Northern Lion?'"

The reply came quick, but rather angrily: "He's a long-clawed, strong-jawed, tough-hided devil!"

I HAVE a friend of the Irish persuasion, writes an officer, residing at present in the State of Maine. Last summer, while making a visit to Massachusetts, she spoke of her success in business, etc., and concluded her talk with, "Ye see, uncle dear, I had a little money to investigate, so I concluded to put two domino winders to me house, and it was a great improvement to vegetate the garret."

OUR District Attorney, says a West Virginia correspondent, being at the Swann House in Parkersburg, received a telegraphic dispatch. The message requiring an answer, he stepped over to the office to reply. Having written his answer and folded it he said,

"Please give me an envelope."

"What for?" exclaimed the astonished operator.

"Why, mine came in an envelope!"

A NUMBER of years ago, when those who are now steady and thorough-going business-men were boys living in the town of Livonia, Livingston County, New York, they formed a debating club, which met in what is called the East School-house. Debating evenings the neighbors would call in to see what the boys were about. It was customary with the society to choose one of the spectators chairman for the evening, to hear the arguments and decide the question.

One evening a fellow by the name of Solomon T—— made his appearance. He being a very knowing fellow, the boys thought, for the fun of the thing, they would make him chairman. Upon being announced chairman Sol took his seat with a great deal of dignity and importance. The question read as follows: "Resolved, that the negroes have more cause of complaint than the Indians." It was stipulated that the question should be confined to the United States. The chief disputant on the affirmative opened the debate and made a speech to sustain his position, every word of which was listened to with close attention from the chairman. The disputant on the negative made a few remarks in answer, and then turned to the Bible and commenced reading passages for the purpose of proving slavery right, and by that means intending to show that the negroes had not been wronged.

Sol heard him for a short time, and then jumped up and said in a loud voice to the speaker: "Stop right where you are. Don't go any further. You have gone out of the United States for argument."

LAST year our regiment (the Sixty-seventh Ohio) was stationed on Morris Island, South Carolina. One hot day in August the agent of the Sanitary Commission informed me that he had received a cargo of ice from the good people of Boston, to be distributed among the troops, and that we could have a hundred pounds of it by sending to Light-house Inlet. I accordingly applied to the wagon-master for transportation, who assigned to me a South Carolina negro of about twenty summers, with his mule and cart. Pompey had probably never seen ice thicker than window-glass, perhaps not that. The tide was out, which left the vessel high and dry on the bank. Pompey drove his mule and cart alongside of the vessel, and a cake of ice was lowered over the side to him, which he took in his hands, but dropped it almost as quick as if it had been hot iron. Looking up, he exclaimed, "Oh, lordy massa! it must be a berry cold country where dis stuff grows!"

"My friend," said a seedy individual to a wag-gish acquaintance at a ferry, "I wish you would loan me two quarters to cross the ferry, I haven't got a dollar in the world."

"Well, I would like to know," was the reply, "what difference it makes to a man who hasn't got a dollar in the world which side of the river he's on?"

HERE is a good thing in relation to the poet who wrote "Hohenlinden," which possibly has not yet found its way to your columns. There was a convivial gathering at the poet's house, where the rosy wine and the sparkling jest ran far into the winter's night. The party broke up by degrees, each guest leaving as the spirit moved him. Just as one had left the room a rumbling noise was heard on the stairway, and the body of a bright devotee to wit and Bacchus went tumbling down stairs.

"What is the matter?" said Campbell, from the doorway.

"It's I, Sir, rolling rapidly," was the ready response.

AMONG the members of the Convention which met some years ago to form the new Constitution of Kentucky was Captain John Budd, of this city (Louisville). The Convention was discussing the subject of voting at elections. The Captain, who thought the ballot dangerous to the welfare of the State and the institution of slavery, made his speech in opposition to the change, saying, the gentlemen might talk as they pleased in favor of this new-fangled way of dropping in their sentiments as if ashamed to let them be known, but as for himself, he "was born in old Virginia, where people walk plainly on the centre of the turnpike while the sun is shining, and I am in favor of every man going boldly up to the polls and voting his honest opinions vice versa."

A RURAL correspondent residing at Sinking Springs, Ohio, writes to the Drawer:

A gentleman delivered a pair of "Sloggy" shoes to the mail-carrier, to be conveyed from this place to Latham, a small village nine miles distant. There being no other mail-matter on hand the carrier caused the postmaster to place the shoes in the bag, to facilitate their transportation. Arriving at Latham, the postmaster there was thunder-struck at the quality of the contents of Uncle Sam's mail, and perceiving a card attached to the shoes containing the address of the person for whom they were designed, he quietly placed them in the post-office receptacle to await his call. The carrier began eagerly to demand the shoes, and to explain that it was merely for his accommodation that they were placed in the mail-bag, etc. The postmaster knew his duty too well, however, to deliver the shoes prior to the payment of the postage, amounting to a trifle more than the shoes were worth. The affair led to a correspondence with the Post-office Department, and finally resulted in the shoes being sent to the Dead-Letter Office. It is to be presumed that Uncle Sam has concluded to wear the shoes himself.

FIVE of our Philadelphia readers have taken the trouble, each of them, to cut the poetry below from the Ledger and send it to us. One of them says:

You will notice by the inclosed that the Ledger's obituary "poic" has been around again, and, I think, eclipses all his former efforts, not excepting that "superior flower-pot" of little Jacobs, which you copied in your Drawer some months since. I think the last effusion well worthy a place in the Drawer. It is certainly very gratifying to the friends of the Union to know their much-loved starry banner has so exalted a place in the regions above.

"Dear mother, I am going home;
I am not, as you think me, dead;
'Tis those on earth in darkness roam;
The angels hath me to heaven led.

"Hark, mother, doth hear the angels?
Oh, how pretty they can sing!
They call me, mother, so fare you well,
I can hear the bells in heaven ring.

"List, mother, and hear my story,
'Tis not a dream, but all is true;
I am with the angels up in glory,
And only waiting here for you.

"From thy lap your James hath flown;
Our Saviour spoke, I answered his call,
Saying come to yonder heavenly home,
To live with the angels one and all.

"TO MY FATHER.

"Tell my father, who is far away
Fighting the enemy in the field,
That I'll pray for him night and day:
'Tis his angel bids him never yield.

"Tell him I am living with that God;
That I have joined the angels' heavenly band.
We have Washington sitting beside our Lord,
With the Star-Spangled Banner grasped in his hand."

THIS comes to the Drawer from the United States steamer Marmora, of the Mississippi Squadron:

At White River station, the other day, among other boats at anchor there were the large side-wheel steamer St. Patrick and a very small stern-wheel boat named the Mattie. The latter boat was coaling from a barge alongside of her. The St. Patrick having received orders to coal from the same barge, ran up alongside of her for that purpose, when, through the carelessness of her pilot, instead of landing at the barge, she came in collision with the little stern-wheeler, smashing her fenders and otherwise doing her considerable damage. The noise brought the Captain on deck, and, surveying the work of destruction, slowly raised his eyes upward to the hurricane-deck of the St. Patrick, and meeting those of her Captain, sung out to him, "Come aboard, Captain! Come aboard, if you want to!"

WHILE on deck this morning conversing with a third engineer of our boat about music, etc., I asked him if he had ever heard "Faust;" supposing, of course, that every one, if they had not heard that delightful opera, had certainly heard of it. He answered he couldn't tell; said he was in Cincinnati a few months ago, but believed he didn't play the night that he visited "Pike's!"

FROM Minnesota this clever one comes:

At the Democratic State Convention held in this city, in September last, Major M—, of S— County (one of the best men in the State), was appointed temporary chairman.

The Major, in returning thanks, made a very pretty little speech, in closing which he said: "He was now sixty-four years old, and had been a Democrat from his birth. He had always felt proud of the many honors conferred upon him by the glorious old Democracy through a long life, and the present was not an exception; for he truly felt, as the Bible says—It is better to be a door-keeper in heaven than to be a king in hell!"

When the laughter caused by this quotation had somewhat subsided, a brother delegate from the Major's own county asked of a city delegate who sat near him, "What did the Major say that caused so much laughter?—I did not see the joke." The quotation was repeated to him. He didn't seem "to see it" much better, but replied, "Oh! that is it, is it? I thought perhaps the Major had made some mistake in quoting Scripture!"

At the funeral of the lamented Harrison, in New York, a soft, wet snow-storm set it, which very soon lightened up the dismal aspect of the procession. At a halt in the military and civic cavalcade, which moved mournfully on in all the sombre drapery of a nation's woe, one of the citizen mourners took off his new hat, and wiping off the snow, with the greatest gravity and some emotion remarked, "This is too bad! My new hat will be entirely spoiled: and all for turning out at Harrison's funeral! I almost wish he hadn't died!"

A WESTERN editor sends to the Drawer the following:

The Rev. Dr. C—, a profound scholar and deservedly popular minister in the United Presbyterian Church, is remarkably absent-minded. On one occasion he was moderating a meeting of the Assembly, had called the meeting to order after a recess, and sat down while the Clerk was calling the roll. It was somewhat tedious, and the Doctor had a capital opportunity to ramble off in one of his interminable reveries. He was aroused by the lull in the proceedings that followed the completion of this part of the Clerk's duty, and jerking off his spectacles he walked forward to the front of the stage, and, with a decorous gravity becoming his position, said, "The Assembly has heard the motion. All in favor will show their assent by saying 'Aye!'" Instead of saying "Aye," the Assembly burst into a regular storm of laughter, and it took the good Doctor several moments to comprehend the real status of affairs, when he retreated to his chair in confusion, perhaps with a determination to keep his thoughts at home during the rest of the session.

THE Doctor was always in the habit of depending upon his wife to keep his personal effects together. She was expected to find his hat and cane when he went out, and to know where to lay her hand on any books or papers that he might want. At a meeting of Synod, one time, the Doctor mislaid a memorial which he was to have presented, and when the time came for its presentation it could not be found. The clerk searched for it, the ministerial brethren looked in every possible and impossible place, and the Doctor himself rummaged over the table and through his pockets in frantic desperation. Finally he upset the gravity of the Synod completely by turning about and exclaiming, in quick, sharp tones, "Susan, Susan! what has become of that paper?" Susan was not there to reply, but there was no lack of friends to laugh.

FROM one of our numerous Western contributors we have the following:

An incident related in a recent Drawer reminds me of another of the same sort. There lives in Wisconsin a certain Judge J——, who is noted for his learning, ability, and for being remarkably absent-minded when intoxicated to a certain degree. Judge J—— and Senator B—— had been on a visit to Madison on some political errand, and had both become somewhat "blue" when they started for home—a distance of about thirty miles. The two friends lived in the same town, had gone to Madison together in the same buggy, and were to return together, and did start home in the company of each other about one o'clock P.M. At the "Half-way House" they stopped to take a drink, of course, and Senator B—— alighted to procure the "red-eye," while the Judge remained in the buggy. In due time the Senator returned with decanter and tumbler, and the two drank, and B—— returned to deliver the "implements" to mine host. B—— deposited the tumbler and decanter, paid for the "exhilarator," then called for a cigar, and proceeded to light the same. Meantime the Judge, having taken his drink, sat quietly for the space of a minute, and, forgetting that he was waiting for B——, started up the team at a 2.40 rate, and was off.

After driving about five miles he met a friend going to Madison, whom he hailed as follows:

"I say, D——, just stop at the Half-way House and ask the landlord if I left any thing there. It seems to me I came away and forgot something, and I have been trying to think for an hour what it is, but I can't; so just stop, won't you, and inquire, and if I left any thing just bring it out when you come back."

D—— agreed, and the Judge drove home.

Two or three days after B—— arrived, and immediately called on the Judge, when occurred what followeth:

SENATOR B——. "You're a pretty man to leave a fellow that way, fifteen miles from home, ain't you?"

JUDGE J. "Why B——, what's the matter?"

B——. "What's the matter! Sure enough I have a good will to thrash you!"

J——. "Why B——, what's the—I—I—don't understand?"

B——. "Don't understand, eh? As though leaving me at the Half-way House wasn't enough, but you must send back by D—— 'to inquire if you hadn't left something!' and now make strange, as though you didn't know it!"

J——. "Ha! ha! ha! That's it! I knew there was something wrong! I told D—— I had left something, but couldn't think what. Tried to remember all the way home. Asked my wife what was missing when I got home. Have thought of it ever since, and could make nothing of it; and sure enough it was you! Ha! ha! ha! Sorry, 'pon my soul! Let's drink."

And they did drink.

AND still another:

In this State we have a very eminent lawyer, who is a noted wag, a great genius, and withal does become "funny" occasionally.

The Supreme Court was in session at St. Paul, and their "Honors" had taken their seats and the court was opened and business was in progress.

Our legal friend was standing outside of and leaning against the bar, conversing with another member, and did not observe that the court had been called to order, therefore continued his conversation, when "tap, tap, tap," sounds the marshal's hammer as a warning. But being somewhat "exhilarated," and very much engaged, the distinguished member does not hear the call, but proceeds with his conversation. "Rap, rap, rap," goes the hammer, but still unheeded; and the warning is repeated again and again, but uselessly. At last the Chief Justice interrupts business with, "Mr. Marshal, the conversation carried on outside the bar is annoying, and must be suspended." This was said sufficiently loud for the hearing of our legal luminary; and he did hear it, and "took in" the whole position at a glance. With a comical squint and a roll of his head in the direction of the court, he remarked to his friend, in a tone audible to the whole house,

"I say, N——, those fellows up there think I'm drunk, and as that is in some sense a mixed question of law and fact, of course I will not find fault with a decision of the Court; but, between you and me, the fact is, that what is only occasional with me is habitual with them. About the legal conclusion I say nothing."

"Even the Court" smiled, and business proceeded as usual.

Two gentlemen "of the old school," who lived in Kennebec County, down in Maine, years ago, named Perley and Wood, amused themselves one evening in writing epitaphs on each other. Perley perpetrated the following on Wood:

"Here lies one Wood, inclosed in wood—
One Wood within another;
The outer wood is very good—
We can not praise the other!"

A BUFFALONIAN sends the following :

Judge G——, who, as a lawyer, was noted for his sharpness in cross-examining a witness, very frequently, when presiding at the circuit, takes the cross-examination of a witness out of the hands of the attorney trying the cause.

While holding the circuit at Warsaw, B——, a dentist, was put upon the stand to prove a conversation with the plaintiff. On cross-examination the counsel for the plaintiff asked him if he had not had trouble with the plaintiff. B—— said he had not.

"Well," asked the counsel, "did you not make a set of teeth for his wife?"

"Yes."

COUNSEL. "Did not the plaintiff find fault with them?"

WITNESS. "Yes."

COUNSEL. "Does she wear them?"

WITNESS. "Yes."

COUNSEL. "She had another set made by another dentist, did she not?"

WITNESS. "Yes."

COUNSEL. "Is she not wearing them?"

WITNESS. "Yes."

Here Judge G—— thought it was time for him to interfere.

"Well, witness," said he, "do you mean to say she is now wearing both sets of teeth?"

"Yes," said the witness, very composedly.

"Well," said the Judge, "just explain to us how that can be."

"Why, your Honor," said the witness, "she has one set in each jaw!"

Bar, jury, and spectators all joined in a hearty laugh at the expense of the Judge.

THE Colonel of a certain hundred days' regiment was called upon one day by an aid of the General commanding the brigade in which was his regiment, and directed to take his regiment out "on picket" that evening. The Colonel very innocently informed the aid that he (the Colonel) could not very well go, and that the Lieutenant-Colonel was somewhat unwell, and that the Major, he thought, would not like to go. It is almost unnecessary to add that said Colonel has been under arrest since that day, and is now undoubtedly brooding over the evils of military despotism.

THE RECEPTION TOILET consists of a taffeta robe with a high corsage, and coat-sleeves. The waist is slightly pointed, with cords and tassels taking the place of a belt; these also constitute the trimming of the robe forming the heading, as shown in the illustration, and arranged in festoons and loops, with falls of black lace.—The CHILD'S OVER-DRESS is composed of green velvet, with a border of swan's-down.

The CAP is of white guipure lace, with loops of Magenta-colored chenille, and strings of the same color.

The BONNET COIFFURE is composed of two barbes of lace falling from under a large tuft of ribbons placed en diadème. A bow of white ribbon at the back is partially covered by the barbes.

The CHILDREN'S DRESSES are so clearly represented by the engraving as to require no verbal description. They may be made of any suitable material, and of any favorite color.

AMONG all the thrilling stories of the war there is not one which can surpass, in wild and perilous adventure, the tale of Colonel Grierson's cavalry raid into and through the State of Mississippi. Poetry in years to come will claim the chivalrous record as her own, and will sing to the children of future centuries of the bold raiders into the South, whose hearts were like the brave hearts of the three who "kept the bridge in the brave days of old."

Colonel B. H. Grierson was a native of Illinois. At the outbreak of the rebellion he entered the army as an aid of Major-General Prentiss. Subsequently he was appointed Colonel of the Sixth Illinois Cavalry, and soon after was assigned to the command of a brigade attached to General Grant's army. The force placed at his disposal for his celebrated raid consisted of the Sixth and Seventh Illinois and the Second Iowa Cavalry, in all about seventeen hundred men.

At ten o'clock in the morning of April 17, 1863, they set out from the inland town of La Grange, about fifty miles east from Memphis, on the southern border of the State of Tennessee. The Sixth Illinois led the advance, followed by the Seventh Illinois and the Second Iowa. At nightfall, having rode a distance of thirty miles, they encamped on the plantation of Dr. Ellis, about four miles north of Ripley, which was the first town after crossing the Mississippi line.

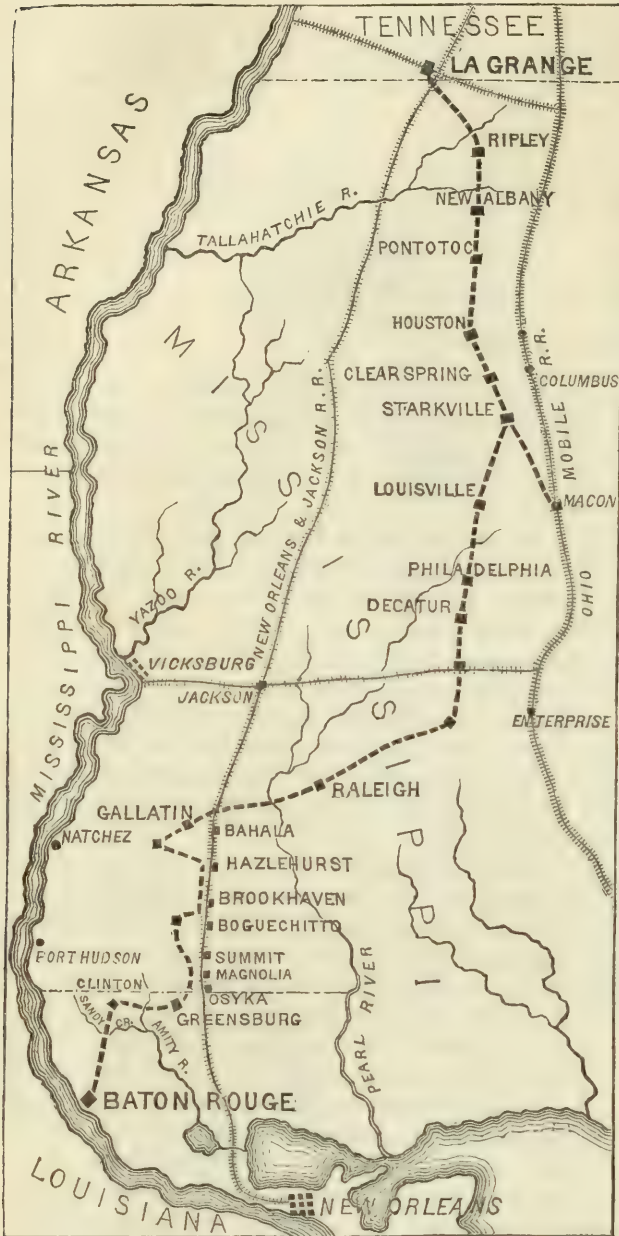

The next morning, Saturday 18th, they broke camp at eight o'clock, and, dividing their forces, the Second Iowa, under command of Colonel Hatch, swept off to the east, while the remainder took the direct road south, through Ripley to New Albany. As they approached the bridge, which crossed the Tallahatchie River, a small rebel force was seen on the opposite banks just commencing the work of destroying the bridge. Rising in their stirrups and shouting the battle-cry, Captain Thomas's battalion drove down upon the rebels with such force that they fled ignominiously, having done no more injury to the bridge than a few hours' work would repair. Our brave fellows dismounted, put the bridge in good order, and posted gayly into the town. The rest of the force crossed the river at another point, and having been rejoined by the bridge-builders again lit their camp-fires in the unfriendly cotton-fields of Mr. Sloan's plantation, four miles south of New Albany.

Colonel Hatch's command overtook them the next day, having made a successful detour and discovered the whereabouts of two small forces of rebels. This morning was one of adventurous diversions. Two companies under command of Captain Trafton dashed back toward the river and drove the rebel forces which had occupied New Albany out of the town, and came back to the camping-ground before ten o'clock in the forenoon. Two more companies plunged into the woods to the left of the plantation in search of horses, which they had been informed were concealed there. They returned bringing all they could lead. Two more companies galloped off in a direction whence a force of rebel cavalry was reported on the preceding evening. But the foe had wisely decamped, and the disappointed raiders retraced their steps, bringing a few prisoners and having destroyed a considerable quantity of camp and garrison equipage.

Before noon our adventurers had again taken up their line of march, still to the south—still into the heart of the hostile State. At night of this the third day they encamped on the plantation of Mr. Wetherall, eight miles south of the town of Pontotoc, and sixty miles from their first night's encampment. On the next day, Monday, the 20th, Major Love, of the Second Iowa, was put in command of a sorrowful detachment of some sixty men from each regiment, with orders to return to La Grange. The captured horses must be taken back, and only the hardiest soldiers and the best-trained steeds could be trusted for the next twelve days' service. But the gallant men chafed under the order, and turned back with lingering and rebellious looks until the column was out of sight. The raiders pressed vigorously on, and passing around Houston, camped that night at Clear Springs, having made a march of forty miles during the day.

At daylight the next morning they were again in the saddle. Colonel Hatch, with his brave townsmen, was again detailed to make a perilous approach to Columbus to attempt the breaking up of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad. Near Okeola he unfortunately encountered a large force of rebels, was seriously wounded himself, and his small command was scattered. Most of them probably returned to La Grange. The remainder of the party, the two Illinois regiments, pressed impetuously forward, and after a hard ride of forty-five miles encamped at a point about eight miles south of Starkville.

By this time the startling news of the presence of this body of fearless patriots, nearly in the centre of the State, sweeping down like a tornado, with no warning of their approach and no clew to their retreat, had spread like wild-fire. Rebel forces were scattered in greater or less numbers in all directions, and in much bewilderment were endeavoring to ascertain Colonel Grierson's whereabouts. The brave Colonel was surrounded with the most imminent peril, from which nothing but the most consummate skill, sagacity, and fearlessness could extricate him. But no thoughts of retracing his steps entered his mind. Baton Rouge was his goal, and to traverse the entire State of Mississippi was his invincible determination.

It was a matter of vital importance that the telegraph wires running north along the railroad from Macon should be cut. The hazardous project had been anxiously discussed, and two scouts, men who had already become familiar with danger in every shape, volunteered to undertake the perilous task. But in the midst of the first glow of admiration and sympathy with which the whole band heard the offer their courage faltered—died—and they refused the service, which, not to have offered, was no disgrace, but, once having proffered, to withdraw was cowardly. Every one looked with dismay upon a duty from which even these trained veterans recoiled. Still the work must be done.

As no one could be found to volunteer Colonel Prime was obliged to detail a company of the Seventh Illinois to make the attempt. The gallant Captain Forbes, of Company B, undertook the enterprise with hearty will. With his little band of thirty-five men he parted cheerily from the regiment to encounter a fifty miles' ride through a country swarming with rebels, and to approach the large town of Macon, which, it was not improbable, was strongly fortified. Colonel Prime gave him the order with many misgivings that its execution would be more than human skill and valor could accomplish, and that he would never rejoin his regiment.

THE ENCAMPMENT AT WETHEBELL'S.

Happily these misgivings were not realized. The brave troop in prospered safety appeared again to report to their Colonel on the banks of the Pearl River on the 27th, having completely outwitted and escaped one body of rebels three thousand strong. Macon, the first object of their expedition, they were unable to take. Pressing forward in a southwesterly direction, hoping to rejoin their regiment, they were deceived by false information, and rode in search of their companions to the town of Enterprise, on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad. As they came in full view of the place their eyes were greeted by the astounding and unwelcome sight of three thousand rebel soldiers in the process of disembarking from a train of cars.

With the quick impulse of true genius Captain Forbes rode on in advance of his men, bearing a flag of truce, and demanding the instant surrender of the place to Colonel Grierson, whom the rebels supposed to be, of course, close in the rear with a formidable force. The ruse was perfect. The rebel commander, Colonel Goodwin, demanded one hour to consider the proposition, to which Captain Forbes graciously assented, and promised to communicate his reply to the reserve. The hour was well employed by himself and his thirty-five men in a hard gallop toward Pearl River; and the three thousand scared rebels in the town of Enterprise were not called upon for a more definite reply to the demand for surrender.

In the mean time the Sixth Illinois and the remainder of the Seventh had made, during the day of the 22d and the following night, the most extraordinary and difficult march of the whole raid. Having been delayed in the morning by detailing a battalion to destroy a large rebel shoe manufactory a little distance out from Starkville, where a large quantity of leather and several thousand pairs of shoes and hats, which had been provided for the rebel army, were committed to the flames, and having captured a rebel quartermaster, who was out from Port Hudson on a foraging expedition, they found themselves at sundown hemmed in by the treacherous swamps and creeks of the Okanoxubee River, about seven miles south of the village of Louisville.

The spring rains had swollen and overflowed every stream. The marshes were swamps, and swamps were ponds. The roads, of which they were utterly ignorant, were like rivers, the water being in many places three or four feet in depth. They had already marched this day fifty miles, and now jaded men and jaded beasts were confronted by miles of these raging floods, unlit by a beam of day and unmarked by a beacon post or guide. Twenty horses were drowned, but not a man was lost. Steadily through the darkness they pressed on, until, at one o'clock in the morning of the 23d, they were absolutely forced to halt for a few hours of rest. At seven o'clock, however, each man was again in his saddle, hurrying forward for his life toward the Pearl River bridge. The river was too high to be forded. The bridge was their only means of crossing. Rebel scouts were known to have gone before them, and if they had succeeded in giving warning in time to secure the destruction of the bridge, the expedition was hopelessly cut off. It was a fearful moment as they neared the stream late in the afternoon. Colonel Prime, with the Illinois Seventh, was in the advance. Every horse was urged to the top of his speed. They rode as if in a deadly charge on a battle front. The roar of swollen waters reached their ears, and with it other sounds of crashing timbers but too significant. They redoubled their speed, and dashed down the river bank. A small party of rebel pickets were working with superhuman energy, stripping up the planks of the bridge floor, and hurling them into the waters below.

Ten minutes later and all would have been lost. But for hours and days back minutes of grace had been, by God's care, accumulating for their rescue. It is a solemn thought, and one which those brave troops did not forget to hold in devout recognition, that at any time in the whole course of their six days' marchings, haltings, encampings, and startings, a few minutes' tardiness on the part of a commander, a few moments' delay with a restive horse, a few minutes' lingering on a tedious ascent, would have brought them too late to the Pearl River bridge, and have made to all of them the difference between life and death.

A short skirmish disposed of the rebel pickets, and the raiders rode on—on into the night, and through the night, and through the next day, without halting, except at the town of Decatur, where they captured and paroled seventy-five prisoners, destroyed two warehouses full of commissary stores, four car-loads of ammunition, burned the railroad bridges and trestle-work, and captured two trains of cars and two locomotives. Eighty miles they had marched on the 23d and 24th, and this, too, after the tremendous exertions of the passage through the swamps on the 22d. On the 25th three men were found to be too much prostrated to go farther. With sad partings their comrades left them to an uncertain fate on the plantation of Mr. Dore, near Raleigh. Indeed the whole command were so utterly exhausted that, in spite of the imminence of their danger, they accomplished but twenty miles on the 25th. The next day, Sunday the 26th, they pushed on forty-one miles in a drenching rain. At one o'clock on the morning of Monday, through darkness and mud, they resumed their march, and reached the Pearl River again, now a more formidable barrier than when sixty miles nearer its source they had crossed it on a slender bridge. It was Colonel Grierson's plan to cross at the Georgetown ferry. Here again the river held in its silent grasp the fate of the entire command. Colonel Prime, as before, pressed forward in the advance, but this time with only two hundred picked men. He left camp, as we have above mentioned, at two o'clock in the morning, and riding thirteen miles before the early summer daylight, reached the river shore only to find the ferry-boat moored on the other side. Here was a dilemma of dangers. The river must be crossed. But to call upon a rebel ferry-man for the service was too hazardous. A powerful trooper spurred his horse into the rushing current and endeavored to swim over to the boat. But man and beast were swept quickly down the stream and barely escaped with life.

While the whole band were sitting silently upon their horses, dismayed and baffled, the lazy owner of the boat came strolling down to the shore, and in merciful ignorance of uniforms, supposed that he was addressing the First Regiment of Alabama Cavalry, just from Mobile. To his inquiry if they wished to cross, the Colonel replied, with admirably feigned nonchalance, in the genuine twang of Southern poor whites:

"Wa'al yes, some of us do want to cross. But it seems harder to wake up your nigger ferry-man than to catch the cursed conscripts."

The gulled proprietor was instantly alive with zeal to serve his friends. He roused the sleeping ferry-man, placed his boat at the disposal of the regiment, and hospitably breakfasted the Colonel. Half an hour after, as the troops were hurrying toward Hazlehurst, they met and captured the rebel courier riding post-haste to the ferry, to give the warning which would have prevented their escape. At Hazlehurst they cut the telegraph wires, and captured and destroyed a large number of cars loaded with ammunition, shells, and army stores of all kinds. Here Captain Forbes, who, it will be remembered, had, with thirty-five men, undertaken the mission to Macon, from near Starkville, rejoined his regiment just after they had crossed Pearl River. They had successfully followed the trail of the raiders, and were all safe.

On the night of the 27th our heroes encamped at Gallatin. Here they captured a 32-pounder rifled Parrott gun and fourteen hundred pounds of powder, which were en route to Grand Gulf. They had traveled this day thirty-seven miles. The next day, Tuesday the 28th, they were again early on the march. Four companies were detailed, under Captain Trafton, to make a circuit through Bahala to destroy the railroad dépôt and the transportation there. This little band left the camp at sunrise, and having successfully performed their mission, rejoined their comrades at night, having performed during the day a journey of thirty miles more than the rest of the command. During the day they had several skirmishes, and, without any loss to themselves, captured and paroled about thirty prisoners.

After a short night of rest, at sunrise of Wednesday the 29th all were again in the saddle, directing their course toward Brookhaven, on the New Orleans and Jackson Railroad. The Seventh Illinois were in the advance, and charged, at full gallop, through the streets of the town, burned the dépôt, cars, and bridges, and paroled over two hundred prisoners. The people of Brookhaven were at first frantic with terror, imagining that the whole town was to be committed to the flames. But as soon as they discovered that private property and rights were sacredly regarded, the scales of prejudice and delusion fell from their eyes, and the citizens crowded around our troops, begging to be paroled. The same was the case in many other villages. As soon as the personal apprehensions of the inhabitants were allayed, they were profuse in their hospitalities and in their expressions of hope that the Union would be restored. Colonel Grierson himself writes:

"The strength of the rebels has been overestimated. They have neither the armies nor the resources we have given them credit for. Passing through their country I found thousands of good Union men, who were ready and anxious to return to their allegiance the moment they could do so with safety to themselves and families. They will rally around the old flag by scores wherever our army advances. I could have brought away a thousand with me, who were anxious to come—men whom I found fugitives from their homes hid in the swamps and forests, where they were hunted like wild beasts by conscripting officers with blood-hounds.”

This testimony, from officers who had ridden through eight hundred miles of rebel territory, is unanswerably strong, and proves that the rebellion neither originated among nor is supported by the masses of the people.

On the morning of the 30th sunrise found the column again under way, and still carrying devastation in its track. Running along the railroad at Bogue Chito they burned the dépôt cars and bridges, and following on as far as Summit burned all the bridges and trestle-work on the way. In the village of Summit they found several cars and a large amount of Government stores, which they destroyed. They then encamped a little beyond the village for the night, having marched during the day twenty-eight miles.

The next day, Friday, May 1, they broke camp at daylight, and plunging into the woods, avoiding the main roads, which they well knew were by this time teeming with infuriate rebels, bore steadfastly on, by the compass, to their goal in the Southwest. When near the village of Osyka they were compelled to return to the main road to avail themselves of a bridge, by which only they could cross an important stream. Here they fell into an ambush. About eighty rebels were skulking in a thicket, where, unseen, they could take deliberate aim at any who should attempt to pass. The gallant Lieutenant-Colonel Blackburn, a little too reckless of danger, without sufficient scrutiny of the lurking-places around, at the head of his scouts, rode upon the bridge and was immediately struck down by a volley which wounded him severely in the thigh, and slightly on the head. This was the first serious disaster of the expedition. Colonel Prince immediately dismounted his men and charged into the thicket. The rebels were speedily put to flight, and the column marched on. They reached the Amity River at ten o'clock at night. Rebel pickets were posted along the banks. But the angel of safety, who had guarded the river passes for them hitherto, did not fail them here. A deep sleep was sent upon the eyes of the enemy, so that they forded the waters within gun-shot of the picket lines and were undisturbed. Forty miles they had marched this day.

With the earliest dawn of the next morning, Saturday, May 2, they were again upon the move. They had marched but a few miles ere the Sixth Illinois, which was in the advance, surprised and destroyed a rebel camp at Sandy Creek. A few hours later the Illinois Seventh gave the grand, final glory to the expedition by capturing, within a short distance of Baton Rouge, forty-two of Stuart's Mississippi cavalry, with their Colonel at their head.

Dusty, haggard, way-worn, and ragged, but with a wild fire of delight and pride in their eyes, these heroes, at mid-day of Saturday, May 2, galloped into the streets of Baton Rouge. The story of their arrival and of their incredible adventures ran with the echoes of their horses' hoofs, and the furor of wondering excitement was indescribable. Nothing like it had been known during the war. Seventeen hundred men had ridden through the entire State of Mississippi, from the northeast to the southwest corner, encountering every conceivable danger and enduring inconceivable hardships. Thousands of rebels had been trying to follow, to intercept, to find them. But with consummate skill and matchless bravery Colonel Grierson had escaped them by circuits, outwitted them by ruses, and attacked and routed them with far inferior numbers.

Skirmishing through the day and marching through the night, burning and destroying thousands of dollars' worth of public rebel property in every town through which he passed, and paroling hundreds of captives, he still kept steadily on his southwestern line of march till the seventeenth day brought Baton Rouge in view. The exploits of Morgan, Stuart, and Wheeler, boasted as they have been, are as child's play in comparison with such a raid as this. The endurance of the lauded Southern cavalry has never been put to so severe a test as were the nerve and limb of Grierson's men in this exploit.

During the last thirty hours they rode eighty miles, engaged in three skirmishes, destroyed large quantities of camp equipage and military stores, burned bridges, swam one river, took forty-two prisoners and a number of horses. This, too, without a halt and without food. Tightening their cavalry belts to stay the pangs of hunger, they slept sound sleep, sitting upright upon their horses, during the hours of that last terrible night. A near carbine shot would rouse them for an instant, to a sharp wheel of their steeds, and an alert readiness to repel the enemy. But the danger passed they were asleep again in a moment, and riding blindly forward till the next shock.

In this raid Colonel Grierson rode eight hundred miles through a country swarming with foes. He had no other guides than rude county maps and a pocket-compass. He was often entangled in swamps where many of his horses became inextricably mired. The men, thus dismounted, removed their saddles, placed them on other led beasts, and pushed vigorously on. All the way Colonel Grierson had to rely upon the country for forage and provisions. The necessity for rapid movement was such that they could rarely catch an hour for sleep. They cut three railroads, burned nine bridges, destroyed two locomotives and nearly two hundred cars; broke up three rebel camps, destroyed more than four millions' worth of rebel governmental property; captured and paroled one thousand prisoners, and brought in with them twelve hundred captured horses.

Every where the negroes welcomed these heroic adventurers, and assisted them in every possible way. Five hundred of these dark-skinned patriots, men of bold heart and stalwart limb, followed them into Baton Rouge on horses which they had borrowed, like the children of Israel, from their old oppressors. General Grierson said that, in his opinion, he could have organized and brought with him two brigades of colored men if he had possessed the necessary arms.

The moral effect of this raid must have been very great, not only in teaching the rebels a respect for the cavalry arm of our service, but in enhancing its claims to the respect of our own Government, who, in the earlier months of the war, were totally obtuse in regard to it, and were slow to learn by the severest lessons of loss at the hands of Stuart and John Morgan.

PEACE.

OH that the bells in all these silent spires
Would clash their clangor on the sleeping air,
Ring their wild music out with throbbing choirs,
Ring peace in every where!

Oh that this wave of sorrow surging o'er
The red, red land would wash away its stain—
Drown out the angry fire from shore to shore,
And give it peace again!

On last year's blossoming graves, with summer calm,
Loud in his happy tangle hums the bee;
Nature forgets her hurt, and finds her balm—
Alas! and why not we?

Spirit of God! that moved upon the face
Of the waters, and bade ancient chaos cease,
Shine, shine again o'er this tumultuous space,
Thou that art Prince of Peace!

BIRDS OF PASSAGE.

FAIR summer birds, away!
 No more
 The golden sun doth pour
 His cheering ray
 Upon green tree, or greener field;
 No more the meadow or the brook may yield
 Their store of food; no more the air is rife
 With dainty nutriment of insect life;
 Prithee, no longer stay!
 Ye can not shelter in the leafless tree,
 Ye can not bide in chill adversity—
 Fair summer guests, away!
 We wish you well, although we say, depart.

We wish you well;—yet dearer to our heart
 Are they, who, when the summer days have fled,
 And dreary winter reigneth in their stead,
 Cling closer to us;—who, when the cold rime
 Covers with sheeted frost the field and tree,
 Sing us glad songs of the glad summer time,
 Of joys that have been, and again shall be.
 True friends alone are ye, who, when the cold
 Of sorrow desolates our home and hearth,
 Making the Yule-fire dead, and young hearts old,
 Thaw with sweet songs the winter in our breast;—
 Sweet summer songs,—not of a changing earth,
 But of a changeless Heaven of never-ending rest!

A TOUR THROUGH ARIZONA.

[Fifth Paper]

HACIENDA OF SAN ANTONIO.

A PLEASANT drive of two hours through the beautiful valley of the Santa Cruz brought us to the hacienda of the San Antonio Mining Company, now in charge of Mr. Yerkes, an intelligent American, who received us with great kindness and hospitality. The buildings of the hacienda do not at present admit of very sumptuous accommodations; but here, at least, we found, for the first time since leaving Tucson, a living nucleus of American civilization—houses with fire-places and fires in them, rude attempts at beds and tables, and a people who furnished us with wood free of charge, and offered us from their scanty store of provisions whatever we needed. A mill, with smelting furnaces and a small engine, had just been erected for reducing the ores, and would be put in operation as soon as the necessary facilities for working the mine could be obtained.

The San Antonio Mine is situated about six miles from the reduction works, in a spur of the Santa Cruz Mountains. The ore is rich in argentiferous galena and lead, easily managed, and will doubtless yield profitable results. It is questionable if the silver lodes in this vicinity will produce so large a proportion of rich ores to the ton as those of the Santa Rita and Cerro Colorado Mountains, but it has been well demonstrated that they are deep, boldly-defined, and reliable; and will, if properly worked, amply recompense the labor and capital invested in them. The magnificent grazing lands of the valleys into which the spurs of the mountains run; the abundant supply of fine oak timber on the foot-hills; the facilities for procuring provisions from Sonora, and easy access by good roads to the ports of the Gulf, afford them peculiar advantages, which would be greatly enhanced if we possessed the small strip of territory extending as far south as Libertad. No traveler passing through this region can fail to be struck with the sagacity of the Mexican Commissioners in running the boundary-line.

Mr. Yerkes gave us the only detailed and reliable account we had yet received of the assassination by the Apaches of Mr. J. B. Mills and Mr. Edwin Stevens, which had recently taken place in a cañon about three miles from the hacienda, on the trail to the Patagonia or Mowry Mine.

At an early hour on the morning of the 29th of December, while Mr. Yerkes was preparing breakfast in his cabin, Mr. Mills and Mr. Stevens rode up and stopped on their way from Santa Cruz to the Mowry Mine. Mills was in the employ of Sylvester Mowry, Esq., the proprietor of the mine, and was about to turn over the management to Stevens, who had just arrived from Guyamas, in company with Mr. Samuel F. Butterworth, President of the Arizona Mining Company. The distance from Santa Cruz to the Patagonia (as it is commonly called by the Mexicans) is about fifteen miles, the hacienda of San Antonio being a little less than half-way.

Some conversation ensued when they rode up, Yerkes pressing them to stop a while and take some breakfast before riding any farther. They said they were anxious to get on; but finally concluded to take breakfast. Both were in excellent spirits, and full of life and hope. After staying about an hour they mounted their horses and rode off toward the cañon. This was the last Mr. Yerkes ever saw of them alive. A short time after two Mexican boys came running in, breathless and panic-stricken, stating that while on the way over to the mine, a little beyond the entrance into the cañon, they saw on the top of the ridge, which they had taken for safety, a large number of fresh Apache tracks, forming a trail into the cañon. They immediately turned back, but had not proceeded far when they saw two Americans on horseback rapidly enter the cañon. Suspecting that an ambush was prepared in advance, they shouted, "Apaches! Los Apaches!" but owing to the distance, or noise of the horses' hoofs, failed to make themselves heard. They then waited a while till they heard the firing of many guns in rapid succession, by which they knew that the Indians had attacked the two horsemen. Mr. Yerkes and three American employés at his house immediately seized their arms and rode out to the cañon. It was quite silent. The dead bodies of the two young men lay by the road-side, naked and disfigured with wounds. Arrows were scattered around them, and many were found sticking in their bodies. Stevens was doubtless killed at the first fire.

SCENE OF THE ATTACK UPON MILLS AND STEVENS.

He lay close to a little arroya that intersects the trail, and seemed to have fallen directly from his horse at the point of attack. The body of Mills was found thirty yards to the left, on the slope of the cañon, close by a tree behind which he had evidently made a stand and fought for some time. Marks of a desperate struggle were seen all over the ground. Both bodies were entirely stripped, with the exception of a portion of the boots, which the savages in their hurry could not pull off. Stevens's body was lanced in several places, but he had evidently received his death-wound from a rifle-ball at the first fire.

That of Mills was pierced with balls, arrows, and lances, showing seventeen distinct wounds, most of them mortal.

A month had just elapsed when we visited the spot. Mr. Yerkes accompanied us, and pointed out each scene of the disaster. Abundant signs of the struggle were still visible. We picked up several broken arrows which had been pulled out of the bodies, some of them still bearing the marks of blood.

APACHE BOOTS, HEAD-DRESS, SADDLE, ETC.

The place was peculiarly adapted to an ambush of this kind. A thick growth of bunch-grass and oak timber, with patches of brush-wood, covers the sides of the cañon, which are rocky and precipitous. The road winds through the bottom, coming suddenly upon a small arroya about four feet deep, fringed with sacatone, and crosses nearly at right angles. In this arroya, shielded from observation by the banks and grassy tufts, the Apaches lay concealed, so that upon the approach of their victims the muzzles of their guns could not have been more than a few paces from the bodies of the unsuspecting horsemen.

It is characteristic of life in Arizona that both of these young men were well acquainted with the dangers of the country. Stevens had served on the Overland Mail route, and was universally esteemed as a brave, sagacious, and intelligent man. Mills had lived and traveled in Arizona for several years, and had seen many tragic examples of the cunning and cruelty of these Indians; but like all who have lost their lives in a similar manner, had become accustomed to such scenes. Men of this kind are too apt to rely upon their courage and fire-arms; when it is a noted fact that in most cases they are murdered without a chance of defense. It was still more characteristic of the country, as showing the recklessness acquired by habit, that scarcely two years had elapsed since Dr. Titus, of the Mowry Mine, lost his life in a similar manner, at this very place. He was passing through the cañon with a Delaware Indian, when they were waylaid and fired upon by the Apaches. The Delaware was killed at the first fire. Titus dismounted from his horse, and fought his way on foot about two hundred yards up the cañon. He would doubtless have effected his escape had not one of the Indians crept upon him from the rear and shot him through the hip. Although the wound was not mortal he was satisfied that he could not get away, surrounded as he was by savages who were shooting their arrows at him from every bush. To avoid the tortures which they usually inflict upon their prisoners he ended his own life by shooting himself in the head. The Apaches afterward, in describing the fight at Fronteras, said they were about to give it up when Titus received the wound in the hip. They knew they had him then. The Chief said he was a brave man, and would not permit his body to be mutilated. When it is considered that the common practice of these wretches is to hang their victims by the heels to a tree and put a slow fire under their heads, few men of generous feelings will be disposed to pronounce judgment upon the manner in which Dr. Titus ended his life. Under all circumstances, I believe it is best that we should live as long as we can, for while there is life there is hope; but no man really knows what he would do in such a case as this.

I visited the burial-place of these young men at the Mowry Mines. On the rise of a hill, overlooking the valley of the Hacienda, surrounded by mountains clothed with the verdure of oak groves, with an almost perpetual summer sky overhead, far isolated from the busy haunts of the civilized world, lie the remains of seventeen white men. Fifteen of the number are the victims of violence. Only two of them died from ordinary causes. Three graves, close in a row, prominently mark the ground—one the grave of Dr. Titus; the last two, covered with freshly-spaded earth, with a board at the head of each, bearing respectively the simple inscriptions:

J. B. MILLS, Jr.
December 29th, 1863.

E. C. STEVENS.
December 29th, 1863.

A few miles beyond the cañon we came to a series of hills covered with a fine growth of oak timber. Here we found the first indications we had enjoyed for some weeks of life and industry. Cords of wood lay piled up on the wayside; the sound of the axe reverberated from hill to hill; the smoke of many charcoal pits filled the air, and teamsters, with heavily-laden wagons, were working their way over the rugged trails and by-paths. Gradually the road became better defined, and the clearings more extensive, till we came to the brow of a hill overlooking the hacienda.

A more picturesque or cheering view I had rarely seen. Down in a beautiful little valley of several hundred acres, almost embosomed in trees, stand the reduction works, store-houses, and peon quarters of the Mowry Silver Mines. Smoke rose in curling clouds from the main chimney, which stands like an obelisk in the centre of the mill, and sulphurous vapors whirled up from the long row of smelting furnaces in the rear. The busy hum of the steam-engine and fly-wheels fell with a lively effect upon the ear; the broad, smooth plaza in front of the works was dotted with wagons and teams, discharging their freight of wood and ore; and under the shade of the surrounding trees, amidst the picturesque little huts of the peons, groups of women and children, clothed in the loose, variegated costume of the country, gave a pleasing, domestic interest to the scene. It was the last of the month, and consequently pay-day—a very welcome and important day all over the world, but especially in this isolated region, where pay-days are scarce. Such an event, within fifteen miles of Santa Cruz, rises to the dignity of a grand public institution. The citizens of Santa Cruz, who, as already stated, are not proverbial for energy, seem to be inspired with new life on occasions of this kind, and never fail to visit the mines in large numbers for the purpose of participating in the general rejoicing. For two or three days the whole hacienda presents a lively and characteristic scene. Work is out of the question, so far as the peons are concerned. Under the shade of every tree sits a group of thriftless vagabonds, conspicuous for their dirty skins and many-colored serapas, shuffling the inevitable pack of cards, or casting their fortune of greasy “holies” upon the capricious hazards of monte. The earnings of a month are soon disposed of; the women and children are left dependent upon new advances from the store-houses; the workmen are stupefied with mescal and many nights of debauch; and when all is over—the fandango at an end—the monte-tables packed up, every miner bankrupt, and no more goods or money to be had, the posse of sharpers from the border-line of Sonora take their leave: and thus it goes from month to month. Although these poor wretches live from hand to mouth they are generally cheerful and happy. If they could see their way a few months ahead they would probably die.

This brings me to the reflection that, under the existing system of labor in Southern Arizona, the silver mines can never be developed to their full capacity or profitably worked. The Santa Rita, Cerro Colorado, and Cahuabía mines have been tried in this way, and the result has been invariably unfortunate. Many valuable lives have been sacrificed, and vast amounts of property lost by the treachery, dishonesty, and incapacity of this class of workmen.

It may justly be contended that no other class has been available hitherto; that this is the cheapest and most convenient labor that could be obtained—indeed the only labor; but the result, I think, sufficiently demonstrates that it can not be relied upon. It is true, fifteen dollars a month, payable mostly in goods at high prices, for men who have had more or less experience in the working of mines, can not be considered an extravagant rate of wages. But that must be determined by the result. Expenses have never yet been paid in any of the mines opened in Arizona by American capitalists. There will be no difficulty in procuring reliable white labor as soon as there is any security for life and property. The climate of Arizona is far more genial than that of Nevada, where white labor is abundant. Men can be found to work wherever they receive an adequate compensation for their services. I do not believe it would be practicable wholly or at once to dispense with Mexican labor. It can always to some extent be made available for the lower grades of mining operations. Under the preponderance of a higher and more intelligent class of labor it may become both convenient and profitable.

During the afternoon we paid a visit to the mine, which is situated in the side of a hill about a quarter of a mile from the offices and head-quarters.

A number of Mexicans were at work getting out the ore, and the scene upon our arrival was both picturesque and lively. I took a seat a little on one side of the "dump," and made a sketch which will convey a better idea of the general appearance of a silver mine in Arizona than any written description.

The Patagonia, now called the Mowry Mine, was probably known to the Mexicans, and worked by them many years ago. The Americans first discovered it in 1858. In 1860 it became the property of Sylvester Mowry, Esq. It is situated within ten miles of the boundary-line between Sonora and Arizona; is 6160 feet above the level of the sea, and is distant 280 miles from Guyamas on the Gulf of California.

It is not my purpose in these casual sketches to write a report on the condition and prospects of each silver or gold mine in the Territory of Arizona, even if I possessed the requisite knowledge of mining operations. I can only say, therefore, in reference to the Mowry Mine, that the lode appears to be large, bold, and well defined, and the ore of fair average richness. It is composed of argentiferous galena, impregnated with arsenic, and is easily reduced by smelting. Three distinct veins are perceptible, which cross each other in the principal lode. The ore which was in process of reduction at the time of my visit yielded, as I was informed, about forty dollars to the ton. It was not the richest, nor could it be considered a fair average. Mr. Küstel, the distinguished metallurgist, author of the "Processes of Silver and Gold Extraction," etc., visited the mine about a month prior to my arrival, and made a thorough examination of its ores and resources. From a report made by him it would appear that some of the ores average $350 to the ton. If the mines were properly worked he estimates that a general average of $50 to $70 to the ton might be obtained; and he mentions among the advantages in fluxing the presence of iron ore, manganese, and lime. The result of one day's working he found to be as follows: Produce of twenty tons in silver, $1200; in lead, $480—total, $1680; expenses of reduction, mining, etc., $400—profit, $1280. This result is highly encouraging; but the probability is, a more perfect and extensive system of operations would greatly enhance the net proceeds of the mine.

At the time of our visit this property was in the hands of the Deputy-Marshall of New Mexico, who held it on behalf of the United States. Mr. Mowry, it appears, had been arrested and imprisoned by order of General J. H. Carleton, and the mine seized under the Confiscation Act. Of the merits of the difficulty I have no knowledge. It appears, however, that Mr. Mowry was discharged by the court which tried his case. His property, I believe, has since been restored to him by order of the Government.

SYLVESTER MOWRY.

This gentleman's career in Arizona has been singularly adventurous and varied. In 1855 he was an officer of the Federal army at Fort Yuma. An expedition which he made into the wilds of Arizona inspired him with a high opinion of its great mineral resources, and a most enthusiastic estimate of its future destiny. He resigned his position in the army, and spent several years in exploring the country and attempting to procure a recognition of its claims by Government. At one period he was elected a delegate to Congress, and visited Washington for the purpose of procuring a Territorial organization; but his object was defeated by sectional dissensions in that body. Mr. Mowry is well known throughout the United States. His name is inseparably connected with that of Arizona. It is a part of himself. He once declared, in a moment of passion, when his term of residence was questioned, that "he was born there!" Certainly no man has done more for the new Territory than he, and no man loves it better.

We spent the day very pleasantly, visiting the principal objects of interest at the Patagonia. After enjoying a luxurious dinner at head-quarters, and various hospitable "smiles," we rode back by the valley road to the hacienda of the San Antonio. The climate of the Patagonia is unsurpassed—I might almost say unequaled. How such a paradise ever came to be christened after the chilly, fog-smitten land, where "giants grow and storms do blow," I am unable to conjecture. No wonder Mr. Mowry prefers his own name, which, if not so euphonious, is at least less suggestive of howling winds and fishy natives.

An early start from the hacienda of San Antonio enabled us to make an unusually good day's journey. We reached Santa Cruz just as the sun was peeping over the mountains, but were delayed some time in procuring corn for our animals. For the benefit of travelers in this region it may be well to mention that forage and provisions are exceedingly scarce, and can only be procured at a few of the principal points. From Tucson to the border-line nothing whatever is to be had. There are no white inhabitants, and consequently nothing is produced except the small pittance of food raised by the Papago Indians. It will be easily understood, therefore, how difficult and inconvenient it is to travel in this country. With wagons a considerable number of animals are required, and these must haul their own forage, besides provisions for a party large enough to protect the train from Indian hostilities. The grazing, it is true, is excellent in the southern range, but for heavy work the draught teams require more substantial nourishment than grass.

Our journey down the valley of the Santa Cruz was one of the most agreeable in our entire tour. We were accompanied by Señor Commodoran, an intelligent Mexican, whose friendship toward Americans traveling through the country has long been proverbial. It was he who, upon receiving news of the attack upon Mr. Butterworth, got up a party and went out to his relief.

After passing through the cañon of the San Lazaro we entered a valley which opens out into a magnificent grazing range, extending nearly 20 miles to the foot-hills of the Pinitos Mountains. Groves of cotton-wood of gigantic size fringe the stream at intervals of every few miles; the grass is wonderfully luxuriant, covering the valley and hill-sides as far as the eye can reach with a rich gold-colored carpeting; the slopes of the hills and mountains are beautifully adorned with groves of oak, ash, hackberry, and various kinds of shrubbery, through the foliage of which the bright yellow grass glistens like a patchwork of gold; and far in the distance this glowing combination of colors is outlined by the purple peaks of innumerable Sierras, shivered by some tremendous convulsion of the earth into the wildest and most fantastic forms. Such sun-rises and sunsets, such marvelous richness of coloring, such magic lights and shades, I have never seen equaled in Europe, not even in Italy or the islands of the Grecian Archipelago.

Our camp for the night was under a fine grove of cotton-wood, where the grass, shaded from the crisping rays of the sun, grew up in luxuriant masses high over our heads. Here we cut and slashed at the tufts, and burned out broad spaces for our fires, of which there was constant danger, till our camp was secure from conflagration; and then the venison and wild-ducks were quickly placed in the frying-pans, and their savory odors mingled with the pleasant fumes of the coffee-pot, and the creature-comforts of earth were ours in perfection. No prince or potentate in the plenitude of his power, no rich man counting his hoards, was ever half so happy as we, the way-worn, dust-covered, sun-burnt travelers in Arizona. Prominent in the distance stood the chimney-like peak of the Pinitos, and around us, for a circle of 30 or 40 miles, arose the rugged ranges of the Santa Cruz, Arizuma, and Santa Rita mountains. At sunset the scene was magnificent beyond description. No human art is adequate to catch the infinite variety of outline and the incomparable richness of the atmospheric tints in this enchanting region. Even our volunteer soldiers, rough as most of them were, enjoyed it, and constantly burst forth into extravagant praises of the country.

We were now in a very dangerous pass of the Apaches, and it became necessary to keep a sharp look-out for our animals. Strict injunctions were given to the guard to keep up a vigilant watch. Most of us, as we lay down in the grass, had some serious thoughts, yet all manifested a strong desire to have a brush with the enemy. The night was calm and beautiful, the whole canopy of heaven literally glowing with stars. It must have been a little beyond midnight, during a period of the most profound silence, that our ears were saluted by the sharp, quick report of a rifle, and some unaccountable commotion among the men, who at once rushed from their resting-places, carbines in hand, in search of the supposed Apaches. It was some time before the cause of the alarm could be ascertained. A foolish sailor, who had turned soldier, happening to be on guard, discovered, as he supposed, an Apache creeping toward him, and, without waiting to challenge the object, fired his gun. The object disappeared for a time in the grass. Search was made, and at length the dead body of our own faithful watchdog, which had accompanied us during the whole journey, was discovered. Poor Bull had become a general favorite. The man who killed him at once fell into disgrace, and never again had any peace of body or mind. He was sent back to the garrison at Tucson by the first opportunity. Before our departure from the scene of this canine tragedy, which produced a gloom all over camp, the soldiers gave the body of Bull a decent burial in military form, and fired a salute of four guns over his grave.

Señor Commodoran was accompanied by an old Mexican—one of the escort by whom Mr. Butterworth had been deserted during his recent fray with the Apaches. About 15 miles beyond San Lazaro we reached the scene of the attack, of which I made a sketch.

As an illustration of the hazards of life in Arizona, tending to show the causes which have hitherto retarded the development of the mines in that region, a brief narrative of Mr. Butterworth's adventure will not be uninteresting. The positions of honor and trust occupied by this gentleman as United States District Attorney of Mississippi, and more recently as Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York, together with his recognized financial abilities, and his eminent services in the adjustment of the great Almaden difficulty, have rendered his name familiar to the public throughout the United States. Upon the completion of his business last year as President of the New Almaden Quicksilver Mines, he received, before his departure from the Pacific coast, an urgent request from some prominent capitalists in New York to visit the silver regions of Arizona, and report upon their condition and prospects. At the same time he was appointed President of the Arizona Mining Company, and every facility was tendered him for the prosecution of his inquiries in the new Territory. A spirit of adventure and a desire to see something of a country which was beginning to attract so much attention, with a laudable ambition to aid in its development, induced Mr. Butterworth to accept these flattering propositions; and on or about the 1st of December he left San Francisco by steamer for Guyamas. His party consisted of Mr. Küstel, metallurgist, and Mr. Higgins and Mr. Janin, two young gentlemen of scientific attainments.

Nothing of particular interest occurred between Guyamas and Santa Cruz. On their arrival there Mr. Küstel and Mr. Higgins proceeded to the Patagonia mines with instructions to cross over by the way of Santa Rita, and meet Mr. Butterworth and Mr. Janin at Tubac.

On the same day of the massacre of Mills and Stevens (December 29), about five or six hours later, Mr. Butterworth's party, which consisted of Mr. Janin, five Mexicans, an American driver, and himself, were proceeding along the road a little beyond the deserted ranch of Santa Barbara, when a band of Apaches, numbering some twenty-five or thirty, made an attack upon them from the brushwood fringing the bed of the Santa Cruz River. As soon as the Indians appeared they commenced yelling like devils, and firing their guns and bows and arrows, evidently with a view of producing confusion at the first shock of the attack. Mr. Butterworth called upon his men to stand by the wagons, and expressed his belief that they could easily whip the Apaches. The ambulance and baggage wagons were driven up to a mesquit-tree a little to the right of the road, where the animals could be secured. Meantime the Indians had come out of their ambush and set fire to the grass, which was tall and dry. The flames swept down upon the wagons so rapidly that it was found necessary to abandon the shelter of the tree, and make for a rise of ground about two hundred yards distant, where the position would be advantageous for a fight. Just as they reached this point, the Indians shouting and yelling all around them, the grass was again fired to windward, and the flames swept down toward them with fearful rapidity. Mr. Butterworth stood by the ambulance, armed with a double-barreled shot-gun, with which he kept the Indians at bay for some time. Young Janin had one of Henry's rifles, and fired five or six shots at them, with what effect it was impossible to tell. While these two were making vigorous battle the five Mexicans were making tracks over the hills, so that when Butterworth undertook to muster his men he was unable to see any of them. The last he saw of his American driver, who up to this period was a great Indian fighter, that valiant individual had unhitched one of the mules, and was riding full tilt after the Mexicans—doubt-

ATTACK ON MR. BUTTERWORTH.

“but they’re getting rather too many for us, Colonel, and I think we had both better leave.” By this time there were between twenty and thirty of the red devils yelling and shooting at rather close quarters. Under cover of the smoke they retired a short distance from the wagons, where they became separated. Janin made his escape into a ravine, where he lay concealed for some time; and Butterworth took his stand behind a mesquite-tree about a couple of hundred yards from the wagons, where he resolved to make as good a fight as possible.

The Indians set fire to the grass again, and the flames swept toward him with fearful rapidity, compelling him to climb the tree for security, and even then burning part of the legs off his pantaloons. Two bullet-holes which we found in the tree indicated that his position was by no means a pleasant one. Upon further examination of the spot where the wagons stood, we found various fragments of the plunder scattered around, such as sardine boxes, broken candle-boxless with a firm determination to bring them back if ever he overtook them. But neither he nor they appeared on the battle-ground again. The Indians perceiving their advantage, began to press in rather forcibly. Young Janin behaved with great coolness. Turning to Butterworth, who had reserved his fire for the last desperate struggle, he said, “Colonel, I can’t see them very well—lend me your specs!” But the Colonel saw no speculation in that, and merely observed—“No; you had better save yourself, Janin.” “I won’t desert you,” said Janin; es, cartridges, patent medicines, and a bottle inscribed PHILIP ROACH, San Francisco. This was one of a number bearing a similar brand, containing some brandy reputed to be fifty years old. Mr. Butterworth, I have been informed, said it went harder with them to see these brutal wretches drink up his choice brandy than all the rest of the disaster put together. Plunder was evidently their chief object; for as soon as they had gutted the wagons of their contents they retired across the Santa Cruz River, where they held a grand carousal over their booty. They had succeeded in getting $1700 in gold coin and other property, amounting in the aggregate to about $3000. It is gratifying to know that this band of Apaches has since met with summary vengeance at the hands of the California Volunteers. Most if not all of them have been killed, and $700 of the money taken from their dead bodies. Had there been two resolute men with our unlucky friend when he heard them carousing across the river during the night, he could have had a more prompt and satisfactory settlement. These were the same Indians who had killed Mills and Stevens a few hours before. They had crossed over with the rifles of these unfortunate men from the Patagonia Cañon by the San Antonio Pass; and flushed with success, and seeing a small party approaching along the road, again lay in ambush, and made this new attack. It is supposed by some that there were Mexicans among them from Santa Cruz, and that they were in collusion with the escort; but of this I could find no proof, nor is it sustained by subsequent developments. The same band of Indians next day attacked a party of Mexicans on the Tubutama road, and killed four of the number, putting the rest to flight.

Butterworth was entirely unacquainted with the country, and in attempting to reach Santa Cruz lost his way. Janin and a small Yaqui boy, who had escaped during the fight, reached Santa Cruz without difficulty. Here a relief party was immediately gotten up by Señor Commodoran. Janin was apprehensive that his comrade might have been killed, but still had hopes of his safety, and sent a note by Commodoran announcing his own safe arrival.

Not very far above the Calabasas Ranch we reached the spot where Mr. Butterworth had camped after two days and nights of exposure and extreme suffering from cold, and where he was first seen by Commodoran. The nights were intensely sharp. He had no blankets, and deemed it imprudent to light a fire, until he found it impossible to bear with the cold any longer. What his sufferings were in this wild region, surrounded by lurking foes, without food, without blankets, and beyond the reach, as he supposed, of all human aid, no man who has not traveled in Arizona can conceive. Two days and nights of such suffering as would have caused most men to despair had left their marks upon him. His throat was wrapped with straw, and he was evidently in a very bad condition. Up to this time he could not have wandered much less than fifty miles up and down the valley of the Santa Cruz. On the approach of Commodoran, supposing him to be a Sonoran marauder, he raised his gun, and was about to kill him, when the frightened Mexican cried out, "No tira! no tira! Yo Amigo! Amigo!" Still Butterworth kept his gun pointed at him. "Vamos!" was all he could say in Spanish. Commodoran, with great sagacity, jerked up his horse's head, so as to keep it between him and the muzzle of the gun, and slowly approaching, held out Janin's note, shouting, "No tira! Yo Amigo! Patagonia! Patagonia!" The last was a lucky hit. The word "Patagonia" was familiar, and partially solved the mystery. Janin's note did the rest, and the most cordial greeting followed this inhospitable reception.

The return of Mr. Butterworth to Santa Cruz, where he procured a new outfit; the recovery of his ambulance and wagon; meeting with his friends Küstel and Higgins at Tubac; visit to the Cerró Colorado, and subsequent adventures on the road to Guyamas; safe arrival at San Francisco; return to New York; continuance in the presidency, with entire control as resident manager, of the New Almaden Quicksilver Mines, as well as of the Arizona Silver Mines at Cerro Colorado, would furnish in detail an interesting sequel to his adventure with the Apaches.

Continuing our journey we reached by noon the ranch of the Calabasas, from which point we had diverged three weeks before on our route down into Sonora. All along the Santa Cruz River we passed through the richest ranges of pasture and farming land we had yet seen. Abundance of mesquit, cotton-wood, willow, and walnut is found in the river bottoms, and the grass is so luxuriant that in many places it is difficult to travel out of the beaten track. We saw great quantities of deer and a few flocks of wild turkeys; but they are unaccountably wild—much more so than in populated countries. We supposed they were not accustomed to the presence of white men.

At an early hour in the afternoon we reached our former head-quarters at Tubac. It was a glorious sight to see the flag of our Union still floating from the old tower upon which we had raised it on the day of our departure for Sonora.

We were now almost entirely out of provisions and forage. A few days' rations only remained. It was necessary, therefore, to send down to Tucson for fresh supplies, and the freight-wagon, with an escort of ten men, was dispatched for that purpose. In the mean time I devoted a couple of days to writing up these rough notes of our adventures, and completing some sketches of the scenery on the way.

AT REST.

REST here a little while, but not forever!
Thou sleepest, and I lay thee gently down;
But thou art still my darling, still my own—
Thee from my love nor time nor death can sever.

Only a little while—while thou art sleeping;
Thou art not left, my darling—not alone;
But as a precious seed that I have sown,
Still thou art loved, and still in constant keeping.

I see thee as a lily that has faded,
The wintry blast has bowed thy fragile head;
I see thee as a lamb in spring-time dead,
Or as a field by passing cloud o'er-shaded.

Why is thy mouth so mute—thy hand so still?
Why to my anxious voice comes no reply?
Why is no meaning in thy half-closed eye?
Alas! my God, teach me to love Thy will!

I shall not hear her in the early morning,
I shall not see her with the rest at play,
I shall not watch her growing day by day,
Fresh grace each year her gentle ways adorning,

Alas! no more her silvery voice will ring
About the dwelling like a song of mirth;
I shall not see her by the Christmas hearth,
Nor garlanded with flowers in the spring.

Oh, never more the little arms shall twine
Around me, bending me to thy caress,
Never the pleadings of thy meek distress
Sue to my heart and match my tears with thine!

Alas, my child, my child! my opening flower!
The very crown and spring of my delight,
How has my sun gone down before the night!
I may not see her, nor embrace her more!

But, my own darling, thou art not forsaken,
Thou art but resting here a little while;
I shall yet hear thy voice, and see thy smile
In the bright morning when thou shalt awaken!

Sleep then a little while and take thy rest!
No cruel pain shall flush thy tender brow,
No sweeping tempest shall disturb thee now:
Sleep peacefully, as on thy mother's breast.

Sleep through the night till morning comes again!
Angels are watching with me round thy bed.
Sleep, little flower—rest thy weary head;
Soon shall the sunrise glance across the plain.

Yes, I shall hear thy voice, and see thy smile,
And clasp thee in a long, long, sweet embrace,
And gaze upon the radiance of thy face—
O then rest here in peace a little while!

AN AMAZON.

THE KING OF THE AMAZONS.

CAPTAIN RICHARD F. BURTON, who is determined to see as much of Africa as is possible to an enterprising traveler, visited Abomey, the famous capital of Gelele, King of Dahomey, during the spring of the present year, 1864. He saw the Amazons; he saw the blood of the sacrifices, and stumbled over the skulls of the slain; he talked with the King; he was witness to the horrors and the meanness, the puerility and ferocity, the brutality and the politeness, as he says, of this African Emperor.

He was honored with the commission of Ambassador from the British Government to this mighty potentate, and carried with him, as presents, "one forty-feet circular crimson silk damask tent, with pole complete," which the mighty Gelele turned up his snub nose at; "one richly-embossed silver pipe, with amber mouth-piece," which the King could not smoke out of; "two richly-embossed silver belts, with lion and crane raised in relief, in morocco cases; two silver and partly-gilt waiters, in oak case," of which the Abomeyans had but a poor opinion; "one coat of mail and gauntlets," of the wrong size and too heavy.

Whydah, which is the sea-port of Abomey, is a notorious resort of slave-traders. Here lived, some years ago, the ingenuous Captain Canot's friend, Mr. Martinez, who enjoyed the rank and power of a Caboceer of Dahomey, and was entitled to the marks of honor of an umbrella, a chair, and perhaps also a knife and fork. Unfortunately for his descendants, of whom there are a considerable number, the mighty Gelele is heir to all property of his subjects who die; and when Mr. Martinez died the Viceroy of Whydah locked up his house, took possession of his goods, and turned his children into the street. Here also lived another of Captain Canot's slave-trading friends, Mr. Francesco Felis da Souza, who was more than a Caboceer, for he was a Chacha, which is as much as to say the Collector of Customs of Whydah, and died, worthy man, leaving behind him a hundred children.

This Da Souza family, says Captain Burton, is charged with exercising a pernicious influence over the minds of the King and people of Dahomey. It is still numerous. Our traveler gives the names of thirteen sons and four daughters who are distinguished in different ways; and besides the children, there are about a hundred grandchildren. The "patriarchal institution" appears to have flourished in this part of Africa. The daughters are too high to marry—they do worse.

Whydah appears to be an abominable, hot, and uncomfortable hole; but it serves the purpose of introducing the traveler gently to the manners and customs of Dahomey. For instance, Captain Burton got out of his hammock, on the road to the town, in the hot sun, to pay his respects to a Fetich man who sat under a ragged white umbrella, and received the white man's bow with dignity. Thereupon the two snapped fingers, which is as much as though a Yankee and an Englishman should shake hands; and when this was done, the Fetich man's two wives handed around water in small wine-glasses.

Water is, we learn, the greatest luxury in Dahomey. It is very scarce and, in general, only worse than the rum which the people who can afford it substitute in its place. To drink water together is therefore a ceremony, and not less than three toasts or sentiments are passed while the dignitaries, standing up, consume the glass which neither cheers nor inebriates, but only disgusts. You bow, you touch glasses, and you exclaim, "Sai diyye"—"This is water"—half of it being mud. Your compotator bows, and responds, "Sai ko"—"May the water cool your throat"—it is more likely to choke you. After some more sentiments a bottle of rum is introduced, "to kill the animalculæ," as our soldiers in the South would say. Fortunately the chief of an embassy from a nation in good standing at the court of Dahomey is not required to drink all the rum that is offered him; he may without breach of manners pour it down the throat of his favorite Kruman, who opens his mouth readily for that purpose, and lets you toss the glassful down at a single gulp. Some of the waggish kings, Captain Burton tells us, have made their servants lie flat on the ground, and swallow, in that position, a bottle of rum at a draught.

In Dahomey the mark of a colonel is a white umbrella, a somewhat inconvenient appendage in battle one would think. The higher civil and military dignitaries are permitted to wear or carry several umbrellas. When you are introduced to a stranger he snaps his fingers at you, which is not a mark of contempt, but a friendly salutation, equivalent to shaking hands, and much better in a hot climate, says Burton. When a company of soldiers "present arms" in honor of some passing dignitary, such as an English ambassador, they rush frantically at the object of their salute, "bending low, and simulating attack;" then the corporals advance and snap their fingers at the great man; and, finally, forming in close column, the company marches and counter-marches three times past him; halts in front of him; and finishes the ceremony with a "hideous outcry," "captain and men, with outstretched right arms, raising their sticks, bill-hooks, or muskets, to an angle of forty-five degrees, the muzzles in the air, like a band of conspirators on the English stage."

As for the dances, of which these people are extravagantly fond, in them they go through a whole military campaign, and describe, in a somewhat lively pantomime, the decapitation of an enemy, and many other scenes pleasant to the warrior's memory. The dance, says our traveler, is "a tremendous display of agility." He thinks, indeed, that the pantomime is more troublesome than the actual fight. "One month of such performance would make a European look forward to a campaign as to a time of rest." It is a little odd that the dancers blacken their black faces with gunpowder, like an American "Ethiopian minstrel." The dance is enlivened by the firing of muskets, and concludes with a general drinking match. Indeed, most ceremonies and events, of whatever description, in Dahomey, are finished with a bottle of rum.

In Dahomey there are no proper names, but an infinity of titles, and every rise in rank confers a new name. The name of the present King, Emperor, Sultan, Tycoon, or whatever the quality of the ruler of the Amazons may be, is somewhat long. It is a mere string of titles, beginning with "Gelele má Nyonzi," which signifies "Bigness with no way of lifting;" then follow the strong names, among which are: "a Rock, the finger-nail can not scratch it;" "Lion of Lions;" "Shadow which is never lost in Water;" and, finally, "An Animal which has cut its Teeth."

The spy system for which the Japanese are notorious exists also in Dahomey. Every officer has his double; and this is carried so far that if a captain is sent to prison he must be accompanied by his légédé, who is answerable that the sentence is strictly carried out, and withholds from the unfortunate prisoner the food surreptitiously sent by his wives. But besides this there is a singular custom which prevents the immediate displacement of an officer by the King, who sends, however, a new man, his intended successor, to help the old officer, and to step gradually into his shoes.

They have policemen and custom-house officers in Dahomey. The latter appropriate to themselves a good share of the duties; the former discourage crimes against the person, murder being a royal prerogative; but they are not able to prevent theft, which is the common vice of all Gelele's subjects.

Christianity is a recognized religion. The King not unfrequently sends down to Whydah to ask the prayers of the white men; and on St. John's Day he transmits by his Viceroy a pot of oil and a bottle of rum as his acknowledgment of the faith. This, however, does not prevent him from murdering a Christian if the humor takes him; nor does it confer any privileges upon the missionaries. The native religion is chiefly fetich-worship. There is an idol called Legba, who is adored, as are also, in a less degree, turkey-buzzards, the boa constrictor, and some other creatures. They also pray to the dead; at least they appear to have the belief that when a man is sick and dying it is because his friends in the spirit land want him; and they sometimes remonstrate with these unreasonable spirits, and offer them, by way of ransom for the sick man's life, certain articles of food, which are placed upon the graves of those addressed. The Danbgbwe, a small python, is sacred; it has its temples, where dozens of these disgusting animals are fed and nursed into harmlessness. To kill one is sure to get the killer into trouble. A native who accidentally slays such a snake is placed under a hut of dry thatch, greased with palm-oil, which is then set on fire, when he must run to the nearest water, and is all the way mercilessly belabored with sticks.

You travel in Dahomey in a hammock, a not unpleasant conveyance, if the pole does not break and let the traveler suddenly down upon his head. A large company of attendants—cooks, bearers, officers, and officers' slaves, follow and precede the chief personage; and among these a king's messenger, bearing the king's stick as his warrant, and a cowhide-whip as his weapon, sedulously maintains order. At every village Mr. Burton was received with a procession, and in great form. This caused delay, for which the Dahomeyans do not care, there being neither railroad nor telegraph in their country. Also it caused bottles of rum to be produced by the traveler, for which they do care. On entering the village the caravan begins to shout, dance, and fire guns; the caboceer, drawn up at the road-side, sits upon a high stool, with his feet upon one lower, under a ragged white umbrella. He is commonly dressed in a waist clout, a few beads, and a human tooth or two. The British ambassador and his companion were obliged to halt before this dignitary, and pass the proper diplomatic compliments of the day. Water is thereupon produced by the caboceer's wife, and fruit and food in very moderate quantities given, for which the British embassy returned rum.

To the rum succeeded a grand dance, with a full band of cymbals, horns, rattles, and drums, to make music. Then there is singing, speech-making, long professions of devotion to the mighty Gelele, and to all his friends—a hint for more rum—then more dancing.

Every village possesses a custom-house, and Dahomeyans pay duties on every thing they bring to market. The market-master, or receiver of duties, has one singular perquisite; every cock which crows in the open street he confiscates. The result is that the "bird of morn" appears in public in Dahomey invariably gagged, by means of a thong passed between the mandibles and tied behind the head. Every road is a turnpike, on which all travelers must pay toll in cowries.

The road from Whydah to Abomey showed Captain Burton a country thinly settled, falling into ruin, with more men than women or children, and with a population wretchedly poor. The reason for this is the singular tyranny of the King, who absolutely forbids his subjects to own any thing. They must not raise coffee, or sugar-cane, or rice, or tobacco; they can only raise ground-nuts enough for home consumption, none for exportation. A laborer must not alter his house, or wear European shoes, or employ a spittoon-holder, or carry an umbrella without special royal permission; he must not spread a counterpane over his bed, a privilege which is reserved for the princes; he must not use a chair at home; and if he chances to sit at table with a white man he dares not use a knife and fork. Only men of high influence at Agbome are permitted to whitewash their houses, and wooden doors are prohibited to all but the "upper ten." Near the capital, and wherever the King happens to sojourn, an absurd custom rigorously enforced actually puts a stop to all industry during half the hours of the day. Water is scarce, as we have already said. The King's wives and Amazon guards require a good deal of it, and their slaves have to carry it, generally from a distance and over public and much frequented roads. Now wherever these women appear, all the people at work or passing on the road must nimbly skip into the woods at one side so far as to be out of sight. To be seen by or to look at these women of the palace would provoke punishment. When Captain Burton contented himself with getting out of the way an old crone cried out, "He is a white man, and knows no better"—there being, it would seem, a prejudice of color in Dahomey as well as in other countries; and another asked, "Has he, then, no laws in his own land?"

After some days' travel Burton and his party reached Kana, a country residence of Gelele, and here, after sundry delays, and with much ceremony, they were presented to him "whose smile is life and whose frown is death." He proved to be a stout, tall, middle-aged, sombre-looking, copper-colored savage. Marshaled by "Silver-Bells-and-Giraffe-Horn," the royal usher, the British Ambassador entered the palace gate, having first closed his umbrella and taken off his sword.

Dahome-Dada—the grandfather of Dahomey, as Gelele is called—Captain Burton shall describe in his own language. He is in the full vigor of life, from forty to forty-five, before the days of increasing belly and decreasing leg. He looks like a king of negro men, without tenderness of heart or weakness of head. His person is athletic, upward of six feet high, lithe, agile, thin-flanked and broad-shouldered, with muscular limbs, well-turned wrists, and neat ankles, “but a distinctly cucumber-shaped shin.” His skull is rounded and well set on; the organs of locality stand prominently out; a slight baldness appears upon the poll, and the regions of “cautiousness” are covered by two cockade-like tufts of hair, mostly worn in Dahomey to suspend coral, popo-beads, and brass or silver ornaments from. His hair, generally close-shaven, is of the pepper-corn variety; his beard thin, eyebrows scant, and mustaches few. The smile is pleasant, though a heavy jaw makes the face “jowly.” His finger-nails are as long as a Chinese mandarin’s. His eyes are red, bleared, and inflamed; his teeth white and sound; the lips sub-tumid; and the nose, that most telling organ of character, is “distinctly retroussé, looking as if all the lines had been turned the wrong way.” He is marked with the small-pox, and also bears certain tattooed lines in the face. In complexion he is reddish-brown, several shades lighter than the lightest to be seen at his court.

Gelele wore on this occasion a short cylindrical straw-hat, with a purple ribbon. A human tooth also ornamented the hat, and a single bead was hung about his neck. On his arms were six iron bracelets, intended to enable the arm to fend off a sabre-cut at the head. He wore short drawers of purple flowered silk, and a body-cloth of fine white stuff. He was smoking a pipe, and the throne was surrounded by a crowd of unarmed women. These were the King’s wives; the Amazons kept guard beyond. The women were engaged in waiting assiduously upon their lord and master. If he wished to spit, they held out a plated spittoon; if he perspired, they cooled, and fanned, and wiped the royal brow; if he sneezed, they all devoutly blessed themselves and him.

Gelele came down from his throne and shook hands with Burton in the English way. Rum and wines were next produced. Conversation was begun in the most roundabout way, for red-tape is honored also in Dahomey. No one, not even an ambassador, must speak directly with the King. He communicates with the Chamberlain, who speaks to the interpreter, who translates to the person having audience; and the reply passes to the monarch through the same channels. The health of the King and of Captain Burton was drunk in three different kinds of liquor; the King turning his face from the company, and having his head concealed by a muslin curtain while he imbibed. While this was done the women cowered on the ground with averted faces, bawling out “Po-o-o!”—“Take it easy!”—and a salute was fired. They do not burn powder, however, every time the King opens a new bottle of rum.

And then the audience was over, and the Ambassador retired, with leave to inspect every thing in the palace inclosure. He found the women soldiers ranged in an inner circle, the armed men without; and a battalion of young girls, lately formed, were the King’s especial body-guard. These girls wore armless vests, a kind of petticoat of bright colors, a cartridge-box and belt of black leather containing powder receptacles like match-boxes, a bullet-bag, and a musket of English make, in very tolerable order and effective.

Among the ornaments, or trophies, of the palace displayed in the inner court were three prepared skulls neatly mounted, and one so arranged as to serve for a drinking-cup. One of these heads had been the property of one Akia’on, an unlucky braggart of a chief, who, when Gezo, Gelele’s father, died, was so imprudent as to send a message to Abomey that all men were now truly joyful, for that the sea had dried up, and the world had now seen the bottom of Dahomey. To which Gelele’s reply was an attack in which the boaster was killed. His head, when properly cleaned and silver-mounted, was, with grim humor, placed in a miniature ship, to signify that there is still water enough to float it in Dahomey.

And here it is time to say something farther of the manners and customs of this black kingdom. The King is supreme lord over the lives and property of all his subjects. There is absolutely no rank between the monarch and the slave; all are his; and it is even a crime to wound one of the King’s subjects—not against the laws, or against the person injured, but against the King’s majesty, which is hurt in its property. In the royal presence all alike lie prostrate, or, to rest themselves, stand up on all-fours. The King is spoken of as “The Spirit.” When he calls, the messenger cries, “The Spirit wants you;” when he has spoken, all present exclaim, “The Spirit speaks true.” Nevertheless obedience is not the rule. The servants say, “Yes, yes,” but do as they please; and the nobles, humble as they are in the King’s presence, are a formidable power, whom he must conciliate.

The Amazons take precedence of the male soldiers. Yet Burton remarks, despite this unwonted honor to their sex, these warriors insist upon calling themselves men; and here, as elsewhere in lands where Amazons are unknown, it is an insult to call a soldier a woman. In Dahomey the whole people are soldiers. Here alone the sovereign has succeeded in drawing to his army nearly every person strong enough to carry a musket. The Amazons are, or are supposed to be, vestals; by a fiction they are called the King’s wives; and it is a capital crime to court them, as well as for one of them to suffer herself to be courted. The army, both male and female, is divided into the right and left wings, so called from their position about the throne. The women have officers of the same grade as their male fellow-soldiers. In battle they are known to be the most valorous and desperate, especially in attacking a fortified position. The commander-in-chief of the male soldiers is also the royal executioner, whose duty it is not only to lead in battle, but to cut off heads in Abomey on sacrificial and other occasions. But all Dahomeyan officials are in pairs; and the mingan or captain-general has a double, as has also the she-mingan.

At the Dahomeyan court every man must have at least one mother. It need not be his own. Here men adopt a mother as in other countries women may adopt a son; and it is not even necessary that this red-tape mother should be older than her son by adoption. She may be a score of years younger. The King's actual, real, true mother is yet alive; when she dies Gelele will select one in her place. Many high officers of aristocratic tastes have two such mothers, one for the last reign and another for the present. Visitors to the capital communicate with the "mothers" of their several nations, and Captain Burton makes frequent mention of the "English mother." In order to obtain a regular supply of water he was forced to engage four "water-mothers"—women who peddle water about the streets.

Burton reduces some of the exaggerated travelers' tales regarding the number and power of the Dahomeyan army. The Amazons do not number more than 2500, of whom but 1700 are fully armed. These creatures are ugly, many of them old and ill-tempered. They are certainly brave, and in battle fiercely strive to do more valorously than the men. The corps is reinforced from the daughters of the land. Before a girl can marry she is shown to the King; if he likes her looks she is enlisted as a soldier, and that is an end of the proposed match. They are in size larger than the men, more able to endure fatigue, Burton thinks, more muscular, and in every way fit food for powder. They are called the King's wives; but they are, we are told, often unfaithful to their compelled vows. When our traveler left Kana the King remained to adjudicate upon 150 cases of pregnancy in his corps of Amazons. It would seem that discipline had been somewhat lax of late.

He arrived, at last, at Agbome, the capital. It is, like other towns in this savage land, a rude and filthy collection of huts, "shanties," and houses. Life is not more comfortable there than at other points in Gelele's dominions; the water is not more abundant, nor the rum better, the people cleaner, or life more secure. In truth Dahomey is altogether a dirty, petty, murderous, half-starved, and benighted kingdom, neither useful nor ornamental, with an assassin for ruler, and a few thousands of slavish and blood-thirsty wretches for a nation.

On arriving at Agbome Burton witnessed, in part, the celebrated "Customs," the annual rites of murder; and he tells us that even these are both less horrible in manner and less grand in detail than we had been led to suppose by previous travelers. They are of two kinds—the "Grand Customs" which take place only after the death of a king, on which occasions perhaps one thousand people are killed; and the "Yearly Customs," when not above five hundred men suffer death. The yearly customs are of two kinds—the So-Sin, which Burton witnessed, and which are held at the capital; and the O-Sin Customs, which are celebrated in the forest. But all are much alike, and the principal features of all three are drinking, dancing, the distribution of cowries, and murder. The troops are paraded and addressed; the King administers justice after his fashion; there are speeches in which the nation is urged to march against its hereditary enemy, the Abbeokutans; the ceremony lasts five days and nights; and the executions even do not suffice to rescue it from the last degree of dullness—for the victims, so far from being distressed, actually appear to enjoy the prospect of having their heads cut off—being perhaps glad to be relieved, on any terms, of the miseries of life at Agbome. Burton, who was instructed not to witness the executions, nevertheless saw the wretches set apart for death. Forty of them were ranged on large stools, bound to posts, the legs, ankles, and wrists being securely fastened. They wore a peculiar dress, and amused themselves by remarks upon the British Ambassador, the music, and the people passing. Indeed they seemed to regard themselves rather as spectators than as actors or sufferers.

Burton saw also some of these men after they had been killed; and in the engraving on the next page he has depicted these royal victims, alive and dead. Heads lying in the road as he walked out in the morning were not infrequent. So-Sin means literally horse-tie; and the name comes from a peculiar license during the five days the "Custom" lasts, when all horses may be taken from their owners and tied up, to be redeemed only with bags of cowries—the circulating medium of the country.

Why all this slaughter, does the reader ask? It is after all only a matter of convenience to the King and the royal family. In the first place, it would not be fit for a ruler of Dahomey to appear in the other world unattended; therefore a thousand or two of his subjects and captives must be slain when he dies, to accompany him to Hades. But when he gets to his last destination it is shrewdly believed in Dahomey that his interest in the affairs of the kingdom does not cease. He is anxious for news, and as there are no spiritual gazettes in Africa, this intelligence can only reach him by couriers, who are dispatched—in a double sense—once a year, and oftener if important occasions arise, such as the visit of a British ambassador, or an attack on Abbeokuta. This, according to Burton, is the true theory of the Dahomeyan "Customs"—it is a kind of spiritual post-office system; the difficulty appears to be that there is no return mail.

Altogether, Dahomey is a preposterous humbug. The nation is growing weaker every year by reason of the tyranny of the ruler, who claims all the young women, and suffers neither trade nor agriculture to go on uninterrupted. The King is a mere useless and brutal savage, pretentious, dirty, poor, and blood-thirsty. The famous Amazons are neither good-looking, virtuous, well-disciplined, nor nearly so numerous as had been reported; and the kingdom appears to be a most uninviting region, which neither nature nor art has made fit for human residence.

Finally, if, after this account of Dahomey, any reader has a fancy to visit Gelele, he can enjoy the pleasure of a journey from Whydah to Agbome and back, with two months' sojourn at the capital, for the moderate cost of about eleven hundred dollars; and that the Reverend Peter Bernasko, missionary at Whydah, will be happy to accompany him, hire his servants, and provide for his other necessities, rendering a correct account of his expenses.

“THE DAY-DREAMS OF EARLIER YOUTH COME BACK—
COME BACK TO ME!”

IN THE AUTUMN TWILIGHT.

NEATH the blue billows sinks
The grand red orb of day.
A white sail showeth clear in the haze,
Far, far away.

A magnificent sunset sheds
Its beauty upon the sea;
The day-dreams of earlier youth come back—
Come back to me!

Set hath the glorious sphere,
And the silver horns slow rise
Of the moon, while softening into blue
The sun-glow dies.

But the spirit of Dawn shall streak
A golden thread in the gray,
Through the hanging masses of rose-colored cloud
Veiling her way.

And the heavy curtains of black
Fall off from the temple of Heaven,
In its majesty mocking the finite sight,
To Earth's sons given.

Is it thus that the unchained soul—
The conqueror in the fight—
With its weaklier casket of passionless clay,
Soareth to light?

Light! The light of unlimited worlds;
True light of an endless day;
Of that day which never knoweth a night—
Far, far away!

THE SPARCOTES.

I.

WHEN I was pursuing my studies at Cambridge, Massachusetts, many years ago, I used sometimes to be invited to dine in Boston with the Sparcote family.

The Sparcote family inhabited an old brick house, which at present (for I have not known Boston for twenty years) must be pretty far down town, though then rather central. It was a tolerably large, old-fashioned mansion, but very slenderly furnished, and the general style of things indicated a strict and methodical economy in the menage. The truth is, however, that the family was by no means in straitened circumstances, for it was said that old Deacon Sparcote, the head of the household, drove a very thriving business during the week, assisted by his only son, a young man of about twenty-five. The family being distantly related to me on Mrs. Sparcote's side, my father, who resided in New York, had strictly enjoined upon me the propriety of visiting these good folks, as he considered it his son's duty to know and cultivate all his New England relations, who were by no means few. The Deacon and his wife were thorough Bostonians, of the old-fashioned sort. Their fathers and grandfathers before them had been Bostonians, and the Deacon himself had a hereditary veneration for the New England

Athens and its traditions, amounting almost to idolatry. And his way of proving this veneration was by making himself one of the most mechanical of fixtures in it. He never went outside the city even for a day. A journey would have been a sort of dislocation of his entire status, and his methodical habits would have received such a jar from any such abnormal proceeding that he would not have recovered from it for a week.

Well, I used sometimes, obeying the code of social ethics, to accept the friendly invitations of the Sparcotes to dinner. I remember I was invited one cold day in the winter of 1838. The dinner took place at two precisely by the old South clock. The family consisted of the Deacon, Mrs. Sparcote, Mr. Junius Sparcote, and the three Misses Sparcote. The family kept up the queer old Puritan custom of eating the desert first, and the meat and vegetables last. Grace was said, and we sat down to roast beef, potatoes, and Indian pudding. After the pudding, it was a solemn sight to see the Deacon carve and serve the meat. He was a small, old, bald-headed gentleman, with a tolerably large nose, dull bluish eyes, and features somewhat out of drawing; which latter peculiarity was mildly repeated in the physiognomy of his son Junius. Junius, however, had his mother's bright black eyes, and a certain cheerful birdy expression, which made you less sensible to the absence of artistic arrangement in the rest of his features. The three daughters were vague feminine resemblances to their sire.

I can see the old gentleman now, as he rose, dressed in a baggy, black dress-coat, of not the newest make, and a loose, white neckcloth, above which protruded a large shirt-collar, and proceeded to sharpen the carving-knife and cut up the smoking beef. First he carefully turned back his long coat-cuffs, and then slowly carved the whole of the meat, before helping any body. This occupied about twenty minutes, amidst profound silence and expectation. The carving being ended, he proceeded to help himself, and then passed the dish round to his wife, whose duty it was to help the others. While the guest and family were being served, the Deacon, still standing, usually took from his coat-pocket a huge blue cotton handkerchief, and solemnly blew his large nose. And sometimes he turned round to the fire-place, into which, after indulging a while in the princely and old-fashioned sport of hawking, he solemnly expectorated. By the time he had finished these operations, the beef and potatoes had been dispensed by Mrs. Sparcote, and conversation had commenced. There was no wine nor ale, nor any drink but pure cold water. The conversation was in dribblets, its tone neither gay nor sad, but serious and dull. The topics were the weather, the east winds, the Thursday Lecture, the distinguished preachers of the day, genealogies, relationships, engagements, marriages, and deaths. Mr. Junius occasionally attempted a bird-like chirp in the way of jocose remark, with a timorous twinkle in his round black eyes; but there was little response or sympathy from the rest of the family. They were dull, dreary, and unprofitable seasons of feeding, these dinners at the Sparcotes'. The Deacon "returned thanks," the family rose and proceeded to the parlor, to shiver around a dull fire. The Deacon again blew his nose, put on his over-coat, and, followed by Mr. Junius, proceeded to his store. I was left alone in charge of the ladies.

The parlor where we sat to digest our dinner was rather dreary. We sat around a sulky fire, trying to coax a little warmth into our hands and feet, over two or three small round sappy sticks of wood, which were spitting at the ends, and trying hard to get up a blaze. Nor was the rest of the room more inviting. It was a large room, containing a few pieces of dark, old-fashioned furniture of the plainest pattern; scanty faded curtains and carpet; a centre-table, with a few moral and unexceptionable books; and some thumbled magazines a year or two old; no vases, no brackets, no busts or images; no piano, no pictures. The cold light of the snow outside coming through the high parlor windows, was repeated on the blank walls and whitish panels. The three Misses Sparcote took up their sewing or knitting, and the old lady sat looking into the fire. She seemed to be absent-minded and not particularly cheerful. Her thoughts, I soon found, were going back to other days—the days when she was younger, handsomer, and gayer than at present. The conversation was not animated. We had the weather again; then questions innumerable from the Misses Sparcote about myself, but which I could not avoid answering more or less fully. It is remarkable how inquisitive some spinster ladies, of a certain or uncertain age, are about the affairs of a young man with whom they insist on emphasizing the relationship, however distant this may be, and whom they take such a tender pleasure in cousining. They would call me cousin. But somehow I never could bring my lips to exchange the word. I shrank from their showers of interrogation. I should have preferred being treated more as a stranger. I wanted to be let alone a little. Mrs. Sparcote said little, but sat, as I said, looking into the sulky fire. But I soon discovered that she was thinking of me, just as the daughters were. She had a reason for it, too, which her daughters had not.

I had heard vaguely that, when a young woman, she had had tender feelings toward an uncle of mine, which, I was somehow led to infer, were not returned on his part farther than that of calm friendship. What passed I had not then heard definitely. It was certain that she married some years later the present Mr. Jeremiah Sparcote, then an active shrewd shop-keeper in Cornhill. Their married life had been sufficiently monotonous and prosaic. There had been little sympathy between them, and yet they had somehow grown to have the same ways, thoughts, and habits, as is most generally the case with old married people, no matter how unlike when they were young. But from out the dry pages of this prosaic life a picture of earlier romance was ere long to be discovered, and for all we know, that very day it may have been bedewed with tears, seen and known by no living soul. Oh, how many such a chapter of romance lies hidden and unsuspected in the lives of women, which, if hinted at to the world, would be received with a mocking laugh or an incredulous smile!

Mrs. Sparcote sat dreamily looking into the sulky fire, with a sigh now and then, and a glance at me. At last she said, in a low voice,

"Cousin Guy, how much you resemble your dear Uncle Joseph!"

Now, to confess the truth, I had never thought of this, and this statement on Mrs. Sparcote's part struck me rather oddly. Though I think I had no undue personal vanity, and though I entertained a certain respect for my Uncle Joseph (whom, by-the-way, I had never seen more than two or three times in the course of my life), yet it was difficult for me to bring my daguerreotype and his to the same stereoscopic focus in my mind's eye. What! I resemble Uncle Jo? What! that dried-up little old gentleman, toothless and wiggy, baggy-eyed and spectacled, with his bent back and his husky voice! I could hardly restrain a smile. Can it be, I thought, that I ever resembled him? I forgot that it was the Joseph Somers of thirty or forty years ago she was thinking. But I only said, "Do you think I look like Uncle Jo? But then it is many years since you have seen him, is it not?"

"Oh yes, many, many years. But, Cousin Guy, your uncle was a handsome man when I knew him. Every body said he was a handsome man. We don't often see such nowadays."

I almost involuntarily stole a glance into the mirror to see if my features had changed in any way. I satisfied myself that I was the same. Only the cold white snow light of that winter afternoon made chalk of my complexion. But I was by no means insensible to the compliment that I resembled my uncle as he was when young—for he was then a handsome man. Still it was difficult to imagine him young, spruce, and an Adonis.

I was too young a man—a college student merely, and withal somewhat diffident—and the relations between the Sparcotes and myself were not sufficiently sympathetic to allow of my putting forward any remarks or questions to Mrs. S. which could lead to any revelations on her part as to her acquaintance with my uncle in early life. Nor, I am now ashamed to say, was I enough interested in the affair to care much about having any chapter of romance—if any there were—revealed to me out of her younger days. I knew enough to see that she might have been in her youth very good looking, if not handsome. Her dark eyes still flashed occasionally with something of the soft fire they might once have had. I could see that much when at dinner her glance upbraided Mr. Jeremiah Sparcote's slow methodical and mechanical cutting up of the roast beef, and utter ignoring of the appetites of the family and of their guest; to say nothing of the deliberate blowing of Mr. Jeremiah Sparcote's nasal trumpet, and his old-fashioned ways of clearing his throat, which evidently disturbed her nerves not a little. And I may here notice, as a proof of Mr. Junius Sparcote's sensitiveness and tact, that it was during these solemn operations on the part of the diaconal head of the family, that the son attempted sometimes to cover the paternal eccentricities by his chirping attempts at jocosity on some subject quite foreign to carving-knives and noses. The young man's face seemed then less out of drawing; the round, black, birdy eyes sparkled almost handsomely, and the whole brow and features beamed with a benevolence truly Pickwickian.

But I digress from Mrs. Sparcote. I was saying that she had the remains of some beauty; and had the atmosphere of the old Sparcote house and family been more genial, I might have taken some pains to hunt up the chapter of romance alluded to. It came to my knowledge some few years later, but without any instrumentality of mine; as you shall hear.

II.

The Deacon died a few years ago, worth, they say, a million. He had driven close and hard bargains. He had invested safely, he had hoarded closely, and turned a penny occasionally by money lending. Manifold are the ways and means of a man born to make his fortune, and whose life is one unswerving purpose and aim toward money-getting.

During his whole life he was a constant attendant at the Rev. Dr. Cymball's church, where he held a conspicuous pew, and where he fulfilled for many years the diaconal functions, whatever those may be.

Here he listened many years with complacency to sermons which set up dead mummies and battered them down as if they were alive; condemning in the severest terms the Jews and heathen of old times for their sins and unbelief, and winding up with very vague applications of texts to the present time. And Mr. Sparcote often remarked, as he blew his nose at the end of the service, while the gay "voluntary" was disporting itself on the organ, that the Rev. Dr. Cymball always showed the most praiseworthy good taste and moderation, to say nothing of sound doctrine, in keeping to Scripture ground, avoiding dangerous applications of his text to the things and the people of to-day, and carefully steering clear of delicate political and social questions. The ministers of the Gospel, he used to say, have their sphere allotted to them. Their duty is to expound the sacred writings, and not to meddle with matters which belong not to the province of the pulpit. Theologically, socially, and politically, the statu quo was what the preacher was bound to maintain. The Deacon had a dread of "new views" and of heresy in all forms. Not that he could define what heresy was, or was not. He would sometimes listen to a sermon and, simple man that he was, never dream that it was not all sound as a nut, till some keen wiseacre assured him it was "transcendentalism" thinly disguised. Again he would be shocked at certain free or undignified expressions in the discourse of some clerical brother, strongly suspecting Fourierism, Rationalism, or Abolitionism, till instructed by some learned authority that it was all right and sound. He was not exactly a Light of the Church, and but an indifferent pair of snuffers when the light did not burn from good orthodox spermaceti; and it puzzled him often to distinguish ecclesiastical stearine from ecclesiastical candle-grease. But I believe he was, on the whole, a pattern Deacon. The world may have been too much with him during six days of the week, "getting" if not "spending," but he was punctual and regular on Sundays at his post. And when he died, the Doctor's colleague, the Rev. Mr. Brass, preached a very appropriate and commendatory funeral sermon.

His widow, whose health had for some years been delicate, did not long survive him. But I anticipate my story.

III.

I had left Cambridge, and had gone to settle in a small town in the State of New York, where I had become a junior editor in a weekly literary paper—a journal unknown to fame, and which stumped along on two crippled legs—dull contributors and dishonest subscribers.

One warm afternoon in July I was sitting in my little close editor's room, up five pair of stairs, writing and correcting proofs, when a considerably sized package was placed in my hands, accompanied by a letter from Miss Susan Blodgett.

But I must first tell who Miss Susan Blodgett was. Miss Susan Blodgett was neither young, nor handsome, nor rich. Therefore, young reader, don't imagine this to be a love-letter. Miss Susan was an old maiden lady, a friend of my mother's, and one of the plainest but best creatures that ever lived. She had told me about the Sparcotes, not long after I had made their acquaintance. She had known Mrs. S. when they were both young ladies in their teens. "Martha Bingham," she said, one day, "is not what she was when she and I were girls. She changed considerably after she married Jeremiah Sparcote—or rather, I might say, she changed afore she married him. He never was much—a little insignificant shop-keeper, sold tape and buttons, and warn't particularly smart other ways, except at making bargains. He knew how to make money and save it. Jeremiah never spent much money on his house and family, I can tell you. They lived very plain and frugal, though Jeremiah he was makin' money hand over hand, and hedn't ought to have kept his wife so poor. Jeremiah, you see, he didn't care for little nice things, and kind o' despised any thing like luxuries. Gracious me! I can remember how Martha used to have to argue at him to get a new dress or a bunnet. But Martha, she had been used to a different sort of life rather. Her father and mother warn't rich, but they used to indulge her and give her all sorts of things she fancied. What a pity they didn't give her her heart's own fancy! I mean, she'd ought to have married your uncle, Joseph Somers. But they all set themselves against that match—her father and mother and all her relations—and she, poor girl, hadn't any peace till she broke off the engagement. I can tell you it cut her up terribly. But some years after she was prevailed upon to marry Jeremiah."

"But Aunt Susan" (I always called her aunt though she was not related to me), "why was the engagement broken off?"

"Oh, you see, your uncle he hadn't any money, and no business, and kind o' followed this thing and that thing; tried painting in oils and sculptur, and dabbled in music, and wrote for the papers, and warn't fixed at any thing in particular; and so as Martha was poor, and he was poor, they made her break off the match. Your uncle went off, the Lord knows where, and by-and-by he married your Aunt Polly—she was a Dalton of Neponset, and a nice little woman she was. She had some money, so your Uncle Joseph was made comfortable, and they went off to Europe, and there she died, poor thing! and your uncle came home very much changed. Oh dear me! How we all must change! Young folks are young folks, and old folks are old folks. But now you must excuse me, Cousin Guy, for I must see after my marmalades and pumpkin pies. You will dine with us to-morrow?"

This conversation took place some time before I left Boston for New York. I had begun to take an interest in this chapter of romance in Mrs. Sparcote's early life, and had frequently questioned Aunt Susan about it, but never heard much more on the subject than the brief account I have given. It seems, however, that after the venerable Jeremiah had written down the last cipher of his life in the great account-book, Aunt Susan had often had long talks with Mrs. Sparcote, and she had touched on this tender subject more than once with great feeling, showing how deep and strong her early attachment had been. Aunt Susan had mentioned the interest I took in it, and this led the widow to take a still stronger interest in me—an interest several times expressed in affectionate messages sent in letters I had received from Aunt Susan. I had been informed also of her failing health, and had sometimes had half a mind to go to Boston to see her; but my business did not permit me to leave the town where I resided.

I was therefore a good deal touched at receiving the letter above spoken of, from Aunt Susan, on that warm July afternoon in the midst of my editorial scrawlings, informing me of Mrs. Sparcote's death, and that she had left me a legacy. Surely I had never deserved any such instance of generosity and affectionate remembrance as this. I began to feel that I had never done her justice—that I had never improved the opportunities I had had of knowing her better and understanding her. I reproached myself that I had laughed at the Deacon's dinners after having eaten of them; that I had amused myself and perhaps my friends at the expense of Mr. Jeremiah and his son Junius; that I had with such a stony heart resisted the endeavors of the three Misses Sparcote to make a cousin of me; and, above all, that I had not responded more cordially to the evident liking their excellent mother had shown toward me. And now that this good lady had thought so much of me as to leave me a substantial token of her affection—to tell the truth, I was touched to tears. Aunt Susan's letter told me that in her last days she had often spoken of me, and of the striking likeness I bore to my uncle when he was of my age. She had said that she wished she had seen more of me, but that I did not seem to be of a very social nature.

"Shortly before she died," wrote Aunt Susan, "she called me to her bedside and said she had a favor to ask of me. At her request I took out of a secret drawer in her desk a packet of old letters, yellowed by time, and tied up with a faded rose-colored ribbon. In this package was a miniature of a young man in an old-fashioned dress, a locket containing a lock of brown, soft curly hair, and a folded paper with the remains of what had been a rose. 'These,' she said, 'are Joseph Somers's letters to me more than forty years ago. That is his likeness—that a lock of his hair—and this faded rose was his last gift at parting. I have never seen him since. I am sure he has often thought of me since those days; but he can never have loved as I have. I could not bear to give up these treasures. Now I wish you to send them to Mr. Guy Milford, with the request that he will see that they are returned to his Uncle Joseph. And say to Cousin Guy,' she added, 'that, if he thinks it worth his while to peruse such records of the early romance of an old lady, who, when he reads them, will be no more, he is at liberty to do so.' I told her," said Aunt Susan, "that I should fulfill her request to the letter; and here, Cousin Guy, you have the long locked-up aroma of Martha Bingham's early love. The letters will tell you more than I could about it. I am sure you will read them with interest—I dare say you will be surprised to discover such materials for a poem or a magazine story in the Sparcote family. Take good care of the letters, but don't return them to your uncle till I come to —; which will be soon, and then we will look over them together."

The legacy left me by Mrs. Sparcote was the sum of $1000. Such a sum was never so welcome as then, for I really needed it. Surely, I said, whatever peculiarities the Sparcote family possessed, I shall always speak well of her.

With a hurried hand I corrected my last proofs, and hastened home with the precious packet of letters, the miniature, the locket, and the faded rose. I needed to look them over in the solitude of my chamber. There I took out these interesting relics one by one, carefully and reverentially. The last rays of the setting sun shone in upon them, and I pored over them till deep in the summer twilight. The rose was almost colorless, but a faint fragrance came from the paper which enveloped it. The lock of hair was somewhat of the color of mine, but its texture was finer. The picture was a miniature beautifully painted, apparently by Malbone. I wondered how my uncle had contrived to pay for it; but Aunt Susan supposed that he painted a landscape in exchange for it; for Uncle Joseph had attained to some proficiency in painting, and still in his old age had beguiled at his easel many a lonely hour. I could see that there was a resemblance to myself, though by no means so strong as Mrs. Sparcote had imagined.

And the letters? They were letters of his and of hers tied up two by two, like man and wife, with small ribbons, all of rose-color. It seems that my uncle had returned hers when he married my Aunt Polly. But she had always kept his. Was she, therefore, untrue to Jeremiah? Had she not told him she had but the wreck—the storm-tossed, drifting wreck of a heart to give him; while he, a cold, calculating, matter-of-fact trader, had bought it as he might have bought a poor wrecked and dismayed vessel, thinking he might still fit it up safely and comfortably for the voyage of married life? And did not these two make this voyage together, and was she not true to him to the end? Forgive her then, ye idolaters of old-school matrimonial moralism—forgive her this one fault—this only secret kept from her husband—the hidden letters between her and her first and only love. Forgive her that she consented to all sacrifices but this—the relinquishing the possession and sight of this little island, rich with tropical verdure and odors, in the dull monotonous ocean of her life. There are women who outgrow their first love, or who at least bury it under the burdens or the flowery pleasures of life. There are women, noble women too, who develop through maternity, or through engrossing family cares, or through intellectual studies, to that point that their earlier passion has become only “love’s young dream.” Mrs. Sparcote had gone through all the duties of married and maternal life like a true woman, and had done her duty to the best of her ability. But she was not one of those gifted women who go on developing. She was too prone to live in the past. She had the weakness to keep these records of her romantic days, and to take a sentimental pleasure in poring over them from time to time, and going back on the wings of memory to her little flowery island. Had she been of an intellectual turn—a femme spirituelle—she might have written poetry. But there was no such outlet for the imprisoned soul. No such refreshing spring gushed up in her desert of commonplaces. She pined in thought. There was a strong tinge of melancholy in her composition. This did not make her interesting in her social relations, but lent rather a querulous, complaining tone to her conversation; in which, by-the-way, she did not shine, being taciturn by nature.

No one would have suspected that Mrs. Sparcote—who, from habit, and from long acquaintance and daily proximity with Jeremiah, had, in spite of herself, adopted his ways and many of his habits—had ever been another person than what she was. She perhaps hardly knew herself to be the same woman as the young Martha Bingham. The book of her life was like a palimpsest: underneath the dry and commonplace record of her married life there lay what was once an illuminated missal of love, whose existence few eyes could detect. The faded characters came out fresh and strong as the day of her death drew near.

I will not publish these letters in full, but will give you a brief review of them. The old-fashioned and somewhat formal style which characterized the epistles of our parents and grandparents struck me at first. But one could see that they were genuine, hearty, and deep.

Her lover sometimes writes under the signature of Corydon, and she answers, signing herself Sylvia. He calls himself her “devoted swain,” and writes: “From the happy day I first beheld you I can truly say, my Sylvia, that I have never for a single hour been insensible to your charms. I had approached other shrines of beauty, but have never worshiped but at one. Ah! how often in my solitude, when hope of success in making my worldly fortune seemed almost to abandon me, have I turned my thoughts to you, and your lovely image and winning smile have lit my little chamber with a light no other thought or memory could bring. Believe me, it is to you, Sylvia, that I owe more rapture

‘When to the sessions of sweet silent thought,
I summon up remembrance of the past’ than has ever come from intercourse with my nearest and dearest friends. But alas! Sylvia, I fear I have but few of these. You are all in all to me.”

A slight jealousy on her part seems to have arisen during a period of their acquaintance. “I learn,” she writes, “from a source on which my fears whisper that I may rely, that of late other eyes than mine have bewitched Corydon away from his oft-declared devotion to his Sylvia. Cruel charmer! Can it indeed be true? No—I will not, can not believe him false to, or even for a time forgetful of, one to whom he has so often whispered vows of his ardent attachment.”

And he replies: “Your better judgment, my Sylvia, prompted you aright when you wrote that you could not persuade yourself that I was false or forgetful. No, believe me, I am no gay deceiver, no faithless swain. Your image, and the possession of the sweet assurance that I am honored with your affection and the promise of your hand, must effectually dispel whatever en-chantments others may have spread in my path. For the future then, Sylvia, it is best always to rely on your sober second-thought when your lively fancy leads you into suspicions, which, while they flatter your lover's vanity, do injustice to the confidence you should repose in him."

This calm current of love does not long run smooth. The correspondence becomes agitated, apprehensive, tearful, passionate. Why need I hold up to the world these blood-warm passages, these burning words, which, toward the last, spurn and overleap the fetters of conventional style, and pour themselves out in language true to all times and persons? Those of my readers who have loved with passion may draw from their own memories, and those who have not from their imaginations, and supply the hiatus I shrink from filling up from these records of the heart.

It is but the old story over again—old, and yet so living, so true, so all-engrossing in each separate individual experience, that within that charmed circle the entire world seems to exist anew, or to perish anew, for every lover!

So Joseph and Martha were parted. The correspondence closes. The tragedy is over. The curtain drops. They meet once more, only to say farewell—and that in the presence of her father and mother, who thought they were so lucky in closing their doors on the poor shiftless artist, Mr. Joseph, and opening them to the successful shop-keeper, Mr. Jeremiah. She was not allowed by her parents to give her lover any souvenir at parting, nor to receive any thing but the rose, whose colorless petals now lay on my table. The miniature was delivered to her secretly by a trusty messenger, and this she contrived to keep.

IV.

It is barely possible that some of my young readers may have been enough interested in my simple story to ask for information concerning my uncle, Joseph Somers. How was he affected by Mrs. Sparcote's death? Were his declining years still tinged by lingering golden rays from that sunken sun of his young love? Or was it only a dream of the past, quietly shimmering over him, breathing through his thoughts now and then, like some faint breeze from some rose-garden, or a field of new-mown hay—and now and then lending a gentle aroma to his verses or his pictures—that is, if he still indulged his youthful tastes in that direction? Was he only a Goethe in a small way—a utilitarian philosopher seeking for an Argand chimney in which to consume fragrantly his own smoke; or turning the wild rapids of youthful passion over the mill-wheels of verse, at once solacing himself and benefiting the monthly magazines?

I am afraid I must disappoint my young readers. Perhaps I might compare my venerable uncle to a cactus, which bloomed once, and superbly, long ago, but whose dry and juiceless stem all the wooing airs of heaven, and suns of spring and summer, coax and flatter in vain for the remotest reappearance of that early blossoming. But enough of metaphors. The truth is, he was considerably more than a cactus. I found my uncle a quiet, respectable, bright, kind-hearted, and clean-shaven old gentleman, living in a small frame-house in the village of Aristides, Hannibal County, all alone, with the exception of an old black couple, who were his coachman, gardener, cook, and servitors in general, and who had been old servants in his wife's family. He was living in a comfortable, plain way, with a pretty well-stocked library and a few choice pictures about him, devoting a good deal of time to reading, attending to his garden, with occasional making of verses, or agricultural paragraphs for the Aristides Times. He had given up painting since a visit he had made once to New York, where he saw some of the best works of the younger artists. He lived a rather secluded life, seemed to have no intimate friends, seldom went to church, town-meeting, or lecture, and was looked upon by the country people (country people all have one cut-and-dried way of looking upon people and things) as rather an eccentric old gentleman. He took, however, the New York Republican papers, was charitable to the poor, and was always quoted as a good citizen, patriot, and neighbor, though he did not enter actively into politics. Soon after my arrival at his house, where I received a cordial welcome, I delivered into his hands the precious relics intrusted to me by the deceased Mrs. Sparcote. I ought to say, however, that I had previously written to him, informing him of the circumstances which led to their being in my possession, and of my intention to make him a visit, when I should deliver them in person. Being somewhat fatigued with my journey, I bade my uncle an early good-night, at the same time placing in his hands the precious package.

The next morning the only differences I could detect in his appearance were a weary look as if he had sat up late, a certain serious tenderness in his manner, and a more cordial smile and pressure of the hand, as he said good-morning. A sort of mute sympathy seemed to be established between us. There was no allusion—as why should there have been?—to the letters, or to the deceased Sparcotes. But I overheard old Sarah the servant, in the course of the day say, "Massa Jo hab nebber burn so much lamp-oil out dat lamp of his'n as dis las' night. Spec' he was wide awake as a June bug! 'Deed I tink I heard him once or twice walkin' backward and forred up stairs. Wonder wat's de matter wid Massa Jo?"

At breakfast my uncle was, perhaps, a little more silent and distract than usual; but soon after he seemed the same as ever. How little does the outward indicate the inward man! Young people usually expect to see in great men some ideal of their own creation. General Washington mustn't scold his negroes. Tennyson mustn't talk of horses, cows, and 7 per cent. Nor can they understand how those who have imagined, felt, or suffered much can wear an everyday mask. But I saw in my uncle a man who, though his earlier hopes and dreams were blighted, had, by a life of intellectual activity, cultivated a garden of fruits and blossoms on soil once rent by an earthquake chasm. He looked more before than after. After all, the movement cure is the great cure for sorrow and blight. Therefore Joseph Somers lived on to all appearance a well, cheerful old man, and by occupation and work, and by keeping his spiritual windows clear of dust and cobwebs, made for himself a perpetual oasis in a desert.

Good, dear Uncle Somers! He was my mother's favorite brother, as I found from expressions of tenderness which escaped him now and then. But my mother died when I was a boy, and she never said much to me of her brother Joseph. But I know now that her death was as stunning a blow, in its way, to him as his separation from his Martha. But these were private griefs. The world knew not of them. Nor was the loss of his wife a small bereavement. Though not his first love she was most dear to him, and they had many thoughts, feelings, and tastes in common. And he drooped visibly, they say, after she was taken from him.

Dear Uncle Joseph, you too have now crossed the dark stream, and have long since met your dear ones in the great Land of Light! I often wish I had known you earlier, and had seen you oftener. But I shall never forget you. Aunt Susan Blodgell and I—Aunt Susan is a very old lady now, and I have to talk very loud to make her hear me; but she and I will often talk of you, and of your Martha, till I shall see you both in imagination, radiant in youth and beauty, and united in a home where all friends and lovers who belong to one another shall meet with no dark earthly fate stepping between them.

THE BALLAD OF ISHMAEL DAY.

ONE summer morning a daring band
Of rebels rode into Maryland—
Over the prosperous, peaceful farms
Sending terror and strange alarms,
The clatter of hoofs and the clang of arms.

Fresh from the South, where the hungry pine,
They ate like Pharaoh's starving kine;
They swept the land like devouring surge,
And left their path, to its furthest verge,
Bare as the track of the locust-scurge.

"The rebels are coming!" far and near Rang the tidings of dread and fear;
Some paled, and cowered, and sought to hide—
Some stood erect in their fearless pride—
And women shuddered and children cried.

But others—vipers in human form,
Stinging the bosom that kept them warm—
Welcomed with triumph the thievish band,
Hurried to offer the friendly hand,
As the rebels rode into Maryland:

Made them merry with food and wine,
Glad them in garments rich and fine,
For rags and hunger to make amends;
Flattered them, praised them, with selfish ends;—
"Leave us scathless, for we are friends!"

Could traitors trust to a traitor? No!
Little they favored friend or foe,
But gathered the cattle the farms across,
Flinging back, with a scornful toss—
"If ye are friends ye can bear the loss!"

Flushed with triumph, and wine, and prey,
They neared the dwelling of Ishmael Day;
A sturdy veteran, gray and old,
With heart of a patriot, firm and bold,
Strong and steadfast—unbribed, unsold.

And Ishmael Day, his brave head bare,
His white locks tossed by the morning air,
Fearless of danger, or death, or scars,
Went out to raise, by the farm-yard bars,
The dear old flag of the Stripes and Stars.

Proudly, steadily up it flew,
Gorgeous with crimson and white and blue!
His withered hand, as he shook it freer,
May have trembled, but not with fear,
While, shouting, the rebels drew more near.

"Halt!"—They had seen the hated sign
Floating free from old Ishmael's line—
"Lower that rag!" was their wrathful cry.
"Never!" rung Ishmael Day's reply;
"Fire, if it please you—I can but die!"

One, with a loud defiant laugh,
Left his comrades and neared the staff.
"Down!"—came the fearless patriot's cry—
"Dare to lower that flag, and die!
One must bleed for it—you or I!"

But caring not for the stern command,
He drew the halliards with daring hand;
Ping! went the rifle-ball—down he came
Under the flag he had tried to shame—
Old Ishmael Day took careful aim!

Seventy winters and three had shed
Their snowy glories on Ishmael's head;
But though cheeks may wither and locks grow gray,
His fame shall be fresh and young away—
Honor be to old Ishmael Day!

JOHN JACOB ASTOR.

IN the hall of the Astor Library, on the sides of two of the pillars supporting its lofty roof of glass, are two little shelves each holding a single work, never taken down and seldom perused, but nevertheless well worthy the attention of those who are curious in the subject of which they treat, namely, the human face divine. They are two marble busts, facing each other; one of the founder of the Library, the other of its first president, Washington Irving. A finer study in physiognomy than these two busts present can nowhere be found; for never were two men more unlike than Astor and Irving, and never were character and personal history more legibly recorded than in these portraits in marble. The countenance of the author is round, full, and handsome, the hair inclining to curl, and the chin to double. It is the face of a happy and genial man, formed to shine at the fireside and to beam from the head of a table. It is an open, candid, liberal, hospitable countenance, indicating far more power to please than to compel, but displaying in the position and carriage of the head much of that dignity which we are accustomed to call Roman. The face of the millionaire, on the contrary, is all strength; every line in it tells of concentration and power. The hair is straight and strong; the forehead neither lofty nor ample, but powerfully developed in the perceptive and executive organs; the eyes deeper set in the head than those of Daniel Webster, and overhung with immense bushy eyebrows; the nose large, long, and strongly arched, the veritable nose of a man-compeller; the mouth, chin, and jaws all denoting firmness and force; the chest, that seat and throne of physical power, is broad and deep, and the back of the neck has something of the muscular fullness which we observe in the prize-fighter and the bull; the head behind the ears showing enough of propelling power, but almost totally wanting in the passionnal propensities which waste the force of the faculties, and divert the man from his principal object. As the spectator stands midway between the two busts, at some distance from both, Irving has the larger and the kinglier air, and the face of Astor seems small and set. It is only when you get close to the bust of Astor, observing the strength of each feature and its perfect proportion to the rest—force every where, superfluity nowhere—that you recognize the monarch of the counting-room; the brain which nothing could confuse or disconcert, the purpose that nothing could divert or defeat; the man who could with ease and pleasure grasp and control the multitudinous concerns of a business that embraced the habited and the unhabited globe—that employed ships in every sea, and men in every clime, and brought in to the coffers of the merchant the revenue of a king. That speechless bust tells us how it was that this man, from suffering in his father's poverty-stricken house the habitual pang of hunger, arrived at the greatest fortune, perhaps, ever accumulated in a single lifetime; you perceive that whatever thing this strong and compact man set himself to do, he would be certain to achieve unless stopped by something as powerful as a law of nature.

The monument of these two gifted men is the airy and graceful interior of which their busts are the only ornament. Astor founded the Library, but it was probably his regard for Irving that induced him to appropriate part of his wealth for a purpose not in harmony with his own humor. Irving is known to us all, as only wits and poets are ever known. But of the singular being who possessed so remarkable a genius for accumulation, of which this Library is one of the results, little has been imparted to the public, and of that little the greater part is fabulous.

A hundred years ago, in the poor little village of Waldorf, in the duchy of Baden, lived a jovial, good-for-nothing butcher, named Jacob Astor, who felt himself much more at home in the beer-house than at the fireside of his own house in the principal street of the village. At the best, the butcher of Waldorf must have been a poor man; for, at that day, the inhabitants of a German village enjoyed the luxury of fresh meat only on great days, such as those of confirmation, baptism, weddings, and Christmas. The village itself was remote and insignificant, and though situated in the valley of the Rhine, the native home of the vine, a region of proverbial fertility, the immediate vicinity of Waldorf was not a rich or very populous country. The home of Jacob Astor, therefore, seldom knew any medium between excessive abundance and extreme scarcity, and he was not the man to make the superfluity of to-day provide for the need of to-morrow, which was the more unfortunate as the periods of abundance were few and far between, and the times of scarcity extended over the greater part of the year. It was the custom then in Germany for every farmer to provide a fatted pig, calf, or bullock against the time of harvest; and as that joyful season approached the village butcher went the round of the neighborhood, stopping a day or two at each house to kill the animals and convert their flesh into bacon, sausages, or salt beef. During this happy time Jacob Astor, a merry dog, always welcome where pleasure and hilarity were going forward, had enough to drink, and his family had enough to eat. But the merry time lasted only six weeks. Then set in the season of scarcity, which was only relieved when there was a festival of the church, a wedding, a christening, or a birthday in some family of the village rich enough to provide an animal for Jacob's knife. The wife of this idle and improvident butcher was such a wife as such men usually contrive to pick up—industrious, saving, and capable; the main-stay of his house. Often she remonstrated with her wasteful and beer-loving husband; the domestic sky was often overcast, and the children were glad to fly from the noise and dust of the tempest.

This roistering village butcher and his worthy, much-enduring wife were the parents of our millionaire. They had four sons: George Peter Astor, born in 1752; Henry Astor, born in 1754; John Melchior Astor, born in 1759; and John Jacob Astor, born July 17, 1763. Each of these sons made haste to fly from the privations and contentions of their home as soon as they were old enough; and, what is more remarkable, each of them had a cast of character precisely the opposite of their thriftless father. They were all saving, industrious, temperate, and enterprising, and all of them became prosperous men at an early period of their career. They were all duly instructed in their father's trade; each in turn carried about the streets of Waldorf the basket of meat, and accompanied the father in his harvest slaughtering tours. Jovial Jacob, we are told, gloried in being a butcher, but three of his sons, much to his disgust, manifested a repugnance to it, which was one of the causes of their flight from the parental nest. The eldest, who was the first to go, made his way to London, where an uncle was established in business as a maker of musical instruments. Astor and Broadwood was the name of the firm, a house that still exists under the title of Broadwood and Co., one of the most noted makers of pianos in England. In his uncle's manufactory George Astor served an apprenticeship, and became at length a partner in the firm. Henry Astor went next. He alone of his father's sons took to his father's trade. It used to be thrown in his teeth, when he was a thriving butcher in the city of New York, that he had come over to America as a private in the Hessian army. This may only have been the groundless taunt of an envious rival. It is certain, however, that he was a butcher in New York when it was a British post during the revolutionary war, and, remaining after the evacuation, made a very large fortune in his business. The third son, John Melchior Astor, found employment in Germany, and arrived, at length, at the profitable post of steward to a nobleman's estate.

Abandoned thus by his three brothers, John Jacob Astor had to endure for some years a most cheerless and miserable lot. He lost his mother, too, from whom he had derived all that was good in his character and most of the happiness of his childhood. A step-mother replaced her, "who loved not Jacob," nor John Jacob. The father, still devoted to pleasure, quarreled so bitterly with his new wife, that his son was often glad to escape to the house of a school-fellow (living in 1854), where he would pass the night in a garret or outhouse, thankfully accepting for his supper a crust of dry bread, and returning the next morning to assist in the slaughter-house or carry out the meat. It was not often that he had enough to eat; his clothes were of the poorest description; and, as to money, he absolutely had none of it. The unhappiness of his home and the misconduct of his father made him ashamed to join in the sports of the village boys; and he passed much of his leisure alone, brooding over the unhappiness of his lot. The family increased, but not its income. It is recorded of him that he tended his little sisters with care and fondness, and sought in all ways to lessen the dislike and ill-humor of his step-mother.

It is not hardship, however, that enervates a lad. It is indulgence and luxury that do that. He grew a stout, healthy, tough, and patient boy, diligent and skillful in the discharge of his duty, often supplying the place of his father absent in merry-making. If, in later life, he overvalued money, it should not be forgotten that few men have had a harder experience of the want of money at the age when character is forming.

The bitterest lot has its alleviations. Sometimes a letter would reach him from over the sea, telling of the good fortune of a brother in a distant land. In his old age he used to boast that in his boyhood he walked forty-five miles in one day for the sole purpose of getting a letter that had arrived from England or America. The Astors have always been noted for the strength of their family affection. Our millionaire forgot much that he ought to have remembered, but he was not remiss in fulfilling the obligations of kindred.

It appears, too, that he was fortunate in having a better schoolmaster than could generally be found at that day in a village school of Germany. Valentine Jeune was his name, a French Protestant, whose parents had fled from their country during the reign of Louis XIV. He was an active and sympathetic teacher, and bestowed unusual pains upon the boy, partly because he pitied his unhappy situation, and partly because of his aptitude to learn. Nevertheless the school routine of those days was extremely limited. To read and write, to cipher as far as the Rule of Three, to learn the Catechism by heart, and to sing the Church Hymns "so that the windows should rattle"—these were the sole accomplishments of even the best pupils of Valentine Jeune. Baden was then under the rule of a Catholic family. It was a saying in Waldorf that no man could be appointed a swine-herd who was not a Catholic, and that if a may-orality were vacant the swine-herd must have the place if there were no other Catholic in the town. Hence it was that the line which separated the Protestant minority from the Catholic majority was sharply defined, and the Protestant children were the more thoroughly indoctrinated. Rev. John Philip Steiner, the Protestant pastor of Waldorf, a learned and faithful minister, was as punctilious in requiring from the children the thorough learning of the Catechism as a German sergeant was in exacting all the niceties of the parade. Young Astor became, therefore, a very decided Lutheran; he lived and died a member of the Church in which he was born.

The great day in the life of a German child is that of his confirmation, which usually occurs in his fourteenth year. The ceremony, which was performed at Waldorf every two years, was a festival at once solemn and joyous. The children, long prepared beforehand by the joint labors of minister, schoolmaster, and parents, walk in procession to the church, the girls in white, the boys in their best clothes, and there, after the requisite examinations, the rite is performed, and the Sacrament is administered. The day concludes with festivity. Confirmation also is the point of division between childhood and youth—between absolute dependence and the beginning of responsibility. After confirmation the boys of a German peasant take their place in life as apprentices or as servants; and the girls, unless their services are required at home, are placed in situations. Childhood ends, maturity begins, when the child has tasted for the first time the bread and wine of the communion. Whether a boy then becomes an apprentice or a servant depends upon whether his parents have been provident enough to save a sum of money sufficient to pay the usual premium required by a master as compensation for his trouble in teaching his trade. This premium varied at that day from fifty dollars to two hundred, according to the difficulty and respectability of the vocation. A carpenter or a blacksmith might be satisfied with a premium of sixty or seventy dollars, while a cabinet-maker would demand a hundred, and a musical-instrument maker or a clock-maker two hundred.

On Palm Sunday, 1777, when he was about fourteen years of age, John Jacob Astor was confirmed. He then consulted his father upon his future. Money to apprentice him there was none in the paternal coffers. The trade of butcher he knew and disliked. Nor was he inclined to accept as his destiny for life the condition of servant or laborer. The father, who thought the occupation of butcher one of the best in the world, and who needed the help of his son, particularly in the approaching season of harvest, paid no heed to the entreaties of the lad, who saw himself condemned without hope to a business which he loathed, and to labor at it without reward. A deep discontent settled upon him. The tidings of the good fortune of his brothers inflamed his desire to seek his fortune in the world. The news of the Revolutionary War, which drew all eyes upon America, and in which the people of all lands sympathized with the struggling colonies, had its effect upon him. He began to long for the "New Land," as the Germans then styled America; and it is believed in Waldorf that soon after the capture of Burgoyne had spread abroad a confidence in the final success of the colonists, the youth formed the secret determination to emigrate to America. Nevertheless, he had to wait three miserable years longer, until the surrender of Cornwallis made it certain that America was to be free, before he was able to enter upon the gratification of his desire.

In getting to America he displayed the same sagacity in adapting means to ends that distinguished him during his business career in New York. Money he had never had in his life, beyond a few silver coins of the smallest denomination. His father had none to give him, even if he had been inclined to do so. It was only when the lad was evidently resolved to go that he gave a slow, reluctant consent to his departure. Waldorf is nearly three hundred miles from the sea-port in Holland most convenient for his purpose. Despite the difficulties, this penniless youth formed the resolution of going down the Rhine to Holland, there taking ship for London, where he would join his brother, and, while earning money for his passage to America, learn the language of the country to which he was destined. It appears that he dreaded more the difficulties of the English tongue than he did those of the long and expensive journey; but he was resolved not to sail for America until he had acquired the language, and saved a little money beyond the expenses of the voyage. It appears, also, that there prevailed in Baden the belief that Americans were exceedingly selfish and inhospitable, and regarded the poor emigrant only in the light of prey. John Jacob was determined not to land among such a people without the means of understanding their tricks and paying his way. In all ways, too, he endeavored to get a knowledge of the country to which he was going.

With a small bundle of clothes hung over his shoulder upon a stick, with a crown or two in his pocket, he said the last farewell to his father and his friends, and set out on foot for the Rhine, a few miles distant. Valentine Jeune, his old schoolmaster, said, as the lad was lost to view: "I am not afraid of Jacob; he'll get through the world. He has a clear head, and every thing right behind the ears." He was then a stout, strong lad, of nearly seventeen, exceedingly well-made, though slightly undersized, and he had a clear, composed, intelligent look in the eyes, which seemed to ratify the prediction of the schoolmaster. He strode manfully out of town, with tears in his eyes and a sob in his throat—for he loved his father, his friends, and his native village, though his lot there had been forlorn enough. While still in sight of Waldorf he sat down under a tree and thought of the future before him and the friends he had left. He there, as he used to relate in after-life, made three resolutions: to be honest, to be industrious, and not to gamble—excellent resolutions, as far as they go. Having sat a while under the tree, he took up his bundle and resumed his journey with better heart.

It was by no means the intention of this sagacious youth to walk all the way to the sea-coast. There was a much more convenient way at that time of accomplishing the distance, even to a young man with only two dollars in his pocket. The Black Forest is partly in Astor's native Baden. The rafts of timber cut in the Black Forest, instead of floating down the Rhine in the manner practiced in America, used to be rowed by sixty or eighty men each, who were paid high wages, as the labor was severe. Large numbers of stalwart emigrants availed themselves of this mode of getting from the interior to the sea-coast, by which they earned their subsistence on the way and about ten dollars in money. The tradition in Waldorf is that young Astor worked his passage down the Rhine, and earned his passage-money to England as an oarsman on one of these rafts. Hard as the labor was the oarsmen had a merry time of it, cheering their toil with jest and song by night and day. On the fourteenth day after leaving home our youth found himself at a Dutch seaport, with a larger sum of money than he had ever before possessed. He took passage for London, where he landed a few days after, in total ignorance of the place and the language. His brother welcomed him with German warmth, and assisted him to procure employment—probably in the flute and piano manufactory of Astor and Broadwood.

As the foregoing brief account of the early life of John Jacob Astor differs essentially from any previously published in the United States, it is proper that the reader should be informed of the sources whence we have derived information so novel and unexpected. The principal source is a small biography of Astor published in Germany about ten years ago, written by a native of Baden, a Lutheran clergyman, who gathered his material in Waldorf, where were then living a few aged persons who remembered Astor when he was a sad and solitary lad in his father's disorderly house. The statements of this little book are confirmed by what some of the surviving friends and descendants of Mr. Astor in New York remember of his own conversation respecting his early days. He seldom spoke of his life in Germany, though he remembered his native place with fondness, revisited it in the time of his prosperity, pensioned his father, and forgot not Waldorf in his will; but the little that he did say of his youthful years accords with the curious narrative in the work to which we have alluded. We believe the reader may rely on our story as being essentially true.

Astor brought to London, according to our quaint Lutheran, "a pious, true, and godly spirit, a clear understanding, a sound youthful elbow-grease, and the wish to put it to good use." During the two years of his residence in the British metropolis he strove most assiduously for three objects—1, To save money; 2, to acquire the English language; 3, to get information respecting America. Much to his relief and gratification, he found the acquisition of the language to be the least of his difficulties. Working in a shop with English mechanics, and having few German friends, he was generally dependent upon the language of the country for the communication of his desires; and he was as much surprised as delighted to find how many points of similarity there were between the two languages. In about six weeks, he used to say, he could make himself understood a little in English, and long before he left London he could speak it fluently. He never learned to write English correctly in his life, nor could he ever speak it without a decided German accent; but he could always express his meaning with simplicity and force, both orally and in writing. Trust-worthy information respecting America, in the absence of maps, gazetteers, and books of travel, was more difficult to procure. The ordinary Englishman of that day regarded America with horror or contempt as perverse and rebellious colonies, making a great to-do about a paltry tax, and giving "the best of kings" a world of trouble for nothing. He probably heard little of the thundering eloquence with which Fox, Pitt, Burke, and Sheridan were nightly defending the American cause in the House of Commons, and assailing the infatuation of the Government in prosecuting a hopeless war. As often, however, as our youth met with any one who had been in America he plied him with questions, and occasionally he heard from his brother in New York. Henry Astor was already established as a butcher on his own account, wheeling home in a wheel-barrow from Bull's Head his slender purchases of sheep and calves. But the great difficulty of John Jacob in London was the accumulation of money. Having no trade, his wages were necessarily small. Though he rose with the lark, and was at work as early as five in the morning—though he labored with all his might, and saved every farthing that he could spare—it was two years before he had saved enough for his purpose. In September, 1783, he possessed a good suit of Sunday clothes, in the English style, and about fifteen English guineas—the total result of two years of unremitting toil and most pinching economy; and here again charity requires the remark that if Astor the millionaire carried the virtue of economy to an extreme, it was Astor the struggling youth in a strange land who learned the value of money.

In that month of September, 1783, the news reached London that Dr. Franklin and his associates in Paris, after two years of negotiation, had signed the definitive treaty which completed the independence of the United States. Franklin had been in the habit of predicting that as soon as America had become an independent nation, the best blood in Europe and some of the finest fortunes would hasten to seek a career or an asylum in the New World. Perhaps he would have hardly recognized the emigration of this poor German youth as part of the fulfillment of his prophecy. Nevertheless the news of the conclusion of the treaty had no sooner reached England than young Astor, then twenty years old, began to prepare for his departure for the "New Land," and in November he embarked for Baltimore. He paid five of his guineas for a passage in the steerage, which entitled him to sailors' fare of salt beef and biscuit. He invested part of his remaining capital in seven flutes, and carried the rest, about five pounds sterling, in the form of money.

America gave a cold welcome to the young emigrant. The winter of 1783-4 was one of the celebrated severe winters on both sides of the ocean. November gales and December storms wreaked all their fury upon the ship, retarding its progress so long that January arrived before she had reached Chesapeake Bay. Floating ice filled the bay as far as the eye could reach, and a January storm drove the ship among the masses with such force that she was in danger of being broken to pieces. It was on one of those days of peril and consternation that young Astor appeared on deck in his best clothes, and on being asked the reason of this strange proceeding, said that if he escaped with life he should save his best clothes, and if he lost it his clothes would be of no further use to him. Tradition further reports that he, a steerage passenger, ventured one day to come upon the quarter-deck, when the captain roughly ordered him forward. Tradition adds that that very captain, twenty years after, commanded a ship owned by the steerage passenger. When the ship was within a day's sail of her port the wind died away, the cold increased, and the next morning beheld the vessel hard and fast in a sea of ice. For two whole months she remained immovable. Provisions gave out. The passengers were only relieved when the ice extended to the shore, and became strong enough to afford communication with other ships and with the coasts of the bay. Some of the passengers made their way to the shore, and traveled by land to their homes, but this resource was not within the means of our young adventurer, and he was obliged to stick to the ship.

Fortune is an obsequious jade that favors the strong and turns her back upon the weak. This exasperating delay of two months was the means of putting young Astor upon the shortest and easiest road to fortune that the continent of America then afforded to a poor man. Among his fellow-passengers there was one German, with whom he made acquaintance on the voyage, and with whom he continually associated during the detention of the winter. They told each other their past history, their present plans, their future hopes. The stranger informed young Astor that he too had emigrated to America, a few years before, without friends or money; that he had soon managed to get into the business of buying furs of the Indians, and of the boatmen coming to New York from the river settlements; that at length he had embarked all his capital in skins, and had taken them himself to England in a returning transport, where he had sold them to great advantage, and had invested the proceeds in toys and trinkets, with which to continue his trade in the wilderness. He strongly advised Astor to follow his example. He told him the prices of the various skins in America, and the prices they commanded in London. With German friendliness he imparted to him the secrets of the craft: told him where to buy, how to pack, transport, and preserve the skins; the names of the principal dealers in New York, Montreal, and London; and the season of the year when the skins were most abundant. All this was interesting to the young man; but he asked his friend how it was possible to begin such a business without capital. The stranger told him that no great capital was required for a beginning. With a basket of toys, or even of cakes, he said, a man could buy valuable skins on the wharves and in the markets of New York, which could be sold with some profit to New York furriers. But the grand object was to establish a connection with a house in London, where furs brought four or five times their value in America. In short, John Jacob Astor determined to lose no time, after reaching New York, in trying his hand at this profitable traffic.

The ice broke up in March. The ship made its way to Baltimore, and the two friends traveled together to New York. The detention in the ice and the journey to New York almost exhausted Astor's purse. He arrived in this city, where now his estate is valued at forty millions, with little more than his seven German flutes, and a long German head full of available knowledge and quiet determination. He went straight to the humble abode of his brother Henry, a kindly, generous, jovial soul, who gave him a truly fraternal welcome, and received with hospitable warmth the companion of his voyage.

Henry Astor's prosperity had been temporarily checked by the evacuation of New York, which had occurred five months before, and which had deprived the tradesmen of the city of their best customers. It was not only the British army that had left the city in November, 1783, but a host of British officials and old Tory families as well; while the new-comers were Whigs, whom seven years of war had impoverished, and young adventurers who had still their career to make. During the Revolution Henry Astor had speculated occasionally in cattle captured from the farmers of Westchester, which were sold at auction at Bull's Head, and he had advanced from a wheel-barrow to the ownership of a horse. An advertisement informs us that, about the time of his brother's arrival, this horse was stolen, with saddle and bridle, and that the owner offered three guineas reward for the recovery of the property; but that "for the thief, horse, saddle and bridle, ten guineas would be paid." A month after, we find him becoming a citizen of the United States, and soon he began to share in the returning prosperity of the city.

In the mean time, however, he could do little for his new-found brother. During the first evening of his brother's stay at his house the question was discussed, what should the young man do in his new country? The charms of the fur business were duly portrayed by the friend of the youth, who also expressed his preference for it. It was agreed, at length, that the best plan would be for the young man to seek employment with some one already in the business, in order to learn the modes of proceeding, as well as to acquire a knowledge of the country. The young stranger anxiously inquired how much premium would be demanded by a furrier for teaching the business to a novice, and he was at once astonished and relieved to learn that no such thing was known in America, and that he might expect his board and small wages even from the start. So, the next day, the brothers and their friend proceeded together to the store of Robert Bowne, an aged and benevolent Quaker, long established in the business of buying, curing, and exporting peltries. It chanced that he needed a hand. Pleased with the appearance and demeanor of the young man, he employed him (as tradition reports) at two dollars a week and his board. Astor took up his abode in his master's house, and was soon at work. We can tell the reader with certainty what was the nature of the youth's first day's work in his adopted country; for, in his old age, he was often heard to say that the first thing he did for Mr. Bowne was to beat furs; which, indeed, was his principal employment during the whole of the following summer—furs requiring to be frequently beaten to keep the moths from destroying them.

Perhaps among our young readers there are some who have formed the resolution to get on in the world and become rich. We advise such to observe how young Astor proceeded. We are far from desiring to hold up this able man as a model for the young; yet it must be owned that in the art of prospering in business he has had no equal in America; and in that his example may be useful. Now, observe the secret. It was not plodding merely, though no man ever labored more steadily than he. Mr. Bowne, discovering what a prize he had, raised his wages at the end of the first month. Nor was it merely his strict observance of the rules of temperance and morality, though that is essential to any worthy success. The great secret of Astor's early, rapid, and uniform success in business appears to have been, that he acted always upon the maxim that KNOWLEDGE IS POWER! He labored unceasingly at Mr. Bowne's to learn the business. He put all his soul into the work of getting a knowledge of furs, fur-bearing animals, fur-dealers, fur-markets, fur-gathering Indians, fur-abounding countries. In those days a considerable number of bear skins and beaver skins were brought directly to Bowne's store by the Indians and countrymen of the vicinity, who had shot or trapped the animals. These men Astor questioned; and neglected no other opportunity of procuring the information he desired. It used to be observed of Astor that he absolutely loved a fine skin. In later days he would have a superior fur hung up in his counting-room as other men hang pictures; and this, apparently, for the mere pleasure of feeling, showing, and admiring it. He would pass his hand fondly over it, extolling its charms with an approach to enthusiasm; not, however, forgetting to mention that in Canton it would bring him in five hundred dollars. So heartily did he throw himself into his business.

Growing rapidly in the confidence of his employer he was soon intrusted with more important duties than the beating of furs. He was employed in buying them from the Indians and hunters who brought them to the city. Soon, too, he took the place of his employer in the annual journey to Montreal, then the chief fur mart of the country. With a pack upon his back he struck into the wilderness above Albany, and walked to Lake George, which he ascended in a canoe, and having thus reached Champlain he embarked again, and sailed to the head of that lake. Returning with his furs he employed the Indians in transporting them to the Hudson, and brought them to the city in a sloop. He was formed by nature for a life like this. His frame was capable of great endurance, and he had the knack of getting the best of a bargain. The Indian is a great bargainer. The time was gone by when a nail or a little red paint would induce him to part with valuable peltries. It required skill and address on the part of the trader, both in selecting the articles likely to tempt the vanity or the cupidity of the red man, and in conducting the tedious negotiation which usually preceded an exchange of commodities. It was in this kind of traffic, doubtless, that our young German acquired that unconquerable propensity for making hard bargains, which was so marked a feature in his character as a merchant. He could never rise superior to this early-acquired habit. He never knew what it was to exchange places with the opposite party and survey a transaction from his point of view. He exulted not in compensating liberal service liberally. In all transactions he kept in view the simple object of giving the least and getting the most.

Meanwhile his brother Henry was flourishing. He married the beautiful daughter of a brother butcher, and the young wife, according to the fashion of the time, disdained not to assist her husband even in the slaughter-house as well as in the market-place. Colonel Devoe, in his well-known Market Book, informs us that Henry Astor was exceedingly proud of his pretty wife, often bringing her home presents of gay dresses and ribbons, and speaking of her as "de pink of de Bowery." The butchers of that day complained bitterly of him, because he used to ride out of town fifteen or twenty miles and buy up the droves of cattle coming to the city, which he would drive in and sell at an advanced price to the less enterprising butchers. He gained a fortune by his business which would have been thought immense if the colossal wealth of his brother had not reduced all other estates to comparative insignificance. It was he who bought for eight hundred dollars the acre of ground on part of which the old Bowery Theatre now stands.

John Jacob Astor remained not long in the employment of Robert Bowne. It was a pecul-ilarity of the business of a furrier at that day, that, while it admitted of unlimited extension, it could be begun on the smallest scale, with a very insignificant capital. Every farmer's boy in the vicinity of New York had occasionally a skin to sell, and bears abounded in the Catskill Mountains. Indeed the time had not long gone by when beaver skins formed part of the currency of the city. All Northern and Western New York was still a fur-yielding country. Even Long Island furnished its quota. So that, while the fur business was one that rewarded the enterprise of great and wealthy companies, employing thousands of men and fleets of ships, it afforded an opening to young Astor, who, with the assistance of his brother, could command a capital of only a very few hundred dollars. In a little shop in Water Street, with a back room, a yard, and a shed, the shop furnished with only a few toys and trinkets, Astor began business about the year 1786. He had then, as always, the most unbounded confidence in his own abilities. He used to relate that, at this time, a new row of houses in Broadway was the talk of the city from their magnitude and beauty. Passing them one day he said to himself: "I'll build sometime or other a greater house than any of these, and in this very street." He used also to say, in his old age, "The first hundred thousand dollars—that was hard to get; but afterward it was easy to make more."

Having set up for himself he worked with the quiet, indomitable ardor of a German who sees clearly his way open before him. At first he did every thing for himself. He bought, cured, beat, packed, and sold his skins. From dawn till dark he assiduously labored. At the proper seasons of the year, with his pack on his back, he made short excursions into the country, collecting skins from house to house, gradually extending the area of his travels, till he knew the State of New York as no man of his day knew it. He used to boast, late in life, when the Erie Canal had called into being a line of thriving towns through the centre of the State, that he had himself, in his numberless tramps, designated the sites of those towns, and predicted that one day they would be centres of business and population. Particularly he noted the spots where Rochester and Buffalo now stand, one having a harbor on Lake Erie, the other upon Lake Ontario. Those places, he predicted, would one day be large and prosperous cities, and that prediction he made when there was scarcely a settlement at Buffalo and only wigwams on the site of Rochester. At this time he had a partner who usually remained in the city, while the agile and enduring Astor traversed the wilderness.

It was his first voyage to London that established his business on a solid foundation. As soon as he had accumulated a few bales of the skins suited to the European market he took passage in the steerage of a ship and conveyed them to London. He sold them to great advantage, and established connections with houses to which he could in future consign his furs, and from which he could procure the articles best adapted to the taste of Indians and hunters. But his most important operation in London was to make an arrangement with the firm of Astor and Broadwood, by which he became the New York agent for the sale of their pianos, flutes, and violins. He is believed to have been the first man in New York who kept constantly for sale a supply of musical merchandise, of which the annual sale in New York is now reckoned at five millions of dollars. On his return to New York he opened a little dingy store in Gold Street between Fulton and Ann, and swung out a sign to the breeze bearing the words:

FURS AND PIANOS.

There were until recently aged men among us who remembered seeing this sign over the store of Mr. Astor, and in some old houses are preserved ancient pianos bearing the name of J. J. Astor as the seller thereof. Violins and flutes, also, are occasionally met with that have his name upon them. In 1790, seven years after his arrival in the city, he was of sufficient importance to appear in the Directory thus:

ASTOR, J. J., Fur Trader, 40 Little Dock Street (now part of Water Street).

In this time of his dawning prosperity, while still inhabiting the small house of which his store was a part, he married. Sarah Todd was the maiden name of his wife. As a connection of the family of Brevoort she was then considered to be somewhat superior to her husband in point of social rank, and she brought him a fortune, by no means despised by him at that time, of three hundred dollars. She threw herself heartily into her husband's growing business, laboring with her own hands, buying, sorting, and beating the furs. He used to say that she was as good a judge of the value of peltries as himself, and that her opinion in a matter of business was better than that of most merchants.

Mr. Astor still traversed the wilderness. The father of the late lamented General Wadsworth used to relate that he met him once in the woods of Western New York in a sad plight. His wagon had broken down in the midst of a swamp. In the mélée all his gold had rolled away through the bottom of the vehicle, and was irrecoverably lost; and Astor was seen emerging from the swamp covered with mud and carrying on his shoulder an axe—the sole relic of his property. When at length, in 1794, Jay's treaty caused the evacuation of the western parts held by the British, his business so rapidly extended that he was enabled to devolve these laborious journeys upon others, while he remained in New York controlling a business that now embraced the region of the great Lakes, and gave employment to a host of trappers, collectors, and agents. He was soon in a position to purchase a ship, in which his furs were carried to London, and in which he occasionally made a voyage himself. He was still observed to be most assiduous in the pursuit of commercial knowledge. He was never weary of inquiring about the markets of Europe and Asia, the ruling prices and commodities of each, the standing of commercial houses, and all other particulars that could be of use. Hence his directions to his captains and agents were always explicit and minute, and if any enterprise failed to be profitable it could generally be distinctly seen that it was because his orders had not been obeyed. In London he became most intimately conversant with the operations of the East India Company and with the China trade. China being the best market in the world for furs, and furnishing commodities which in America had become necessities of life, he was quick to perceive what an advantage he would have over other merchants by sending his ships to Canton provided with furs as well as dollars. It was about the year 1800 that he sent his first ship to Canton, and he continued to carry on commerce with China for twenty-seven years, sometimes with loss, generally with profit, and occasionally with splendid and bewildering success.

It was not, however, until the year 1800, when he was worth a quarter of million dollars and had been in business fifteen years, that he indulged himself in the comfort of living in a house apart from his business. In 1794 he appears in the Directory as "Furrier, 149 Broadway." From 1796 to 1799 he figures as "Fur Merchant, 149 Broadway." In 1800 he had a storehouse at 141 Greenwich Street, and lived at 223 Broadway, on the site of the present Astor House. In 1801 his store was at 71 Liberty Street, and he had removed his residence back to 149 Broadway. The year following we find him again at 223 Broadway, where he continued to reside for a quarter of a century. His house was such as a fifth-rate merchant would now consider much beneath his dignity. Mr. Astor, indeed, had a singular dislike to living in a large house. Astor had neither expensive tastes nor wasteful vices. His luxuries were a pipe, a glass of beer, a game of draughts, a ride on horseback, and the theatre. Of the theatre he was particularly fond. He seldom missed a good performance in the palmy days of the "Old Park."

It was his instinctive abhorrence of ostentation and waste that enabled him, as it were, to glide into the millionaire without being observed by his neighbors. He used to relate, with a chuckle, that he was worth a million before any one suspected it. A dandy bank clerk, one day, having expressed a doubt as to the sufficiency of his name to a piece of mercantile paper, Astor asked him how much he thought he was worth. The clerk mentioned a sum ludicrously less than the real amount. Astor then asked him how much he supposed this and that leading merchant, whom he named, was worth. The young man endowed them with generous sum-totals proportioned to their style of living. "Well," said Astor, "I am worth more than any of them. I will not say how much I am worth, but I am worth more than any sum you have mentioned." "Then," said the clerk, "you are even a greater fool than I took you for, to work as hard as you do." The old man would tell this story with great glee, for he always liked a joke.

In the course of his long life he had frequent opportunities of observing what becomes of those gay merchants who live up to the incomes of prosperous years regardless of the inevitable time of commercial collapse. It must be owned that he held in utter contempt the dashing style of living and doing business which has too often prevailed in New York; and he was very slow to give credit to a house that carried sail out of proportion to its ballast. Nevertheless, he was himself no plodder when plodding had ceased to be necessary. At the time when his affairs were on their greatest scale he would leave his office at two in the afternoon, go home to an early dinner, then mount his horse and ride about the island till it was time to go to the theatre. He had a strong aversion to illegitimate speculation, and particularly to gambling in stocks. The note-shaving and stock-jobbing operations of the Rothschilds he despised. It was his pride and boast that he gained his own fortune by legitimate commerce, and by the legitimate investment of his profits. Having an unbounded faith in the destiny of the United States, and in the future commercial supremacy of New York, it was his custom, from about the year 1800, to invest his gains in the purchase of lots and lands on Manhattan Island.

We have all heard much of the closeness, or rather the meanness, of this remarkable man. Truth compels us to admit, as we have before intimated, that he was not generous, except to his own kindred. His liberality began and ended in his own family. Very seldom during his lifetime did he willingly do a generous act outside of the little circle of his relations and descendants. To get all that he could, and to keep nearly all that he got—those were the laws of his being. He had a vast genius for making money, and that was all that he had.

It is a pleasure to know that sometimes his extreme closeness defeated its own object. He once lost seventy thousand dollars by committing a piece of petty injustice toward his best captain. This gallant sailor, being notified by an insurance office of the necessity of having a chronometer on board his ship, spoke to Mr. Astor on the subject, who advised the captain to buy one.

"But," said the captain, "I have no five hundred dollars to spare for such a purpose; the chronometer should belong to the ship."

"Well," said the merchant, "you need not pay for it now; pay for it at your convenience."

The captain still objecting, Astor, after a prolonged higgling, authorized him to buy a chronometer, and charge it to the ship's account; which was done. Sailing day was at hand. The ship was hauled into the stream. The captain, as is the custom, handed in his account. Astor, subjecting it to his usual close scrutiny, observed the novel item of five hundred dollars for the chronometer. He objected, averring that it was understood between them that the captain was to pay for the instrument. The worthy sailor recalled the conversation, and firmly held to his recollection of it. Astor insisting on his own view of the matter, the captain was so profoundly disgusted that, important as the command of the ship was to him, he resigned his post. Another captain was soon found and the ship sailed for China. Another house which was then engaged in the China trade, knowing the worth of this "king of captains," as Astor himself used to style him, bought him a ship and dispatched him to Canton two months after the departure of Astor's vessel. Our captain, put upon his mettle, employed all his skill to accelerate the speed of his ship, and had such success that he reached New York with a full cargo of tea just seven days after the arrival of Mr. Astor's ship. Astor, not expecting another ship for months, and therefore sure of monopolizing the market, had not yet broken bulk, nor even taken off the hatchways. Our captain arrived on a Saturday. Advertisements and hand-bills were immediately issued, and on the Wednesday morning following, as the custom then was, the auction sale of the tea began on the wharf—two barrels of punch contributing to the éclat and hilarity of the occasion. The cargo was sold to good advantage, and the market was glutted. Astor lost in consequence the entire profits of the voyage, not less than the sum named above. Meeting the captain some time after in Broadway, he said,

"I had better have paid for that chronometer of yours."

Without ever acknowledging that he had been in the wrong, he was glad enough to engage the captain's future services. This anecdote we received from the worthy captain's own lips.

On one occasion the same officer had the opportunity of rendering the great merchant a most signal service. The agent of Mr. Astor in China suddenly died at a time when the property in his charge amounted to about seven hundred thousand dollars. Our captain, who was not then in Astor's employ, was perfectly aware that if this immense property fell into official hands, as the law required, not one dollar of it would ever again find its way to the coffers of its proprietor. By a series of bold, prompt, and skillful measures, he rescued it from the official maw, and made it yield a profit to the owner. Mr. Astor acknowledged the service. He acknowledged it with emphasis and a great show of gratitude. He said many times,

"If you had not done just as you did I should never have seen one dollar of my money; no, not one dollar of it."

But he not only did not compensate him for his services, but he did not even reimburse the small sum of money which the captain had expended in performing those services. Astor was then worth ten millions, and the captain had his hundred dollars a month and a family of young children.

Thus the great merchant recompensed great services. He was not more just in rewarding small ones. On one occasion a ship of his arrived from China, which he found necessary to dispatch at once to Amsterdam, the market in New York being depressed by an over-supply of China merchandise. But on board this ship, under a mountain of tea chests, the owner had two pipes of precious Madeira wine which had been sent on a voyage for the improvement of its constitution.

"Can you get out that wine," asked the owner, "without discharging the tea?"

The captain thought he could.

"Well, then," said Mr. Astor, "you get it out, and I'll give you a demijohn of it. You'll say it's the best wine you ever tasted."

It required the labor of the whole ship's crew for two days to get out those two pipes of wine. They were sent to the house of Mr. Astor. A year passed. The captain had been to Amsterdam and back, but he had received no tidings of his demijohn of Madeira. One day, when Mr. Astor was on board the ship, the captain ventured to remind the great man, in a jocular manner, that he had not received the wine.

"Ah," said Astor, "don't you know the reason? It isn't fine yet. Wait till it is fine, and you'll say you never tasted such Madeira." The captain never heard of that wine again.

These traits show the moral weakness of the man. It is only when we regard his mercantile exploits that we can admire him. He was, unquestionably, one of the ablest, boldest, and most successful operators that ever lived. He seldom made a mistake in the conduct of business. Having formed his plan, he carried it out with a nerve and steadiness, with such a firm and easy grasp of all the details, that he seemed rather to be playing an interesting game than transacting business. "He could command an army of five hundred thousand men!" exclaimed one of his admirers. That was an erroneous remark. He could have commanded an army of five hundred thousand tea chests, with a heavy auxiliary force of otter skins and beaver skins. But a commander of men must be superior morally as well as intellectually. He must be able to win the love and excite the enthusiasm of his followers. Astor would have made a splendid commissary-general to the army of Xerxes, but he could no more have conquered Greece than Xerxes himself.

The reader may be curious to know by what means Mr. Astor became so preposterously rich. Few successful men gain a single million by legitimate commerce. A million dollars is a most enormous sum of money. It requires a considerable effort of the mind to conceive it. But this indomitable little German managed, in the course of sixty years, to accumulate twenty millions; of which, probably, not more than two millions was the fruit of his business as a fur trader and China merchant.

At that day the fur trade was exceedingly profitable, as well as of vast extent. It is estimated that about the year 1800 the number of peltries annually furnished to commerce was about six millions, varying in value from fifteen cents to five hundred dollars. When every respectable man in Europe and America wore a beaver skin upon his head, or a part of one, and when a good beaver skin could be bought in Western New York for a dollar's worth of trash, and could be sold in London for twenty-five English shillings, and when those twenty-five English shillings could be invested in English cloth and cutlery and sold in New York for forty shillings, it may be imagined that fur-trading was a very good business. Mr. Astor had his share of the cream of it, and that was the foundation of his colossal fortune. Hence, too, the tender love he felt for a fine fur.

In the next place, his ventures to China were sometimes exceedingly fortunate. A fair profit on a voyage to China at that day was thirty thousand dollars. Mr. Astor has been known to gain seventy thousand, and to have his money in his pocket within the year. He was remarkably lucky in the war of 1812. All his ships escaped capture, and arriving at a time when foreign commerce was almost annihilated and tea had doubled in price, his gains were so immense that the million or more lost in the Astorian enterprise gave him not even a momentary inconvenience.

But it was neither furs nor tea that gave him twenty millions. It was his sagacity in investing his profits that made him the richest man in America. When he first trod the streets of New York, in 1784, the city was a snug, leafy place of twenty-five thousand inhabitants, situated at the extremity of the island, mostly below Cortland Street. In 1800, when he began to have money to invest, the city had more than doubled in population, and had advanced nearly a mile up the island. Now, Astor was a shrewd calculator of the future. No reason appeared why New York should not repeat this doubling and this mile of extension every fifteen years. He acted upon the supposition, and fell into the habit of buying lands and lots just beyond the verge of the city. One little anecdote will show the wisdom of this proceeding. He sold a lot in the vicinity of Wall Street, about the year 1810, for eight thousand dollars, which was supposed to be somewhat under its value. The purchaser, after the papers were signed, seemed disposed to chuckle over his bargain.

"Why, Mr. Astor," said he, "in a few years this lot will be worth twelve thousand dollars."

"Very true," replied Astor; "but now you shall see what I will do with this money. With eight thousand dollars I buy eighty lots above Canal Street. By the time your lot is worth twelve thousand dollars my eighty lots will be worth eighty thousand dollars;" which proved to be the fact.

His purchase of the Richmond Hill estate of Aaron Burr was a case in point. He bought the hundred and sixty acres at a thousand dollars an acre, and in twelve years the land was worth fifteen hundred dollars a lot. In the course of time the island was dotted all over with Astor lands—to such an extent that the whole income of his estate for fifty years could be invested in new houses without buying any more land.

His land speculations, however, were by no means confined to the little island of Manhattan. Aged readers can not have forgotten the most celebrated of all his operations of this kind, by which he acquired a legal title to one-third of the county of Putnam in this State. This enormous tract was part of the estate of Roger Morris and Mary his wife, who, by adhering to the King of Great Britain in the Revolutionary war, forfeited their landed property in the State of New York. Having been duly attainted as public enemies, they fled to England at the close of the war, and the State sold their lands, in small parcels, to honest Whig farmers. The estate comprised fifty-one thousand one hundred and two acres, upon which were living, in 1809, more than seven hundred families, all relying upon the titles which the State of New York had given. Now Mr. Astor steps forward to disturb the security of this community of farmers. It appeared, and was proved beyond doubt, that Roger and Mary Morris had only possessed a life-interest in this estate, and that, therefore, it was only that life-interest which the State could legally confiscate. The moment Roger and Mary Morris ceased to live the property would fall to their heirs, with all the houses, barns, and other improvements thereon. After a most thorough examination of the papers by the leading counsel of that day, Mr. Astor bought the rights of the heirs, in 1809, for twenty thousand pounds sterling. At that time Roger Morris was no more; and Mary his wife was nearly eighty, and extremely infirm. She lingered, however, for some years; and it was not until after the peace of 1815 that the claims of Mr. Astor were pressed. The consternation of the farmers and the astonishment of the people generally, when at length the great millionaire stretched out his hand to pluck this large ripe pear, may be imagined. A great clamor arose against him. It can not be denied, however, that he acted in this business with moderation and dignity. Upon the first rumor of his claim, in 1814, commissioners were appointed by the Legislature to inquire into it. These gentlemen, finding the claim more formidable than had been suspected, asked Mr. Astor for what sum he would compromise. The lands were valued at six hundred and sixty-seven thousand dollars, but Astor replied that he would sell his claim for three hundred thousand. The offer was not accepted, and the affair lingered. In 1818, Mary Morris being supposed to be at the point of death, and the farmers being in constant dread of the writs of ejectment which her death would bring upon them, commissioners were again appointed by the Legislature to look into the matter. Again Mr. Astor was asked on what terms he would compromise. He replied, January 19, 1819:

"In 1813 or 1814 a similar proposition was made to me by the commissioners then appointed by the Honorable the Legislature of this State, when I offered to compromise for the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, which, considering the value of the property in question, was thought very reasonable; and, at the present period, when the life of Mrs. Morris is, according to calculation, worth little or nothing, she being near eighty-six years of age, and the property more valuable than it was in 1813, I am still willing to receive the amount which I then stated, with interest on the same, payable in money or stock, bearing an interest of — per cent., payable quarterly. The stock may be made payable at such periods as the Honorable the Legislature may deem proper. This offer will, I trust, be considered as liberal, and as a proof of my willingness to compromise on terms which are reasonable, considering the value of the property, the price which it cost me, and the inconvenience of having so long laid out of my money, which, if employed in commercial operations, would most likely have produced better profits."

The Legislature were not yet prepared to compromise. It was not till 1827 that a test case was selected and brought to trial before a jury. The most eminent counsel were employed on the part of the State—Daniel Webster and Martin Van Buren among them. Astor's cause was intrusted to Emmet, Ogden, and others. We believe that Aaron Burr was consulted on the part of Mr. Astor, though he did not appear in the trial. The efforts of the array of counsel employed by the State were exerted in vain to find a flaw in the paper upon which Astor's claim mainly rested. Mr. Webster's speech on this occasion betrays, even to the unprofessional reader, both that he had no case and that he knew he had not, for he indulged in a strain of remark that could only have been designed to prejudice, not convince, the jury.

"It is a claim for lands," said he, "not in their wild and forest state, but for lands the intrinsic value of which is mingled with the labor expended upon them. It is no everyday purchase, for it extends over towns and counties, and almost takes in a degree of latitude. It is a stupendous speculation. The individual who now claims it has not succeeded to it by inheritance; he has not attained it, as he did that vast wealth which no one less envies him than I do, by fair and honest exertions in commercial enterprise, but by speculation, by purchasing the forlorn hope of the heirs of a family driven from their country by a bill of attainder. By the defendants, on the contrary, the lands in question are held as a patrimony. They have labored for years to improve them. The rugged hills had grown green under their cultivation before a question was raised as to the integrity of their titles."

A line of remark like this would appeal powerfully to a jury of farmers. Its effect, however, was destroyed by the simple observation of one of the opposing counsel:

"Mr. Astor bought this property confiding in the justice of the State of New York, firmly believing that in the litigation of his claim his rights would be maintained."

It is creditable to the administration of justice in New York, and creditable to the very institution of trial by jury, that Mr. Astor's most unpopular and even odious cause was triumphant. Warned by this verdict, the Legislature consented to compromise on Mr. Astor's own terms. The requisite amount of "Astor stock," as it was called, was created. Mr. Astor received about half a million of dollars, and the titles of the lands were secured to their rightful owners. To render this conclusion of the affair palatable to the people the trial and the documents were published in pamphlets.

The crowning glory of Mr. Astor's mercantile career was that vast and brilliant enterprise which Washington Irving has commemorated in "Astoria." No other single individual has ever set on foot a scheme so extensive, so difficult, and so costly as this; nor has any such enterprise been carried out with such sustained energy and perseverance. To establish a line of trading-posts from St. Louis to the Pacific, a four months' journey in a land of wilderness, prairie, mountain, and desert, inhabited by treacherous or hostile savages—to found a permanent settlement on the Pacific coast as the grand dépôt of furs and supplies—to arrange a plan by which the furs collected should be regularly transported to China, and the ships return to New York laden with tea and silks, and then proceed once more to the Pacific coast to repeat the circuit—to maintain all the parts of this scheme without the expectation of any but a remote profit, sending ship after ship before any certain intelligence of the first ventures had arrived—this was an enterprise which had been memorable if it had been undertaken by a wealthy corporation or a powerful government, instead of a private merchant, unaided by any resources but his own. At every moment in the conduct of this magnificent attempt Mr. Astor appears the great man. His parting instructions to the captain of his first ship call to mind those of General Washington to St. Clair on a similar occasion. "All accidents that have yet happened," said the merchant, "arose from too much confidence in the Indians." The ship was lost, a year after, by the disregard of this last warning. When the news reached New York of the massacre of the crew and the blowing up of the ship, the man who flew into a passion at seeing a little boy drop a wine-glass behaved with a composure that was the theme of general admiration. He attended the theatre the same evening, and entered heartily into the play. Mr. Irving relates that a friend having expressed surprise at this, Mr. Astor replied:

"What would you have me do? Would you have me stay at home and weep for what I can not help?"

This was not indifference; for when, after nearly two years of weary waiting, he heard of the safety and success of the overland expedition, he was so overjoyed that he could scarcely contain himself.

"I felt ready," said he, "to fall upon my knees in a transport of gratitude."

A touch in one of his letters shows the absolute confidence he felt in his own judgment and abilities, a confidence invariably exhibited by men of the first executive talents.

"Were I on the spot," he wrote to one of his agents when the affairs of the settlement appeared desperate, "and had the management of affairs, I would defy them all; but, as it is, every thing depends upon you and the friends about you. Our enterprise is grand and deserves success, and I hope in God it will meet it. If my object was merely gain of money I should say, think whether it is best to save what we can and abandon the place; but the thought is like a dagger to my heart."

He intimates here that his object was not merely "gain of money." What was it, then? Mr. Irving informs us that it was desire of fame. We should rather say that when nature endows a man with a remarkable gift she also implants within him the love of exercising it. Astor loved to plan a vast, far-reaching enterprise. He loved it as Morphy loves to play chess, as Napoleon loved to plan a campaign, as Raphael loved to paint, and Handel to compose.

The war of 1812 foiled the enterprise. "But for that war," Mr. Astor used to say, "I should have been the richest man that ever lived." He expected to go on expending money for several years, and then to gain a steady annual profit of millions. It was, however, that very war that enabled him to sustain the enormous losses of the enterprise without injury to his estate, or even a momentary inconvenience. During the first year of the war he had the luck to receive two or three cargoes of tea from China, despite the British cruisers. In the second year of the war, when the Government was reduced to borrow at eighty, he invested largely in the loan, which, one year after the peace, stood at one hundred and twenty.

Mr. Astor at all times was a firm believer in the destiny of the United States. In other words, he held its public stock in profound respect. He had little to say of politics, but he was a supporter of the old Whig party for many years, and had a great regard, personal and political, for its leader and ornament, Henry Clay. He was never better pleased than when he entertained Mr. Clay at his own house. It ought to be mentioned in this connection that when, in June, 1812, the merchants of New York memorialized the Government in favor of the embargo, which almost annihilated the commerce of the port, the name of John Jacob Astor headed the list of signatures.

He was an active business-man in this city for about forty-six years—from his twenty-first to his sixty-seventh year. Toward the year 1830 he began to withdraw from business, and undertook no new enterprises except such as the investment of his income involved. His three daughters were married. His son and heir was a man of thirty. Numerous grandchildren were around him, for whom he manifested a true German fondness; not, however, regarding them with equal favor. He dispensed, occasionally, a liberal hospitality at his modest house, though that hospitality was usually bestowed upon men whose presence at his table conferred distinction upon him who sat at the head of it. He was fond, strange as it may seem, of the society of literary men. For Washington Irving he always professed a warm regard, liked to have him at his house, visited him, and made much of him. Fitz-Greene Halleck, one of the best talkers of his day, a man full of fun, anecdote, and fancy, handsome, graceful, and accomplished, was a great favorite with him. He afterward invited the poet to reside with him and take charge of his affairs, which Mr. Halleck did for many years, to the old gentleman's perfect satisfaction. Still later Dr. Cogswell won his esteem, and was named by him Librarian of the Astor Library. For his own part, though he rather liked to be read to in his latter days, he collected no library, no pictures, no objects of curiosity. As he had none of the wasteful vices, so also he had none of the costly tastes. Like all other rich men, he was beset continually by applicants for pecuniary aid, especially by his own countrymen. As a rule he refused to give: and he was right. He held beggary of all descriptions in strong contempt, and seemed to think that, in this country, want and fault are synonymous. Nevertheless, we are told that he did, now and then, bestow small sums in charity, though we have failed to get trustworthy evidence of a single instance of his doing so. It is no doubt absolutely necessary for a man who is notoriously rich to guard against imposture, and to hedge himself about against the swarms of solicitors who pervade a large and wealthy city. If he did not he would be overwhelmed and devoured. His time would be all consumed and his estate squandered in satisfying the demands of importunate impudence. Still, among the crowd of applicants there is here and there one whose claim upon the aid of the rich man is just. It were much to be desired that a way should be devised by which these meritorious askers could be sifted from the mass, and the nature of their requests made known to men who have the means and the wish to aid such. Some kind of Benevolence Intelligence Office appears to be needed among us. In the absence of such an institution we must not be surprised that men renowned for their wealth convert themselves into human porcupines, and erect their defensive armor at the approach of every one who carries a subscription book. True, a generous man might establish a private bureau of investigation; but a generous man is not very likely to acquire a fortune of twenty millions. Such an accumulation of wealth is just as wise as if a man who had to walk ten miles on a hot day should, of his own choice, carry on his back a large sack of potatoes. A man of superior sense and feeling will not waste his life so unless he has in view a grand public object. On the contrary, he will rather do as Franklin did, who, having acquired at the age of forty-two a modest competence, sold out his thriving business on easy terms to a younger man, and devoted the rest of his happy life to the pursuit of knowledge and the service of his country. But we can not all be Franklins. In the affairs of the world millionaires are as indispensable as philosophers; and it is fortunate for society that some men take pleasure in heaping up enormous masses of capital.

Having retired from business Mr. Astor determined to fulfill the vow of his youth, and build in Broadway a house larger and costlier than any it could then boast. Behold the result in the Astor House, which remains to this day one of our most solid, imposing, and respectable structures. The ground on which the hotel stands was covered with substantial three-story brick houses, one of which Astor himself occupied; and it was thought at the time a wasteful and rash proceeding to destroy them. Old Mr. Coster, a retired merchant of great wealth, who lived next door to Mr. Astor's residence, was extremely indisposed to remove, and held out long against every offer of the millionaire. His house was worth thirty thousand dollars. Astor offered him that sum; but the offer was very positively declined, and the old gentleman declared it to be his intention to spend the remainder of his days in the house. Mr. Astor offered forty thousand without effect. At length the indomitable projector revealed his purpose to his neighbor.

"Mr. Coster," said he, "I want to build a hotel. I have got all the other lots; now name your own price."

To which Coster replied by confessing the real obstacle to the sale.

"The fact is," said he, "I can't sell unless Mrs. Coster consents. If she is willing I'll sell for sixty thousand, and you can call to-morrow morning and ask her."

Mr. Astor presented himself at the time named.

"Well, Mr. Astor," said the lady in the tone of one who was conferring a very great favor for nothing, "we are such old friends that I am willing for your sake."

So the house was bought, and with the proceeds Mr. Coster built the spacious granite mansion a mile up Broadway, which is now known as the Chinese Building. Mr. Astor used to relate this story with great glee. He was particularly amused at the simplicity of the old lady in considering it a great favor to him to sell her house at twice its value. It was at this time that he removed to a wide, two-story brick house opposite Niblo's, the front door of which bore a large silver plate exhibiting to awe-struck passers-by the words: "MR. ASTOR." Soon after the hotel was finished he made a present of it to his eldest son, or, in legal language, he sold it to him for the sum of one dollar, "to him in hand paid."

In the decline of his life, when his vast fortune was safe from the perils of business, he was still as sparing in his personal expenditures, as close in his bargains, as watchful over his accumulations as he had been when economy was essential to his solvency and progress. He enjoyed keenly the consciousness, the feeling of being rich. The roll-book of his possessions was his Bible. He scanned it fondly, and saw with quiet but deep delight the catalogue of his property lengthening from month to month. The love of accumulation grew with his years until it ruled him like a tyrant. If at fifty he possessed his millions, at sixty-five his millions possessed him. Only to his own children and to their children was he liberal; and his liberality to them was all arranged with a view to keeping his estate in the family, and to cause it at every moment to tend toward a final consolidation in one enormous mass. He was ever considerate for the comfort of his imbecile son. One of his last enterprises was to build for him a commodious residence.

In 1832, one of his daughters having married a European nobleman, he allowed himself the pleasure of a visit to her. He remained abroad till 1835, when he hurried home in consequence of the disturbance in financial affairs caused by General Jackson's war upon the Bank of the United States. The captain of the ship in which he sailed from Havre to New York has related to us some curious incidents of the voyage. Mr. Astor reached Havre when the ship, on the point of sailing, had every state-room engaged; but he was so anxious to get home that the captain, who had commanded ships for him in former years, gave up to him his own state-room. Head winds and boisterous seas kept the vessel beating about and tossing in the channel for many days. The great man was very sick and still more alarmed. At length, being persuaded that he should not survive the voyage, he asked the captain to run in and set him ashore on the coast of England. The captain dissuaded him. The old man urged his request at every opportunity, and said at last: "I give you thousand dollars to put me aboard a pilot-boat." He was so vehement and importunate that one day the captain, worried out of all patience, promised that if he did not get out of the channel before the next morning he would run in and put him ashore. It happened that the wind changed in the afternoon and wafted the ship into the broad ocean. But the troubles of the sea-sick millionaire had only just begun. A heavy gale of some days' duration blew the vessel along the western coast of Ireland. Mr. Astor, thoroughly panic-stricken, now offered the captain ten thousand dollars if he would put him ashore any where on the wild and rocky coast of the Emerald Isle. In vain the captain remonstrated. In vain he reminded the old gentleman of the danger of forfeiting his insurance.

"Insurance!" exclaimed Astor, "can't I insure your ship myself?"

In vain the captain mentioned the rights of the other passengers. In vain he described the solitary and rock-bound coast, and detailed the difficulties and dangers which attended its approach. Nothing would appease him. He said he would take all the responsibility, brave all the perils, endure all the consequences; only let him once more feel the firm ground under his feet. The gale having abated the captain yielded to his entreaties, and engaged, if the other passengers would consent to the delay, to stand in and put him ashore. Mr. Astor went into the cabin and proceeded to write what was expected to be a draft for ten thousand dollars in favor of the owners of the ship or his agent in New York. He handed to the captain the result of his efforts. It was a piece of paper covered with writing that was totally illegible.

"What is this?" asked the captain.

"A draft upon my son for ten thousand dollars," was the reply.

"But no one can read it."

"Oh yes, my son will know what it is. My hand trembles so that I can not write any better."

"But," said the captain, "you can at least write your name. I am acting for the owners of the ship, and I can not risk their property for a piece of paper that no one can read. Let one of the gentlemen draw up a draft in proper form; you sign it; and I will put you ashore."

The old gentleman would not consent to this mode of proceeding, and the affair was dropped.

A favorable wind blew the ship swiftly on her way, and Mr. Astor's alarm subsided. But even on the Banks of Newfoundland, two-thirds of the way across, when the captain went upon the poop to speak a ship bound for Liverpool, old Astor climbed up after him, saying, "Tell them I give thousand dollars if they take a passenger."

Astor lived to the age of eighty-four. During the last few years of his life his faculties were sensibly impaired; he was a child again. It was, however, while his powers and his judgment were in full vigor that he determined to follow the example of Girard and bequeath a portion of his estate for the purpose of "rendering a public benefit to the city of New York." He consulted Mr. Irving, Mr. Halleck, Dr. Cogswell, and his own son with regard to the object of this bequest. All his friends concurred in recommending a public library, and, accordingly, in 1839, he added the well-known codicil to his will which consecrated four hundred thousand dollars to this purpose. To Irving's Astoria and to the Astor Library he will owe a lasting fame in the country of his adoption.

The last considerable sum he was ever known to give away was a contribution to aid the election to the Presidency of his old friend, Henry Clay. The old man was always fond of a compliment, and seldom averse to a joke. It was the timely application of a jocular compliment that won from him this last effort of generosity. When the committee were presented to him he began to excuse himself, evidently intending to decline giving.

"I am not now interested in these things," said he. "Those gentlemen who are in business, and whose property depends upon the issue of the election, ought to give. But I am now an old man. I haven't any thing to do with commerce, and it makes no difference to me what the Government does. I don't make money any more, and haven't any concern in the matter."

One of the committee replied, "Why, Mr. Astor, you are like Alexander when he wept because there were no more worlds to conquer. You have made all the money, and now there is no more money to make." The old eye twinkled at the blended compliment and jest.

"Ha, ha, ha! very good, that's very good. Well, well, I give you something."

Whereupon he drew his check for fifteen hundred dollars.

When all else had died within him, when he was at last nourished like an infant at a woman's breast, and when being no longer able to ride in a carriage, he was daily tossed in blanket for exercise, he still retained a strong interest in the care and increase of his property. His agent called daily upon him to render a report of moneys received. One morning this gentleman chanced to enter his room while he was enjoying his blanket exercise. The old man cried out from the middle of his blanket,

"Has Mrs. — paid that rent yet?"

"No," replied the agent.

"Well, but she must pay it," said the poor old man.

"Mr. Astor," rejoined the agent, "she can't pay it now; she has had misfortunes, and we must give her time."

"No, no," said Astor; "I tell you she can pay it, and she will pay it. You don't go the right way to work with her."

The agent took leave, and mentioned the anxiety of the old gentleman with regard to this unpaid rent to his son, who counted out the requisite sum, and told the agent to give it to the old man as if he had received it from the tenant.

"There!" exclaimed Mr. Astor, when he received the money, "I told you she would pay it if you went the right way to work with her."

Who would have twenty millions at such a price?

On the twenty-ninth of March, 1848, of old age merely, in the presence of his family and friends, without pain or disquiet, this remarkable man breathed his last. He was buried in a vault of the church of St. Thomas in Broadway. Though he expressly declared in his will that he was a member of the Reformed German Congregation, no clergyman of that Church took part in the services of his funeral. The unusual number of six Episcopal Doctors of Divinity assisted at the ceremony. A bishop could have scarcely expected a more distinguished funereal homage. Such a thing it is in a commercial city to die worth twenty millions! The pallbearers were Washington Irving, Philip Hone, Sylvanus Miller, James G. King, Isaac Bell, David B. Ogden, Thomas J. Oakley, Ramsey Crooks, and Jacob B. Taylor.

The public curiosity with regard to the will of the deceased millionaire was fully gratified by the saucy enterprise of the Herald, which published it entire in five columns of its smallest type a day or two after the funeral. The ruling desires of Mr. Astor with regard to his property were evidently these two: 1. To provide amply and safely for his children, grandchildren, nephews, and nieces; 2. To keep his estate, as much as was consistent with this desire, in one mass in the hands of his eldest son. His brother Henry, the butcher, had died childless and rich, leaving his property to Mr. William B. Astor. To the descendants of the brother in Germany Mr. Astor left small but sufficient pensions. To many of his surviving children and grandchildren in America he left life-interests and stocks which seem designed to produce an average of about fifteen thousand dollars a year. Other grandsons were to have twenty-five thousand dollars on reaching the age of twenty-five, and the same sum when they were thirty. His favorite grandson, Charles Astor Bristed, since well known to the public as an author and poet, was left amply provided for. He directed his executors to "provide for my unfortunate son, John Jacob Astor, and to procure for him all the comforts which his condition does or may require." For this purpose ten thousand dollars a year was directed to be appropriated, and the house built for him in Fourteenth Street near Ninth Avenue was to be his for life. If he should be restored to the use of his faculties, he was to have an income of one hundred thousand dollars. The number of persons, all relatives or connections of the deceased, who were benefited by the will, was about twenty-five. To his old friend and manager, Fitz-Greene Halleck, he left the somewhat ridiculous annuity of two hundred dollars, which Mr. William B. Astor voluntarily increased to fifteen hundred. Nor was this the only instance in which the heir rectified the errors and supplied the omissions of the will. He had the justice to send a considerable sum to the brave old captain who saved for Mr. Astor the large property in China imperiled by the sudden death of an agent. The minor bequests and legacies of Mr. Astor absorbed about two millions of his estate. The rest of his property fell to his eldest son, under whose careful management it is supposed to have increased to an amount not less than forty millions. This may, however, be an exaggeration. Mr. William B. Astor minds his own business, and does not impart to others the secrets of his rent-roll. The number of his houses in this city is said to be seven hundred and twenty.

The bequests of Mr. Astor for purposes of benevolence show good sense and good feeling. The Astor Library fund of four hundred thousand dollars was the largest item. Next in amount was fifty thousand dollars for the benefit of the poor of his native village in Germany. "To the German Society of New York," continued the will, "I give thirty thousand dollars on condition of their investing it in bond and mortgage, and applying it for the purpose of keeping an office and giving advice and information without charge to all emigrants arriving here, and for the purpose of protecting them against imposition." To the Home for aged Ladies he gave thirty thousand dollars, and to the Blind Asylum and the Half-Orphan Asylum each five thousand dollars. To the German Reformed Congregation, "of which I am a member," he left the moderate sum of two thousand dollars. These objects were wisely chosen. The sums left for them, also, were in many cases of the amount most likely to be well employed. Twenty-five thousand dollars he left to Columbia College, but unfortunately repented, and annulled the bequest in a codicil.

We need not enlarge on the success which has attended the bequest for the Astor Library—a bequest to which Mr. William B. Astor has added, in land, books, and money, about two hundred thousand dollars. It is the ornament and boast of the city. Nothing is wanting to its complete utility but an extension of the time of its being accessible to the public. Such a library, in such a city as this, should be open at sunrise, and close at ten in the evening. If but one studious youth should desire to avail himself of the morning hours before going to his daily work, the interests of that one would justify the directors in opening the treasures of the library at the rising of the sun. In the evening, of course, the library would probably be attended by a greater number of readers than in all the hours of the day together.

The bequest to the village of Waldorf has resulted in the founding of an institution that appears to be doing a great deal of good in a quiet German manner. The German biographer of Mr. Astor, from whom we have derived some particulars of his early life, expatiates upon the merits of this establishment, which, he informs us, is called the Astor House.

"Certain knowledge," he says, "of Astor's bequest reached Waldorf only in 1850, when a nephew of Mr. Astor's and one of the executors of his will appeared from New York in the testator's native town with power to pay over the money to the proper persons. He kept himself mostly in Heidelberg, and organized a supervisory board to aid in the disposition of the funds in accordance with the testator's intentions. This board was to have its head-quarters in Heidelberg, and was to consist of professors in the University there, and clergymen, not less than five in all. The board of control, however, consists of the clergy of Waldorf, the burgo-master, the physician, a citizen named every three years by the Common Council, and the governor of the institution, who must be a teacher by profession. This latter board has control of all the interior arrangements of the institution, and the care of the children and beneficiaries. The leading objects of the Astor House are: 1. The care of the poor, who, through age, disease, or other causes, are incapable of labor; 2. The rearing and instruction of poor children, especially those who live in Waldorf. Non-residents are received if there is room, but they must make compensation for their board and instruction. Children are received at the age of six, and maintained until they are fifteen or sixteen. Besides school instruction, there is ample provision for physical culture. They are trained in active and industrious habits, and each of them, according to his disposition, is to be taught a trade, or instructed in agriculture, market-gardening, the care of vineyards or of cattle, with a view to rendering them efficient farm-servants or stewards. It is also in contemplation to assist the blind and the deaf and dumb, and, finally, to establish a nursery for very young children left destitute. Catholics and Protestants are admitted on equal terms, religious differences not being recognized in the applicants for admission. Some time having elapsed before the preliminary arrangements were completed, the accumulated interest of the fund went so far toward paying for the buildings, that of the original fifty thousand dollars not less than forty-three thousand has been permanently invested for the support of the institution."

Thus they manage bequests in Germany! The Astor House was opened with much ceremony, January 9, 1854, the very year in which the Astor Library was opened to the public in the city of New York. The day of the founder's death is annually celebrated in the chapel of the institution, which is adorned by his portrait.

These two institutions will carry the name of John Jacob Astor to the latest generations. But they are not the only services which he rendered to the public. It would be absurd to contend that in accumulating his enormous estate, and in keeping it almost entire in the hands of his eldest son, he was actuated by a regard for the public good. He probably never thought of the public good in connection with the bulk of his property. Nevertheless, America is so constituted that every man in it of force and industry is necessitated to be a public servant. If this colossal fortune had been gained in Europe it would probably have been consumed in what is there called "founding a family." Mansions would have been built with it, parks laid out, a title of nobility purchased; and the income, wasted in barren and stupid magnificence, would have maintained a host of idle, worthless, and pampered menials. Here, on the contrary, it is expended almost wholly in providing for the people of New York the very commodity of which they stand in most pressing need; namely, new houses. The simple reason why the rent of a small house in New York is a thousand dollars a year is because the supply of houses is unequal to the demand. We need at this moment five thousand more houses in the city of New York for the decent accommodation of its inhabitants at rents which they can afford to pay. The man who does more than any one else to supply the demand for houses is the patient, abstemious, and laborious heir of the Astor estate. He does a good day's work for us in this business every day, and all the wages he receives for so much care and toil is a moderate subsistence for himself and his family, and the very troublesome reputation of being the richest man in America. And the business is done with the minimum of waste in every department. In a quiet little office in Prince Street the manager of the estate, aided by two or three aged clerks (one of them of fifty-five years' standing in the office), transacts the business of a property larger than that of many sovereign princes. Every thing, also, is done promptly and in the best manner. If a tenant desires repairs or alterations, an agent calls at the house within twenty-four hours, makes the requisite inquiries, reports, and the work is forthwith begun, or the tenant is notified that it will not be done. The concurrent testimony of Mr. Astor's tenants is, that he is one of the most liberal and obliging of landlords.

So far, therefore, the Astor estate, immense as it is, appears to have been an unmixed good to the city in which it is mainly invested. There is every reason to believe that, in the hands of the next heir, it will continue to be managed with the same prudence and economy that mark the conduct of its present proprietor. We indulge the hope that either the present or some future possessor may devote a portion of his vast revenue to the building of a new order of tenement houses, on a scale that will enable a man who earns a dollar and a half a day to occupy apartments fit for the residence of a family of human beings. The time is ripe for it. May we live to see, in some densely-populated portion of the city, a new and grander ASTOR HOUSE arise, that shall demonstrate to the capitalists of every city in America that nothing will pay better as an investment than HOUSES FOR THE PEOPLE, which shall afford to an honest laborer rooms in a clean, orderly, and commodious palace at the price he now pays for a corner of a dirty, fever-breeding barrack!

A NEW YEAR.

JACK HIGGINS'S peculiarity was that he was always surrounded with babies. Not that this is a disagreeable peculiarity, provided the babies are clean, will sit still on the floor, not cry for gingerbread, or entertain you by rolling from the top to the bottom of the back-stairs every hour or so, after the manner of infants generally.

There are children in story-books—model children in neat little bonnets, driving neat little hoops about a neat little flower-garden; children various in size, but alike in the grandeur of their moral qualities, who keep straight in the path, and never harm the flowers or tear their pinafores, growing "small by degrees and beautifully less," till they end in the arms of an enraptured nurse, holding a bundle of blankets with a baby inside, which appears to give the world no more trouble than a doll would under the same circumstances.

It is very pleasant to read such books. It has a fine effect on persons of a misanthropic turn of mind: your sympathies are so suddenly enlarged; you manifest such a pious devotion to the "angel visitors;" you grow so eloquent over the "Lights of a Household;" you have vague ideas of dispensing with kerosene altogether. In this state of mind you visit your married sister, or, like Mrs. Boffin, set out on a voyage of discovery for an orphan. The orphan adopted, or the period of service, as your sister's nursery-maid, brought to an end, your dream changes. The neat little garden, and the orderly procession driving orderly hoops through it, vanish from your mind's eye: your angels droop and lose their wings; kerosene is reinstated; you yourself show decided monastic tendencies; you have become sadder if not wiser in this world's experience. You have at last found out the real child who keeps you in all varieties of temperature; who takes you from the tropics to the polar regions without the least time for consideration; who chokes you with caresses one minute, and has a fit of sulks the next; who cries on all occasions when he ought not, and is sure to laugh when he ought to cry; who powders his face with the contents of your preserve-jars; who is always sick when you have company; who opens all your drawers, and builds a bonfire of your laces; who makes boats of your party slippers to sail in the wash-tub; who has such great blue eyes, and is so sorry for it all, that ten to one you take him up and kiss him, forgetting the switch you cut so carefully before you came up stairs. Decidedly of the earth, earthy. You own that for the rest of your lifetime, and cherish a secret grudge against the picture-book.

To which of the two species Infanta the little Higginses belonged I leave you to determine. Certain it is that their father was very well content with them, if one might judge from appearances. When he went to church there was a child led by each hand, two or three tugging at his long butternut coat, and an unknown quantity, whose devotional powers had not yet matured, crying for him on the door-steps. While he dozed they played hide-and-seek about the pew, his presence always represented to the congregation by the thumping of many pairs of juvenile boots, and the overturning of many crickets in the gallery. When he went to work innumerable little foot-tracks followed in the wake of his ponderous boots. If any one sent for Jack to put up a stove, two or three diminutive Jacks were adorning the parlor carpet, and turning to a surprising black color from creeping into the chimney. If a well was to be cleared, "the little fellars" stood agape and aghast by its mouth, sure to break into a simultaneous yell as their father descended into the water. And when he returned home at night the whole colony swarmed out to meet him, sprinkled along the road at intervals for half a mile.

He had finished his work early one December day, and was spending the afternoon playing with his children in order to secure a little variety. They had converted him into a telegraph post; twine wires entangled him from head to foot, and messages flew from finger to finger, and from button to button. He was smiling good-naturedly down upon the excited operators, pleased in his rough way to see their curls turn into gold in the afternoon sunlight; his wife was busied about the kitchen.

"Give the children a ternal good supper, Mollie," he said. "New-Year's eve don't come more nor once a year."

"Jack!" said Mrs. Higgins, severely.

Jack was well aware that his wife objected to his use of adjectives; so he sent a furious dispatch from his right-hand coat-pocket to the strap of his boot, and then, looking out of the window, began to whistle.

There had been a thaw for several days past, and the snow was melting on the fields; the broad, warm sunlight caught the patches of grass till they grew faintly green; odors of spring were in the air, and the very drifts under the walls, which melted in such crystal lights, told a story of violets and mosses hidden somewhere underneath. Beyond, over the slope, the ocean met the sky—a thousand little waves breaking the shadows of clouds that hung and trembled in the light. The wind, too, which came up from the beach was low and sweet as a lullaby.

Perhaps the picture had its vague influence over the man—enough to put a homely content into the tune he whistled. It was a pretty good sort of world after all, and it wasn't as bad a thing to work for one's daily bread as it might be—looking over, naturally enough, to his neighbor's windows.

It was a pleasant place, the one just opposite, much larger than his own, though not very large: the house was white, and the green of the blinds always fresh. There was a shady parlor and a sunny back-door—traces of many flowers in the summer, and a dead vine about the porch. While he was watching it lazily through the smoke of his pipe he saw Miss Harriet Locke come out into the yard. She had on her hood, and a little shawl over her shoulders. Some of Jane's milk-pans needed to be looked after; she hung a few laces too on the line to dry, and then went into the shed to feed the chickens. Looking over she saw Jack's ruddy face at the window, and the children, like so many cartes de visite of their father, staring each through a separate pane of glass. She nodded kindly enough, but did not smile. Presently Jack stopped his tune with a sudden quaver on its highest note.

"I'll be derved ef she ain't pokin' that 'ere wood about!"

"John Higgins!" said his wife, with an admonitory tap of the spoon with which she stirred her dough-nuts. But Jack was totally oblivious both of wife and spoon, for Miss Harriet Locke was beckoning to him to come over. Snapping the telegraph wires like a modern Samson, he seized his hat and went out of the door, the astonished corporation, enraged at this unexpected turn of affairs, shouting vociferously after him.

"Good-afternoon, Miss Harrit."

She was eying the well-piled wood, but turned as he came up, her face a little flushed and her voice unnecessarily sharp.

"Good-afternoon, Jack. You piled this wood?"

"Yes, marm, every stick on't with my own hands—finished chuck on twelve o'clock, and there ain't a better piled cord o' wood in town, I'll warrant."

"It is very well piled," said Miss Harriet; "but what possessed you to put it in this shed? It never goes here."

"That's where Miss Cynthy told me, marin; says she, 'Pile it in the south shed, Jack,' and so in course I did."

"Miss Cynthia told you, did she?" Miss Harriet spoke, quickly.

"You ken ask her yourself," replied Jack, doggedly.

"You knew that wasn't the place, Jack."

"I only obeyed orders, Miss Harrit, and ef you ain't suited I'm sorry for't."

Jack was turning away as if he supposed the conference to be at an end. Harriet Locke was not often forgetful of her dignity with her inferiors, and, repressing a sudden impulse to say that her orders were as good as her sister's, she called him back in a softer tone.

"It's no matter, Jack, if you were told to put it here; I only wanted to ask. How are the children?" putting her hand down on the tangled curls of the one nearest to her.

"Smart as a button," returned Jack, grinning broadly; "hain't none on 'em ben sick an hour sence we driv off the last o' the measles. You would split your sides laughin', Miss Harrit, to see them little fellars eat! Sometimes I be put to't at a dollar a day to keep 'em in victuals; there's no keepin' 'count of the potatoes and beans and fried puddin', and, I swannee! their mother does give 'em such dinners Sundays, there's no keepin' of 'em awake in meetin' no way."

Miss Harriet smiled, and looking round upon the circle of wide-open mouths, appeared much impressed by Jack's statement.

"Then there's Tim into the bargain," continued Jack, thoughtfully; "he's most as big as I be a'ready; he's a great 'un for the gals, Tim is, jes' as like to me, when I was a young fellar, as two peas in a pod."

Miss Harriet did not feel called upon to make any reply, and Jack proceeded.

"I've took half-holiday seein' to-morrow's New Year; hain't took none afore sence Thanksgiving; worked all Christmas, put her through on them kindlin's o' yourn. Mother she's ben cookin' up all day fur the children; she'll beat herself holler workin' for 'em, that woman will—holler as a bad nut."

"You enjoy your holidays, don't you, Jack?" her voice full of some vague regret.

"Wa'al, it's my 'pinion on that pint, he'd be a tough-hearted chap that didn't, all cozyin' up to the fire, and the children playin' round, and—I reckon I do!"

Something in the expression that spread itself over Jack's broad, good-natured face caused Harriet Locke's smile to fade, unconsciously to herself perhaps.

"Make the most of them, Jack," she said, quite gravely, turning away to throw a handful of corn among the hens. Jack took this as a sign that the conversation was at an end, and gathered up his flock for departure.

"Drop in and see us ef 'tain't too much trouble, do, Miss Harrit; we allers like to see folks on a holiday."

"Thank you," she said, kindly; but she did not promise to come.

"Growin' cooler; goin' to be a blow to-night, sure," persisted Jack, looking toward the sea. But receiving some very laconic answer, he touched his hat respectfully and walked away.

Harriet Locke leaned against the wood-pile, and watched him, hardly knowing why. Something in his hearty, happy laugh and the kisses of his children hurt her. She wished to get away from it, she shrank from looking upon the joy of his simple home. If she knew why this was, she did not own the reason to herself. She caught up a long sigh impatiently, and, turning round, faced the fresh breeze from the water. She drank it in with quick, sharp breathing, it was so cool, so pure and passionless; she longed thirstily to take it into her heart, she cried for its soothing. But something prevented this; it only turned to fever in her blood. Her eyes looking over to the sea, sought there, too, something which she did not find. A silence brooded over the fields; the beach stretched out lazily in the sun white and torpid; the warm, golden waves which broke upon it were lost in a calm of purple distance. The breathless sky, the very lull of the sleepy wind maddened her. She looked young as she stood there—younger by ten years than she was. Her face, even in its customary thin and sallow look, gave traces of former beauty, and just then she formed a pleasant picture. Her hair, which the years had not robbed of its soft, golden color, fell about her face, the curls of a past fashion to be sure, but suited to her; all that kept the memories of a lost youth was suited to her, the warm color flushing her cheeks, and the light in her eyes alike. In one such moment you would have understood her, when weeks of ordinary acquaintance might only have puzzled you.

For some reason the insight she had just had into the humble home of her workman staid by her. These people enjoyed their holidays so; and she as well as they had once loved to welcome the New Year. They cared so much for each other—why, Jack was really proud of his uncouth children. Well, why should he not be? They were his own, they climbed upon his knees and played about his sunny kitchen: he was their father, and they loved him. That afternoon, when she had spoken to the little girl and touched its forehead, the child shrank away. Probably her hand was cold—she had no gloves. But somehow she could not forget it: who loved her? who cared to watch for her and kiss her? Why did she chill all the happy, young life about her; why did all alike turn from her? She might have answered her own questions; but like many another she would not. The thought, turning itself in her mind, rankled bitterly. Happy homes and merry holidays were for others—God had decreed that there should be none for her. She clasped her hands with an impatient gesture as if she would throw off this burden of life—this weary, pitiless burden! It grew so heavy; how could she bear it?

"Harriet!" called a voice from the house. She turned quickly, dropping her hands.

"Harriet, I'm afraid you'll take cold."

The tones—neither gentle nor unkind—jarred just then. She made no reply, and turned her face again toward the sea. A sister? Why, yes; of course she had a sister. And a home? Better than nothing, perhaps, but not much to be thankful for. She would have been surprised to be told otherwise. The discontent darkened bitterly on her face. The wind blowing up from the sea chilled her: she shivered, and, drawing her shawl about her shoulders, turned to go into the house.

The brightness on her cheeks and eyes had not faded when she opened the sitting-room door. Her sister, sitting quietly at her knitting, looked up when she came in and looked surprised.

"You don't seem much as if you'd taken cold—that's a fact," she said; "but I'm afraid you have, and we shall have you down sick to-morrow."

"I rather think I know how to take care of myself; and if I am sick, I promise not to trouble you to take care of me," replied Harriet, taking a seat by the fire. Cynthia made no reply, and they rocked in silence, watching the sluggish smoke that curled up the chimney.

"I don't see," began the younger sister at last, "what you had that wood put in the south shed for. You know it isn't half as dry, and we never have it there."

Cynthia made some quiet reply; she was always the last to lose her good temper. But Harriet was dissatisfied with her reasons, and still more with her manner: its contrast to her own was not pleasant.

"It would be supposed that I should sometimes be consulted in regard to household affairs, and that every order I may choose to give would not be so religiously disregarded," she said, heroically.

"You are at perfect liberty to do as you like," returned Cynthia, in her indifferent way. "You know very well that you never did know how to take care of a house; and if you're not satisfied with my management, I don't see as it can be helped."

"This reminds me of a child's book I once read about two good little sisters who loved each other—this is an affectionate world!" said Harriet, with a bitter laugh.

Cynthia stooped to pick up her ball.

"Especially if one isn't blessed with a temper," continued her sister, for want of a better retort.

Cynthia took up a book.

Harriet tapped the floor nervously with her foot and compressed her lips—then she also was silent. Not that it made any difference to her whether the wood was in the south shed or the North Pole. Of course it didn't; it was the principle she objected to. Cynthia always would have her own way, and she was tired of being ordered round like a girl and—How far the list of grievances might have gone on I can not say if it had not been interrupted by Cynthia's leaving the room. Just at that moment a large brand rolled down upon the hearth, and there being no one else to attend to it, Harriet was obliged to devote all her energies to the rebuilding of the fire—and her meditations about the wood-shed were cut short.

Perhaps you smile that I tell you of such a child's quarrel between two women past the prime of life—sensible, kind-hearted women, who read together daily at the same altar the Book, out of which they had learned together as little children to be "kindly affectioned"—women who, in a world of life and love, were left alone to be helpers each to the other—who bore in secret many burdens that might have been tenderly shared; whose hearts, aching with unshed tears, should have yearned one to another—who looked forward to an old age whose weakness and loneliness would meet them both together—who would pass on, side by side, to the death which it brought at last. No, you do not smile—it saddens you as it does me.

Cynthia came back presently with her work and sat down again. She did not notice her sister or speak. It was no intentional ill-humor, as Harriet very naturally supposed. The shade of some sad thought was on her face; and who that has Cynthia Locke's reticent nature does not know how a cloud no bigger than a man's hand will grow and darken till it closes on the horizon and shuts out all sight of the world beyond it?

She was overlooking a box of bright-colored ribbons, pretty bits of girl's finery, many of them little worn and fresh as if some happy young fingers had taken them off but yesterday and laid them away. Cynthia took them up, one by one, passing her thin hands tenderly over each, lingering to fold and unfold, and fold again, some quaint, soft pattern. Harriet watched her with an idle curiosity. Her eye was caught by the contrast of the gay colors against her sister's black dress—Cynthia always wore black. There was something pitiful in it. So there was, too, in the old, pale face with its compressed lips, in the dreariness of the inexpectant eyes, and the gray of the hair that had been once so dark.

"What are you doing?" she said, at length, as Cynthia began to rip apart some bows of bright blue ribbon.

"I am going to give this to Jane for a bonnet trimming; she needs one, and I suppose it is foolish to buy when this is lying useless."

"Of course it is. I wonder you haven't used them before."

Harriet had not heard the faltering in her sister's voice; she did not see how many times she laid down her scissors, how she turned away, her whole face quivering, nor how the quiet tears stood in her eyes and dropped upon her work. If she had, would she have understood? Would she not have wondered pettishly what Cynthia was crying about? It may be so. She did not know of all the young, bright memories bound up in those pretty trifles; she did not think what a story they each told to the desolate woman. Woman-like, the very finery she had worn in the days of her joy had grown sacred. Such little—such very little things! Only a withered flower that hands long cold had placed in the girl's bright hair—only a bit of ribbon whose tint against the girl's cheek had pleased the eyes long dim! Do you wonder at this pain? I think it no irreverence to believe it is not forgotten or uncomforted in heaven.

Harriet turned away to look out of the window; she had meant nothing unkind, and forgot her words with their utterance. Cynthia worked on in silence, unthinking that others too might suffer, that to each some burden falls—that her younger sister might be longing for gentle words which she could speak.

I know I tell you of a truthful experience. That these two women should sit and watch the dreary afternoon together, see the long shadows of the evening creeping up the hills, and bear the darkness that fell into the heart of each, as far apart as if a world had sundered them, is no uncommon story.

The day was full of memories that they might have shared. Many pleasant holidays had brought them as children round this same fireside. Many nights they had watched the old year out, and dreamed their girls' dreams together. Many voices long passed into silence had mingled cheerily with their own in this same old room. It was bright to-night with almost forgotten pictures—one upon another, brightening and fading—one upon another, each with its own sad or joyful story. So long ago it had been a happy room, before the mother's step about the house was hushed or the father's hair was silvered. So long ago the old man had given them his last blessing, and they had carried him too to his rest. So many years they had sat here in the twilight—they two alone. So they sat together now—they two alone.

Oh these dead and dying years! With what a cry do we call them back! what pleading arms do we stretch out to them! So full they are of all we hold dearest and brightest; so hard it is to let them go; so weakly we sit and shiver to hear the merry midnight bells, to see the cold light creeping up the hills, to feel the sure coming of a new year for which we have no welcome.

Harriet Locke, in the midst of her bitter musings, felt at last the long shadow of a leafless tree upon her forehead, and glad, with an impatient desire for change, to know that the afternoon was passing, rose to order tea.

"Supper gives one something to think about, at any rate," she said to her sister.

"It makes no difference that I know of," replied Cynthia, abstractedly.

Harriet shrugged her shoulders and went to call Jane. Passing into the kitchen she found it empty. She called, but the handmaiden was not. Another grievance. Why couldn't servants always "stay put" instead of making you race the house over after them? Miss Harriet, however, did not race the house over, but finding the kitchen fire warm and inviting preferred to stand and meditate over the coals. While thus employed she heard a familiar voice through the half-open door.

"Law, Tim! how can you now?"

Looking out of the window, Jane and the susceptible Tim appeared tête-à-tête upon the door-steps. The young lady, in lieu of a handkerchief, was twisting her dish-towel bashfully, and her chubby hands, warm and pink from their immersion in the suds, looked to Tim's eyes as fair, perhaps, as if they were small and white, and bore the flash of diamonds.

They formed a pretty picture—Tim's hearty farmer's face all aglow, and the girl's honest eyes so full of the old story.

A kindlier heart than Harriet Locke's was just then would have warmed at it.

"You know," said Jane, coquettishly, "you like Betsey Hodges a heap better nor me."

"Jerusalem! Jenny, I'll be blessed if I do! I dished her long ago."

Tim's cavalierly manner could not fail of conviction. He may also have confirmed it by some conclusive method entirely satisfactory to the young lady; for when she came in at her mistress's call her pretty round cheeks were burning, and her eyes dropped shyly on the ground.

"Jane, what have you been about? I want you to get supper now immediately, and not idle any longer."

Harriet's heart smote her for this petty impatience as she turned away. She could not help thinking that Cynthia would not have done thus. She would only have smiled—her sad smile—and spoken to the girl quite kindly. Ah! but it was not with Cynthia as with her.

The cloud on her face darkened as she came back and began to pace the room impatiently. This little thing had jarred so—that the very servant in her kitchen should be blessed—that every where she turned on this, to her, most bitter night, this joy and love with which the world was full should sting her! You blame her. Yet judge her not harshly; for the dark pages of her experience were written with no softening lines. Many tears unshed will freeze at the heart; and who that feels the chill knows of them?

Jane brought in the tea-things at last, her good-natured face grown quite pretty with her bit of a dream, which was as sweet to her as it had been once to the two women who sat and watched her silently.

"Is that all, Miss Cynthia?" fingering a little cornelian ring furtively.

"Yes, except the toast."

"That's most ready. I'm going to butter it with Betsey Hodges—I mean with the new butter, and then I'll bring it."

"Very well, you may go, Jane."

Jane went, blushing scarlet. Cynthia smiled; Harriet sipped her tea, and said nothing. It was yet very early, but Harriet had wanted light, and the room was warm and pleasant, with its cozy table spread for two, and the crackling of the fire. It might have been home-like if either of them had chosen to have it so. The burden of the gloomy and silent meal grew too heavy at last. Harriet pushed back her chair impatiently.

"You are very entertaining to-night, Cynthia."

"So are you."

"I do declare one might as well be without a sister!"

"That's a rule that works both ways," replied Cynthia, with unwonted temper and an unusual color flushing her pale cheek. Both rose then, and went each her own way. It was perfectly natural to Cynthia to go up stairs and lock herself in alone. It was as natural for Harriet, as being the younger and more adventurous, to throw on her cloak and hood, shut the street door hard, and start off for a walk in the cold, clear sunset.

She turned her face seaward, over fields where the snow had hardened under the evening wind, and the patches of grass, losing all their boast of pallid green, had frozen crisp and sere; over frosty walls, which she climbed even yet with some of the nimbleness of her younger years; through little well-worn foot-paths half hidden by the shallow snow, and down at last upon the beach, which stretched out, a dull expanse of marbled pavement, under her feet.

Passing some chalky rocks which lay high upon the shore out of reach of the tide, and covered with some scant field-growth that had found its way to them, she stopped suddenly. Not that the rocks were picturesque, or that any fantastic shape was there to catch her eye. It was simply an old memory which, coming back, struck her sharply. It was on New Year's eve, and many years ago, that she had come out at this same hour to walk upon the beach, and stopped just here to rest a moment. Far down among the rocks a figure was moving and coming toward her. She had watched it idly as she sat, the sunset light bright on her golden hair and in her eyes. She had watched it wondering as it came nearer; and the stranger—his form in full relief against the sky, his eyes like her own, bright and deep in the light—paused a moment in surprise to see her there, murmured some apology, and with a bow passed on. And as he walked over the fields she had turned to look again.

Her breath grew sharp and quick as she remembered. Better had she gone that night down into the calm wide ocean, and that its waves had caught her away! Compressing her lips sharply, and turning with a quick, nervous walk once more to the sea.

Reaching it at last, she climbed the cliffs that stood low upon the shore, then down their stair-like sides, and out upon a narrow ledge of rock covered with dank barnacles, and jutting into the yellow sand left weed-strewn by the tide. It looked like the ruins of a wharf in the ruin of a sea. She herself did not mar the fancy as she stood upon it, her figure, in its dark cloak, sharp against the glow of the sky; the wind blowing her bright hair—so bright for its old, sad fashion; her face, which the light touched, pale with its wreck of beauty; her thin hands, which had been once young and fair, thrown down and crossed so hopelessly.

There was a strange contradiction in the life this woman had led, but one common as mysterious. Her long-lost youth and beauty had not failed of finding their due of love. There were those who, but for the slow scorn in her face, would have come back gladly to Harriet Locke that night, standing even as she was, such a pitiful shadow of herself, by those desolate waters; who had lived long years homeless for her sake, as she for another's. To her who held the power over so much love and so much misery the one love had been denied, and the one misery decreed.

All the bitterness which had wrung itself into her heart from each one of these deserted years was on her face as, turning, she sat down upon the slippery rock to watch the sea. There was no softening of its hard lines; no lowly trust, learned from long submission, in her eyes; no tenderness upon her lips. The crown of sorrow, nobly borne, was not there. I think it not strange that she did not wear it, though it would well have graced her brows, and shone with surpassing brightness, as hardly won. Scorned! Did it not take every throb of her heart's life to meet and bear and battle with the galling word? Is any like it? She had needed love and strength these many years to help her face it, and none had come to her.

So I think you would have gone away sorrowful if you had seen her and heard her stifled cry. The night was passionate, glowing, full of gorgeous dreams that brought to her no cool or calm. The wind, catching the roar of breakers on some distant beach, swept by like some grand, triumphal chant; the cliffs towered against the sky—a huge palace, golden in the light, with the dash of sea-birds' wings against its windows, and its arches filled with the music of many tides. Opal tints shifted and paled upon the sea; the waves broke in tongues of flame; the west beyond, like some gigantic mountain on fire, died royally.

The brightness closed in around the woman sitting so alone—she the only dark or unjoyful thing within it. The smile which chilled her face at the thought faded suddenly. The aching at her heart turned to actual pain; she wrung her hands over it, her face melting and breaking, the great sobs choking her. The old joys and the old pain crowded thickly together, the vague thrill that had crept into that other New-Year's eve so like, so unlike this; a summer filled with fragrance, bright with sunny fields, and roses never so sweet before; a voice and a face that haunted this winter night now as then. A cloud sweeping over the golden harvest hours, silence where had been words that made each day beautiful, and, where a smile had met her, only the coming of autumn, and the green leaves dropping in the forest. She called it all back imperiously. She met it face to face with a certain impatient will to choose the rack since torture was sure. To be left—to be left without one kind word! that he should make her love his plaything, then go out into the world where she was not and forget her. She was not old and faded in those golden days; many another was proud if she but smiled, but this one, he alone turned from her. She hated him with bitter hatred, yet for him all life was darkened. She cursed the very splendor of this princely night for its memories of the one year standing alone in all her life into which he had come. Yet because of him she would have turned even then to the bright waters, and sought the death they would give her as gladly as a weary child its rest.

No thought of home, of any other love of sister or friend came to help her. She seemed to herself shut in alone with her bitter fate, alone with this waste of waters. She raised her eyes to look off upon it. The gold of the waves had dimmed to amber, and the amber had dulled to dreary gray. A cloud had closed down heavily upon the brightness of the sky; a long line of stormy red in the west came sharp against it; the palace front had become a mass of frowning rock; gulls shrieked and wheeled in the air above her; some dark uncanny object rose and fell upon the waves quite near her; it was a piece of an old wreck. It came to her as an ill omen as she strained her eyes to watch it through the gloom. She shivered, and, drawing her cloak about her, rose to go home.

But what was that? Why did the black waves tower and break so? Where was the weed-strewn beach? What meant this water surging past her? How came that sound of breakers against the cliffs behind?

The tide up and she had not known it! How long had it dashed through the cove beyond? Standing upon the slippery ledge, the wind breaking in sharp gusts about her, she tried to pierce the dusk. Sea and sky and cliff were one; dull dead gray, and the faster dash of waves; that was all.

Harriet Locke was not a timid woman, but her face paled as she retraced her steps over the rock, now wet with the spray.

Reaching its abrupt end at last she stopped.

Mad waves hurrying through, breaking at her feet, lashing the rocks! The cliffs frowning across, the sky dark above!

To breast the torrent was certain death, and to stay— She tried to test the depth of the water, but fell back clinging on the rock; in another moment she would have been its plaything.

She took the truth in clearly. Sitting down quietly upon the rock, to keep the better hold upon its slippery surface, she looked about her. A certain calm comes to natures like hers in danger, which is wonderful for strength and beauty. All the weakness and petty impatience and uncontrollable nerve that makes up the everyday woman passes out of sight as if it had never been. A power is there of which you have not dreamed. You thought hers to be the merest womanly soul; it becomes suddenly that of hero.

Harriet Locke watched the curling line that rose and broke and fell about her. She put her hand into the water and felt its chill; she quivered under the wind that came with a shriek over leagues and leagues of ocean waste to blow upon her; she looked out to the dead black distance where to-morrow's tide would go surging back; she looked upon the shore and knew that it tossed her call away, and that none could hear it.

Then she gathered her cloak about her and sat quite still.

I know that it is one thing to weary of life and another to give it up when it is asked for; that it is an easy thing to look on death from afar, and quite another to face it in some sharp and sudden terror.

Yet I speak truly when I tell you that in that first still moment Harriet Locke was conscious of nothing but a wild flash of joy. Years of captivity—and the prison-doors were opened! Years of twilight weeping—now no more tears or sighing! Scorned and deserted years. Now the triumph of a life bound by no shackles of earth! Now the rest of a life which should bring her home and love!

But something catching her eye struck sharply against this dream and it faded. It was a little thing; many another time she would not have noticed it; only an hour before she had turned away from it; it had then no voice for her, it told no softening story.

It was a light in her own home—in Cynthia's room. Past the turn of the cliff, over the dark fields and through the branches of the old familiar garden trees she saw it quite plainly. Cynthia's room! her own room too. How many years they had shared it, since the days when it held a trundle-bed, and two children slept in each other's arms, their faces rosy in the fire-light! How many, many years! They were so old now, and the house had never held them one night apart. Yes, there was one, Harriet had almost forgotten it. A dark, stormy night, and over the telegraph wires had flashed some sudden message to Cynthia. She did not come to bed that night; they had heard the front-door shut, and knew that she had gone away alone to the sea. She had waked many times in the night and had not found her, but when the morning came Cynthia was lying upon the bed beside her, dressed as she had been the day before, her eyes closed, her hands quite still upon her breast, her tangled hair all wet, as if with the spray of midnight waves.

Poor Cynthia! Since then she had been so changed. She would have been such a happy bride, and there was nothing left to her but widowhood. She had had a hard life—what wonder she grew forgetful even of her sister? What wonder when that sister would not be to her a comforter?

How fast the pictures crowded up! With what shame of herself she saw them! Years of petty jars and strifes, so full of her own thoughtless and bitter words—the distance growing and greatingening between them, when they might have been so much each to the other: their home but something endured, not loved—its sweet fire-side lights, that might have gladdened many another, all darkened!

These memories, one upon another, came in the flash of a moment: her ear never once lost the thunder of the surge; her eye marked every inch of water that rose against the rock. The foam of each tossing wave seemed to catch that light in the window; how it glowed and brightened! What a cheery look of home and love it had! And the waves that grew deeper and higher were very cold.

Cynthia was in her room now; her heart so lonely on this New-Year's eve, and no sister was there to cheer and kiss her. None would ever be. None would ever go back to her and sob upon her neck, and hold her closely, weeping out the penitent love of so many, many years.

Perhaps Cynthia thought of her now—perhaps her face was pale with the unkindness of this bitter afternoon—perhaps she knelt and prayed alone. So she would kneel and pray alone to-morrow.

Did she miss her? Did she wonder where she was? Did she care to hear her voice and see her face—her wayward sister, who had loved her when she was a little child? How pleasant the room was looking now! She could almost see it through the white curtain; how cozy and comfortable the fire! how warm the lamp-light upon the old red chairs and on the ivy in the window! How many times she had laughed at that worn furniture, and scolded about those troublesome plants! Now she should never see them again. How gray Cynthia's hair was! how sad her quivering mouth! how thin and old her poor, poor hands!

This desert line of water was very dark, and the great black waves stretched out such fearful arms. How that ominous wreck rose and fell—rose and fell! Why would no one hear her call? If Cynthia could catch its faintest echo! If she only knew!

A wave swept across her, chilling her hands that clung so helplessly to the slimy weeds.

One more cry! With what a shriek the wind caught it away! How bright the light in the old room! how it moved! yes—some one—Cynthia raised the curtain; she looked out upon this tossing sea, where this ruined wood eyed her like an evil thing. A wreck! What would she be to-morrow? Was it there only to torture her? Would she and it together float in the surge, and catch the twining of the wet weeds all night? A dash of surf upon her face took her breath sharply; a gull whirled by her, and away, shrieking into the night.

The light and the figure at the window were gone—it was passing down stairs—it was bright again in the sitting-room, then in the kitchen. Cynthia had missed her.

Another storm of surf—the weeds were slipping from her frozen hands. It was too late—too late! Cynthia would not find her; she must go and never tell her—never kiss her! Death! it was so cold and dark! Who would help her? There was an old promise; she remembered it with a cry as her hold loosened from the rock: "When thou passest through the waters." He who spoke it would be with her; for she had not thought to die alone. She called Him feebly. There was a thundering of surges in her ears—home and Cynthia. Then the ruin of a wharf and the ruin of a sea were gone. The tide rolling up smoothly swept like a song of evil triumph against the cliffs. Sky and wind and a wilderness of waves; the wreck among the rocks that rose and fell; the lowering and chill of a winter's storm; and that was all.

Across the fields and through the garden trees the light still glimmered faintly, and the rain beat upon the old home-roof. Cynthia Locke went up stairs that night and into her room, with something sadder than usual in the slow and feeble step which had been hers for many years. She closed and locked her door, drew a chair up to the fire and sat down, leaning her head upon her hand very, very wearily.

There was something appealing in the picture, in the gray hair brushed back under its black cap, in the sharp angles of her face—an old woman's face, though she was but forty-three; in the solitude of her eyes—you might meet such eyes upon a desert; in the hand with its one dulled ring, and in the very attitude of her quiet figure.

In Cynthia Locke's nature grief, like love, endured to the end. It was no less to her now than it had been long years ago, when it had struck suddenly upon the sunlight of her girlhood, a heavy cloud and full of storms. Not less but more. Whatever its sealed story, which none knew or would ever know, the burden borne so patiently was a heavy one. I think you will say that. I think you would have longed to give her that silent sympathy which alone she would receive; to speak all words tenderly to her, if so you might help her, remembering Him from whom no mourner ever turned away un comforted.

Yet her sorrow had its blessings as its pain. Many gifts through suffering might have been hers. Gifts of tender help and love. Hearts which groped in darkness, to whom she should bring light; hearts like her own perishing in a dry and thirsty land, to whom she should send the refreshing of a new life; wayward and wandering hearts who needed but the gentleness of such a touch as hers.

So I think her sister was not all to blame in their slow estrangement. Harriet, like many another with her lot to bear, was perverse and petulant and thoughtless. But the long disappointment of years had turned acrid in her heart. There were no softening memories in it, no sense of unseen help, no hopes for a future into which death could not enter. Only the sense of a forsaken eternity, and the sting of tortured pride. She did not suffer as much as her sister; her heart in its self-scorn found yet many joys on earth that Cynthia could not share; she did not suffer as much, but more hopelessly, and therefore far more bitterly. Might not Cynthia have done more than bear her pettish vagaries, and keep silent in all these little jars of their everyday life? She had strength that Harriet knew not of. She should, I think, have borne most tenderly with her; she should have taken this her younger sister by the hand, and led her gently over all rough places and thorny roads. And to bring that stormy life at last into the calm of green fields and chastened sunlight would have been indeed a jewel in her crown.

Some vague thought of this crossed Cynthia's mind as she sat watching the fire. But it was very vague, and, scarcely taking form, faded away before the shadow that lay so heavily upon her own heart.

The night was voiceful for her as for her sister. The first day of the New Year! It was to have been her marriage day. And, miles away, there was a lonely grave over which the evening wind was wailing. It was nearer to her heart to-night than anything else in all the world.

She rose at last, and, unlocking one of her drawers, took therefrom a box and laid it upon the table. She stopped before she opened it, passing her fingers over some delicate white flowers on its cover with a feeble, trembling motion, like the hands guided by blind eyes.

She took the things out one by one, her face bowed over them, her fingers touching them reverently. Some old letters, yellow and faded, and blurred with many tears; the faint perfume of some withered flowers, which kept the semblance of a wreath, as do those we place upon a grave when they are soaked with autumn rains. A gift or two that would please a girl's fancy, and a lock of clinging hair. Under these the folds of a silken dress, soft and white; a veil which fell out over Cynthia's fingers as she touched it, and floated down to the ground like a thing of life; dainty slippers, which might have kept time themselves to some merry music; and a pair of soft gloves—so soft a little hand within them would hardly have felt their touch. All once of purest white; now faintly yellow. Very faintly, however, for Time had dealt kindly with them: the sad, pale tint was only sad enough and pale enough to touch them with a blessing beautiful for sacredness.

Cynthia laid them all out upon her lap, took them up one by one, and laid them down again. None of them had been worn, nor would be. Made ready for a day which had never come, they were folded away with all their happy dreamings; turned into the dark like a mute, white face in waiting. As if the girl had laid them away trustfully, still looking for that day which never came.

What was in Cynthia Locke's soul this night I can not tell you. Far be it from me, for it is holy ground. God only, who had smitten her, knew or shall ever know the darkness of its waste places. She trod them alone with Him.

Her face, when she rose at last to fold and lay away the bridal dress, spoke the peace of a heart to which He had indeed been near. No selfish grieving could be where He had been. All homely joys and loves and common duties grew suddenly beautiful for His sake. It had been often so before, but never as now. She thought she would like to talk with her sister a while—where was Harriet? It was some time since she had seen her; she would go down stairs and hunt her up. She must have been lonely all this evening; she must be often lonely. Some regret was on her face just then, some pang at her heart.

So often do we face a duty just as its call has ceased; so often we have but learned to miss a blessing, and it is gone from us.

Cynthia took up her lamp and went down stairs. She opened the sitting-room door, and spoke, her voice quite gentle: "Haven't you been—"

But there she stopped, for the room was empty. Harriet's low rocking-chair stood before the fire as she had left it. Some gust sweeping in at the open door stirred it; while she looked it rocked slowly back and forth. The embers were smouldering on the hearth, the windows rattled in the storm, and still as she stood listening that blank, bare chair rocked slowly.

A vague chill crept into Cynthia's heart; she shivered and turned to go out. Then she came back, put her foot upon the chair, and stopped it with some impatience. Turning as she closed the door a second time, she looked back—it still was rocking slowly.

She crossed the entry with a bit of self-contempt in her smile; Harriet was of course in the kitchen. There was some confusion there as she turned the handle. Jane was sitting by the stove, her cheeks the color of its coals, knitting as demurely as if she had done nothing else throughout the evening. Some scuffling was on the door-steps, however, and the girl began to push away an empty chair that had stood quite near her own.

For some reason this reminded Cynthia of an expression she caught on Harriet's face that evening at supper-time. How young and pretty she had looked to-night! How feverish that light in her eyes! What ailed her? She wished she had asked.

"Has Miss Harriet been here, Jane?"

"No, mum, she hain't. I heern the front door shut long since."

"She didn't come this way then?" going to the window in an anxious way.

"No, mum—indeed, mum, she didn't. You needn't look that way for her—I know she ain't there."

Jane's confusion was increasing. At any other time her mistress would have smiled. Now she only left the room quite gravely, and put on her shawl and rubbers to go out. Harriet must be over at Jack's; she would step in and call for her, and they would come home together. There had been none to make her New-Year's eve, and she had gone away to forget it and herself. Poor Harriet!

If you had looked into Jack Higgins's kitchen that night your eye would have been caught by two principal adornments, each of them good in their proper place and quantity, lavished here with wild profusion. I refer to children and dough-nuts. Of which time would fail me to tell you; children upon their father's knee, pulling at their mother's skirts, under the table, on the table, in front of the stove, behind the stove, on the chairs, and on the floor. Dough-nuts in pans, dough-nuts upon plates, dough-nuts cushioning all available seats and paving the floor; dough-nuts in the hands and in the mouths of all the children upon their father's knee, pulling their mother's dress, under the table, on the table, in front of the stove, behind the stove, on the chairs, and on the floor.

To say that Jack was happy would be but a meagre expression. The group did not indeed form an unpleasant picture. The covers of the stove were off, and the light fell warmly on the little brown faces and bright eyes; the mother, too, in her neat, holiday dress, was very fair in her husband's eyes that night.

"I say for't," he remarked, admiringly, "ef you don't look like Mollie Jenkins, fur all the world, I'm beat; jes' the way you was when I come courtin'—'long in hayin' time it was too—eh, Mollie?"

"Don't be foolish, Jack," replied his wife, in a stifled voice, quite smothered by the arms of some affectionate infant, who was employing its time in journeying from her lap to her shoulder and down the back of her chair, returning by a vociferous express to the original station.

"At any rate," puffed Jack through his pipe, with the tone of one who has made a point in an argument, "Tim's some on the gals."

"Tim does very well." His mother's one sin was pride in that young gentleman.

"Tim does well enough—all his nonsense you've learned him."

"You can't say I didn't know what I was up to when I set up fur a wife," said Jack, with triumph in his eye.

Mrs. Higgins appreciatively fished up an enormous nut from among its fellows and expressed it to her husband. The engineer, apparently feeling no responsibility for freightage, managed to dispose of it on the trip.

"Where is the boy now?"

"Over to Miss Locke's," replied his father.

"Miss Locke's! what does she want of him?"

"Oh, only some little business," said Jack, discreetly. Mrs. Jack looked incredulous; he puffed away in silence.

"It is any how," he broke out at last.

"Mercy on us! what a start you give me—is what?"

"This is a slick sort o' home of ourn; ain't it now?"

"Well, if I say it as shouldn't say it, it's happier nor some greater folks'—neighbors too," returned his wife, significantly.

A great disturbance at the door drew the eyes of the whole colony to it just then. It was the son and heir: he stumbled up the steps and stood with the door half open.

"What are you letting in all that draught for, Timothy?"

"Mother, you just hush up, will you?" said the cavalierly Tim. "Can't a gentleman listen on his own threshold when he thinks he hears a noise?"

The argument was unanswerable, and Mrs. Higgins subsided.

"It is," said Tim, at length.

"What?"

"Somebody hollerin' down on the beach."

In a moment that gentleman found himself penned in the midst of the whole family without any prospect of egress or ingress. They listened as quietly as possible under the circumstances. They heard it quite plainly above the roar of the surf—a long, sharp cry.

Some one opened the gate and approached the steps. It was Miss Cynthia Locke. She came up to them, the light from the open door falling full on her face.

"Is Miss Harriet here?" speaking hurriedly, with some attempt at a smile.

"No, marm; nor she hain't ben here—not but what we'd be glad to see her and you too, Miss Cynthy."

"She hasn't been here at all?"

"Not anigh the house to-day, no nigher nor the wood-pile in that south shed o' yourn; ain't lost, is she?"

Cynthia Locke's face had paled suddenly. Jack saw it and looked at his wife; his wife looked at him.

"Where can she be?" said Miss Cynthia, her voice full of ill-repressed alarm.

"Ain't she to some o' the neighbors, Miss Cynthy?"

"No," shaking her head; she felt very sure of that.

Tim, who had started with a lantern for the beach to discover the cause of the cry they had heard a moment before, turned about before he had crossed the first field, and came back running.

"I declare if a fellar hadn't ought to be blowed for losin' his wits like this. I see Miss Harriet along by sundown goin' off toward the sea, and I never thought on't till this blessed minute."

"Thunder and lightning!" said Jack, looking at Miss Cynthia, "an' that ere hollerin'—"

"A cry? Did you hear a cry, Jack?"

"Thunder and lightning! Miss Cynthy."

Jack could say no more. Cynthia Locke had grasped his arm; but he shook her hand off and strode off with Tim to the beach.

She followed him without a word or cry. Over the fields along the little worn foot-path Harriet had trodden in the sunset light; over the walls she had climbed so nimbly. She stopped a moment to get breath and look about her, when she stood at last upon the beach.

The sky was black above her, the sands black under her feet, the cliffs and sea before her were black. Running her eye along the shore, she caught the gleam of Tim's lantern, and saw the figures of the two men unfastening a boat that lay high upon the sand.

A boat? Where then was Harriet? She looked up to the cliffs; dark and still and empty, they looked down on her; a gull flew screaming from them and past her, almost brushing her cheek. She looked out upon the sea, a line of swelling waves, gray foam, and clouds of spray; the booming of miles of surge along the coast, and the lashing of the swifter storm.

Her face was a shade whiter in the full light of the lantern, her voice sharp.

"Have you seen her?"

"Thought so," said Jack, working on the rope.

VOL. XXX.—No. 177.—Z

"Somethin's bobbin' up and down out there. Ain't no misfort'nate love in the case, is there, Miss Cynthy?"

Cynthia was looking at some dark object that rose and fell with the waves; she made no reply.

"Hope Miss Harrit ain't gone and drowned herself," sympathized Jack, pushing off the boat. "This water is a big 'un; ef she's there we'll haul her in, Miss Cynthy. Steady there, Tim!" And with a sweep and a lurch the boat was tossing on the waves.

Cynthia stood upon the rocks, her hands shut one into the other like a vice, her eyes fixed on that other thing—that dark and heavy thing which was tossing on the waves. If she had not believed when she came to the beach that she should find her sister here, scarcely more did she believe it now.

This stretch of fathomless sea, this tide that swept and broke with such a mighty cry, these cruel rocks that tore and tossed the waves—was Harriet here? Her face growing grayer and paler as she watched the sea, and the boat that struggled against it stood out against the night like some statue cut in marble. A statue that had been, and would be for years, alone with its own solitude. The boat at length turned, coming swifter with the tide; the light of the lantern caught the green swell of the waves, the splash of foam against the oars, and the forms of the men—one only rowing, the other sitting with his back toward the shore.

The boat struck, and grated at last upon the sand; the two men rose and stepped out silently, something held within their arms. They came and laid it down at Cynthia's feet, quite gently.

"We found her floatin' with a piece of wreck," said Jack, in a hushed voice. But when he looked up into her face he turned away and pulled his hat over his eyes.

Then Cynthia stooped and pushed the hair away from her sister's face—the bright, fair hair that she had so often twined and curled about her finger.

She lay upon the yellow sands, her face still turned to the sea—the face which had been all unkissed this New-Year's eve; her hands, thrown down as they had clutched the drifting wreck, were tangled in the wet and slimy weeds—the poor, thin hands that had once been warm and young. The storm beat upon her; the waves creeping up the beach almost touched her where she lay so quietly, and the wind blew again the bright, fair hair that Cynthia had smoothed away.

They raised her very gently, and the two men carried her up the slope and over the dull, frozen fields.

Turning then into the little yard, up the steps, and into the old home door, slowly—very slowly. Many times had Harriet come up those steps and into that door, with the pattering, impatient feet of a little child whose laugh rang like music all over the silent house—whose pretty dimpled face made all its light. With the happy tread of a girl looking through green vines and sunlight, who waited for the sounding of a step upon the grass. With the weary feet of a woman who had walked many years alone. Cynthia thought of this as they bore her through the door that swung and creaked upon its hinges to give them entrance.

Past the room where the little tea-table still stood spread for two, where the fire was burned to ashes and the empty chair had ceased to rock. So many times coming in, Harriet had turned to it to warm her hands at the blaze, or take her work at the window. Now she passed it by, and, passing, did not see it. For one alone the table should be spread to-morrow; one only should henceforth sit and work beside the fire.

Up the stairs, and into her own room—the room where she had slept for so many years; where it was fitting they should bring her for this most quiet slumber. The worn furniture was there, the warmth of the home-like fire, and the ivy in the window.

They laid her down upon the bed, her poor white face turned upon the pillow, the wet, wet hair falling over it.

So it had turned many times upon that pillow, her cheeks wet then as now—but not with ocean waves—her hair tossed away from sleepless eyes that watched the long night through.

They laid her down very tenderly, and then the two men went softly out to leave Cynthia Locke alone with her dead.

The doctor coming in at last at Jack's summons found the room bright with fresh fire, and the two women—Cynthia and Jane—hopelessly chafing Harriet's frozen limbs, and trying in vain to bring breath into the cold and lifeless mouth.

Cynthia looked up into his face when he came to the bedside, stooping, with his ear to Harriet's heart and his finger on the pulse—a mute look that was far more piteous than a cry. He did not meet her eye, nor speak. The moments passed like the toll of a bell. Cynthia felt that the light was bright upon the ivy in the window, and upon the bed where it touched such a silent form. She heard the pattering of the winter rain upon the roof, the shriek of a stormy wind, and the rolling of distant surge. She saw and heard them over and over like the sudden changes of tone in some grand dirge—the light and wind, the rain and light, each in turn. The half hour struck. The doctor, stopping in the midst of some quick order, stooped once more with his ear at Harriet's heart.

Still Cynthia listened to the swelling of the dirge; still she saw the light within the room, and heard the mourning of the storm without.

The minutes tolling slower and more slowly counted at last an hour. The mute face upon the pillow had not stirred or warmed with the faintest flush. The doctor had been growing graver; he turned away from the bed. Cynthia looked up into his sorrowful eyes.

"Is it too late?" in a low, unvarying voice.

"With God it is never too late," he answered, solemnly. "I can do nothing more."

Then Cynthia kneeled down and hid her face upon the bed.

Peals of thunder reverberating like ten thousand tides upon a world of rock-bound coast, growing fainter, and lost at last in a low and distant growl. The dash of waves that touched the heavens, falling and smoothing to the far-off ripple of some restless sea. The fury of an eternal storm held at length, and calmed like the sobbing of a weary child. The world by some gigantic machine pumped void of air—a gasping and struggling toward the brazen sky. The torments of a rack and the binding of iron chains. The scorching of a tropic sun upon leagues of desert sands. The blackness of a mighty void, and the sense of walking blindfold through it.

A gleam of light at length; a grateful warmth like the winds of summer; the touch of something like the clinging of softest velvet; a pleasant murmur like the lull of many fountains; a sense of rest as the soothing of a mother's lullaby. The flash of broader light and bright coloring; the trailing of a green vine upon a window; the crackling of a fire in a warm and home-like room. The picture of a pale face, with anguished eyes and sad, gray hair, that moved about the room, that came to the bed, that bent over it with a low cry, dropping hot tears.

And Harriet knew that God had given her back her life.

"Cynthia!"

"Harriet! Oh, my sister!"

And Cynthia gathered her in her arms, and broke into the sobbing of a little child.

Harriet smiled faintly, and closing her eyes lay back upon the pillow as if quite content. The hours wore away while she lay there, still too weak for speech, but gaining strength with every moment. Cynthia sat beside her, her eyes upon the pallid face, clasping the clinging hand in both her own. The warm light that brightened and glowed in the room lent strange beauty to the faces of the two, each so old with the weight of lonely years, each white as the Death that had so nearly sundered them, each so still with the hush of thoughts that could not be spoken.

The doctor seeing them so had turned away his face, his kind eyes wet. Little Jane was crying upon the floor.

The Old Year met its death at last quite peacefully. The storm had ceased and hushed upon the sea; the wind, weary with its crying, slept at last; the quiet waves that wet the beach caught the light of a faint new moon which rested like a crown upon the hills, and far above and beyond them both the sky was marshaled with its brightest stars.

Cynthia, standing for a moment at the window to fold her hands upon her breast and turn her eyes up to them, heard the clock of a little church that stood near to the sea strike the hour of midnight. So did Harriet, and she raised her head to listen. When the last stroke died away she called her sister feebly.

Cynthia sent them all away and closed the door. Then she came up and lay down by Harriet's side, and put her arm about her neck. She used to do this when they were girls together. It was many years since then.

"Cynthia, I want to tell you—" But Cynthia stopped her with a long, long kiss.

"It is I, Harriet."

"No; you have borne so much, and I—I let you suffer all alone."

"And you?"

Harriet looked up, her face quivering.

"No matter, I was all wrong, Cynthia. If you will only help me a little—"

Cynthia took her younger sister in her arms, and laid her head upon her shoulder, caressing the wet hair.

"Harriet, did you try to go away from me to-night?"

"No, thank God!"

"It is I who should thank Him," said Cynthia, solemnly; "look into my eyes, Harriet."

And Harriet looked through her tears. What she saw there made her hide her face upon her sister's arm and cling to her neck. Cynthia laid her cheek to hers and kissed her.

"We've nothing left but each other," she said.

After a while she laid Harriet back upon the pillow, and rose to put the room in order for the night, her face as quiet as yesterday, no sign in the grave way she went about her work that any thing had occurred to break upon the silence of her daily life—her voice only telling the promise of the New Year.

CHRISTMAS AT TRINITY.

WHILE from the lofty gallery sweeps the organ's music-thunder,
And rolls a billowy baptism o'er the people kneeling under,
Till in the calm that follows the passionate prayer abating,
The white-robed priest and white-robed boys their praise are alternating;
And through the rosy lattices the golden sun-rays glinting,
The marble altars and the walls with love's own hue are tinting;
Down showers tumultuous music from the belfry of Old Trinity—
Merry chiming for His birth, and grave songs for His Divinity!

All up and down bright Broadway, with eager, festal faces,
In festal garments gayly clad, the population paces.
We hear the pulse of one great heart, that in great love rejoices;
One loving intonation makes a chord of many voices;
Upon the long procession, in its coming and its going,
Like a river in some fairy land, in Magian splendor flowing;
Down showers tumultuous music from the belfry of Old Trinity—
Merry chiming for His birth, and grave songs for His Divinity!

Last night, as by the church-yard, the tombs in moonlight sleeping,
I wandered while the shadowed spire across the dead was creeping—
Across the dead who pillow'd there, unheeding gloom or gleaming,
Through all the rolling years have slept the sleep that knows no dreaming;
Twelve times the ponderous hammer struck, its beat imperious falling:
The dead slept on, and made no sign, but waited God's own calling!
Down showered tumultuous music from the belfry of Old Trinity—
Merry chiming for His birth, and grave songs for His Divinity!

There's mockery in our wooing—there is death in all our houses;
He liveth best who loveth least—the fool alone espouses;
The bridal chaplet that we wear, our brows serene 'adorning,
Fades in the spectral night that dims the eyes of dancing morning.
"Sleep well," I cried, "and wisely in your graves, O ye departed!
You are blest above the living, for you are not broken-hearted!"
Down showered tumultuous music from the belfry of Old Trinity—
Merry chiming for His birth, and grave songs for His Divinity!

Sweet bells of hope! I heard you, with a spirit stronger growing,
While over me eternal stars with love and strength were glowing;
And when the Christmas noon-tide came, and came the gilded thronging,
I could look on all the happiness nor feel the lonesome longing;
While on children lightly leaping, while on maid and lover blushing,
While on mothers proud and comely, on the living river rushing,
Down showered tumultuous music from the belfry of Old Trinity—
Merry chiming for His birth, and grave songs for His Divinity!

ARMADALE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS, AUTHOR OF "NO NAME," "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," ETC.

BOOK THE SECOND.

CHAPTER II.

THE MAN REVEALED.

THE first cool breathings of the coming dawn fluttered through the open window as Mr. Brock read the closing lines of the Confession. He put it from him in silence without looking up. The first shock of discovery had struck his mind, and had passed away again. At his age, and with his habits of thought, his grasp was not strong enough to hold the whole revelation that had fallen on him. All his heart when he closed the manuscript was with the memory of the woman who had been the beloved friend of his later and happier life; all his thoughts were busy with the miserable secret of her treason to her own father which the letter had disclosed.

He was startled out of the narrow limits of his own little grief by the vibration of the table at which he sat under a hand that was laid on it heavily. The instinct of reluctance was strong in him; but he conquered it, and looked up. There, silently confronting him in the mixed light of the yellow candle-flame and the faint gray dawn, stood the castaway of the village inn—the inheritor of the fatal Armadale name.

Mr. Brock shuddered as the terror of the present time, and the darker terror yet of the future that might be coming, rushed back on him at the sight of the man's face. The man saw it, and spoke first.

"Is my father's crime looking at you out of my eyes?" he asked. "Has the ghost of the drowned man followed me into the room?"

The suffering and the passion that he was forcing back shook the hand that he still kept on the table, and stifled the voice in which he spoke until it sank to a whisper.

"I have no wish to treat you otherwise than justly and kindly," answered Mr. Brock. "Do me justice on my side, and believe that I am incapable of cruelly holding you responsible for your father's crime."

The reply seemed to compose him. He bowed his head in silence, and took up the confession from the table.

"Have you read this through?" he asked, quietly.

"Every word of it, from first to last."

"Have I dealt openly with you so far? Has Ozias Midwinter—"

"Do you still call yourself by that name," interrupted Mr. Brock, "now your true name is known to me?"

"Since I have read my father's confession," was the answer, "I like my ugly alias better than ever. Allow me to repeat the question which I was about to put to you a minute since —Has Ozias Midwinter done his best thus far to enlighten Mr. Brock?"

The rector evaded a direct reply. "Few men in your position," he said, "would have had the courage to show me that letter."

"Don't be too sure, Sir, of the vagabond you picked up at the inn till you know a little more of him than you know now. You have got the secret of my birth, but you are not in possession yet of the story of my life. You ought to know it, and you shall know it, before you leave me alone with Mr. Armadale. Will you wait, and rest a little while? or shall I tell it you now?"

"Now," said Mr. Brock, still as far away as ever from knowing the real character of the man before him.

Every thing Ozias Midwinter said, every thing Ozias Midwinter did, was against him. He had spoken with a sardonic indifference, almost with an insolence of tone, which would have repelled the sympathies of any man who heard him. And now, instead of placing himself at the table, and addressing his story directly to the rector, he withdrew silently and ungraciously to the window-seat. There he sat, his face averted, his hands mechanically turning the leaves of his father's letter till he came to the last. With his eyes fixed on the closing lines of the manuscript, and with a strange mixture of recklessness and sadness in his voice, he began his promised narrative in these words:

"The first thing you know of me," he said, "is what my father's confession has told you already. He mentions here that I was a child asleep on his breast when he spoke his last words in this world, and when a stranger's hand wrote them down for him at his death-bed. That stranger's name, as you may have noticed, is signed on the cover—'Alexander Neal, Writer to the Signet, Edinburgh.' The first recollection I have is of Alexander Neal beating me with a horse-whip (I dare say I deserved it) in the character of my step-father."

"Have you no recollection of your mother at the same time?" asked Mr. Brock.

"Yes; I remember her having shabby old clothes made up to fit me, and having fine new frocks bought for her two children by her second husband. I remember the servants laughing at me in my old things, and the horsewhip finding its way to my shoulders again for losing my temper and tearing my shabby clothes. My next recollection gets on to a year or two later. I remember myself locked up in a lumber-room, with a bit of bread and a mug of water, wondering what it was that made my mother and my step-father seem to hate the very sight of me. I never settled that question till yesterday, and then I solved the mystery when my father's letter was put into my hands. My mother knew what had really happened on board the French timber ship, and my step-father knew what had really happened, and they were both well aware that the shameful secret which they would fain have kept from every living creature was a secret which would be one day revealed to me. There was no help for it; the confession was in the executor's hands; and there was I, an ill-conditioned brat, with my mother's negro blood in my face, and my murdering father's passions in my heart, inheritor of their secret in spite of them! I don't wonder at the horsewhip now, or the shabby old clothes, or the bread and water in the lumber-room. Natural penalties all of them, Sir, which the child was beginning to pay already for the father's sin."

Mr. Brock looked at the swarthy, secret face, still obstinately turned away from him. "Is this the stark insensibility of a vagabond," he asked himself, "or the despair in disguise of a miserable man?"

"School is my next recollection," the other went on. "A cheap place in a lost corner of Scotland. I was left there, with a bad character to help me at starting. I spare you the story of the master's cane in the school-room and the boys' kicks in the play-ground. I dare say there was ingrained ingratitude in my nature; at any rate, I ran away. The first person who met me asked my name. I was too young and too foolish to know the importance of concealing it, and, as a matter of course, I was taken back to school the same evening. The result taught me a lesson which I have not forgotten since. In a day or two more, like the vagabond I was, I ran away for the second time. The school watch-dog had had his instructions, I suppose: he stopped me before I got outside the gate. Here is his mark, among the rest, on the back of my hand. His master's marks I can't show you—they are all on my back. Can you believe in my perversity? There was a devil in me that no dog could worry out; I ran away again as soon as I left my bed; and this time I got off. At nightfall I found myself (with a pocketful of the school oat-meal) lost on a moor. I laid down on the fine soft heather, under the lee of a great gray rock. Do you think I felt lonely? Not I! I was away from the master's cane, away from my school-fellows' kicks, away from my mother, away from my step-father; and I laid down that night under my good friend the rock, the happiest boy in all Scotland!"

Through the wretched childhood which that one significant circumstance disclosed Mr. Brock began to see dimly how little was really strange, how little really unaccountable in the character of the man who was now speaking to him.

"I slept soundly," Midwinter continued, "under my friend the rock. When I woke in the morning I found a sturdy old man with a fiddle sitting on one side of me, and two dancing dogs in scarlet jackets on the other. Experience had made me too sharp to tell the truth when the man put his first questions. He didn't press them; he gave me a good breakfast out of his knapsack, and he let me romp with the dogs. 'I'll tell you what,' he said, when he had got my confidence in this manner, 'you want three things, my man; you want a new father, a new family, and a new name. I'll be your father; I'll let you have the dogs for your brothers; and if you'll promise to be very careful of it I'll give you my own name into the bargain. Ozias Midwinter, junior, you have had a good breakfast; if you want a good dinner come along with me.' He got up; the dogs trotted after him, and I trotted after the dogs. Who was my new father? you will ask. A half-bred gipsy, Sir; a drunkard, a ruffian, and a thief—and the best friend I ever had! Isn't a man your friend who gives you your food, your shelter, and your education? Ozias Midwinter taught me to dance the Highland fling, to throw somersaults, to walk on stilts, and to sing songs to his fiddle. Sometimes we roamed the country and performed at fairs. Sometimes we tried the large towns, and enlivened bad company over its cups. I was a nice lively little boy of eleven years old, and bad company, the women especially, took a fancy to me and my nimble feet. I was vagabond enough to like the life. The dogs and I lived together, ate, and drank, and slept together. I can't think of those poor little four-footed brothers of mine, even now, without a choking in the throat. Many is the beating we three took together; many is the hard day's dancing we did together; many is the night we have slept together, and whimpered together on the cold hill-side. I'm not trying to distress you, Sir; I'm only telling you the truth. The life, with all its hardships, was a life that fitted me, and the half-bred gipsy who gave me his name, ruffian as he was, was a ruffian I liked."

"A man who beat you!" exclaimed Mr. Brock, in astonishment.

"Didn't I tell you just now, Sir, that I lived with the dogs? and did you ever hear of a dog who liked his master the worse for beating him? Hundreds of thousands of miserable men, women, and children would have liked that man (as I liked him) if he had always given them what he always gave me—plenty to eat. It was stolen food mostly, and my new gipsy father was generous with it. He seldom laid the stick on us when he was sober; but it diverted him to hear us yelp when he was drunk. He died drunk, and enjoyed his favorite amusement with his last breath. One day (when I had been two years in his service), after giving us a good dinner out on the moor, he sat down with his back against a stone, and called us up to divert himself with his stick. He made the dogs yelp first, and then he called to me. I didn't go very willingly; he had been drinking harder than usual, and the more he drank the better he liked his after-dinner amusement. He was in high good-humor that day, and he hit me so hard that he toppled over, in his drunken state, with the force of his own blow. He fell with his face in a puddle, and lay there without moving. I and the dogs stood at a distance and looked at him: we thought he was feigning, to get us near and have another stroke at us. He feigned so long that we ventured up to him at last. It took me some time to pull him over—he was a heavy man. When I did get him on his back he was dead. We made all the outcry we could; but the dogs were little, and I was little, and the place was lonely, and no help came to us. I took his fiddle and his stick; I said to my two brothers, 'Come along; we must get our own living now;' and we went away heavy hearted, and left him on the moor. Unnatural as it may seem to you, I was sorry for him. I kept his ugly name through all my after-wanderings, and I have enough of the old leaven left in me to like the sound of it still.

Midwinter or Armadale, never mind my name now—we will talk of that afterward; you must know the worst of me first."

"Why not the best of you?" said Mr. Brock, gently.

"Thank you, Sir, but I am here to tell the truth. We will get on, if you please, to the next chapter in my story. The dogs and I did badly, after our master's death—our luck was against us. I lost one of my little brothers—the best performer of the two; he was stolen, and I never recovered him. My fiddle and my stilts were taken from me next, by main force, by a tramp who was stronger than I. These misfortunes drew Tommy and me—I beg your pardon, Sir, I mean the dog—closer together than ever. I think we had some kind of dim foreboding on both sides, that we had not done with our misfortunes yet; any how, it was not very long before we were parted forever. We were neither of us thieves (our master had been satisfied with teaching us to dance); but we both committed an invasion of the rights of property for all that. Young creatures, even when they are half-starved, can not resist taking a run sometimes, on a fine morning. Tommy and I could not resist taking a run into a gentleman's plantation; the gentleman preserved his game; and the gentleman's keeper knew his business. I heard a gun go off—you can guess the rest. God preserve me from ever feeling such misery again as I felt when I laid down by Tommy, and took him, dead and bloody, in my arms! The keeper attempted to part us—I bit him, like the wild animal I was. He tried the stick on me next—he might as well have tried it on one of the trees. The noise reached the ears of two young ladies, riding near the place—daughters of the gentleman on whose property I was a trespasser. They were too well brought up to lift their voices against the sacred right of preserving game, but they were kind-hearted girls, and they pitied me, and took me home with them. I remember the gentlemen of the house (keen sportsmen all of them) roaring with laughter as I went by the windows, crying, with my little dead dog in my arms. Don't suppose I complain of their laughter; it did me good service—it roused the indignation of the two ladies. One of them took me into her own garden, and showed me a place where I might bury my dog under the flowers, and be sure that no other hands should ever disturb him again. The other went to her father, and persuaded him to give the forlorn little vagabond a chance in the house, under one of the upper servants. Yes! you have been cruising in company with a man who was once a foot-boy. I saw you look at me, when I amused Mr. Armadale by laying the cloth on board the yacht. Now you know why I laid it so neatly, and forgot nothing. It has been my good fortune to see something of Society; I have helped to fill its stomach and black its boots. My experience of the servants' hall was not a long one. Before I had worn out my first suit of livery there was a scandal in the house. It was the old story; there is no need to tell it over again for the thousandth time. Loose money left on a table, and not found there again; all the servants with characters to appeal to except the foot-boy, who had been rashly taken on trial. Well! well! I was lucky in that house to the last; I was not prosecuted for taking what I had not only never touched, but never even seen—I was only turned out. One morning I went in my old clothes to the grave where I had buried Tommy. I gave the place a kiss; I said good-by to my little dead dog; and there I was, out in the world again, at the ripe age of thirteen years!"

"In that friendless state, and at that tender age," said Mr. Brock, "did no thought cross your mind of going home again?"

"I went home again, Sir, that very night—I slept on the hill-side. What other home had I? In a day or two's time I drifted back to the large towns and the bad company—the great open country was so lonely to me, now I had lost the dogs! Two sailors picked me up next; I was a handy lad, and I got a cabin-boy's berth on board a coasting-vessel. A cabin-boy's berth means dirt to live in, offal to eat, a man's work on a boy's shoulders, and the rope's-end at regular intervals. The vessel touched at a port in the Hebrides. I was as ungrateful as usual to my best benefactors—I ran away again. Some women found me, half-dead of starvation, in the northern wilds of the Isle of Skye. It was near the coast, and I took a turn with the fishermen next. There was less of the rope's-end among my new masters; but plenty of exposure to wind and weather, and hard work enough to have killed a boy who was not a seasoned tramp like me. I fought through it till the winter came, and then the fishermen turned me adrift again. I don't blame them—food was scarce, and mouths were many. With famine staring the whole community in the face, why should they keep a boy who didn't belong to them? A great city was my only chance in the winter time; so I went to Glasgow, and all but stepped into the lion's mouth as soon as I got there. I was minding an empty cart on the Broomielaw, when I heard my step-father's voice on the pavement-side of the horse by which I was standing. He had met some person whom he knew, and, to my terror and surprise, they were talking about me. Hidden behind the horse, I heard enough of their conversation to know that I had narrowly escaped discovery before I went on board the coasting-vessel. I had met, at that time, with another vagabond boy, of my own age; we had quarreled and parted. The day after, my step-father's inquiries were made in that very district; and it became a question with him (a good personal description being unattainable in either case) which of the two boys he should follow. One of them, he was informed, was known as "Brown," and the other as "Midwinter." Brown was just the common name which a cunning runaway boy would be most likely to assume; Midwinter just the remarkable name which he would be most likely to avoid. The pursuit had accordingly followed Brown, and had allowed me to escape. I leave you to imagine whether I was not doubly and trebly determined to keep my gipsy-master's name after that. But my resolution did not stop here. I made up my mind to leave the country altogether. After a day or two's lurking about the outward-bound vessels in port, I found out which sailed first, and hid myself on board. Hunger tried hard to force me out before the pilot had left; but hunger was not new to me, and I kept my place. The pilot was out of the vessel when I made my appearance on deck, and there was nothing for it but to keep me or throw me overboard. The captain said (I have no doubt quite truly) that he would have preferred throwing me overboard; but the majesty of the law does sometimes stand the friend even of a vagabond like me. In that way I came back to a sea life. In that way I learned enough to make me handy and useful (as I saw you noticed) on board Mr. Armadale's yacht. I sailed more than one voyage, in more than one vessel, to more than one part of the world; and I might have followed the sea for life, if I could only have kept my temper under every provocation that could be laid on it. I had learned a great deal—but, not having learned that, I made the last part of my last voyage home to the port of Bristol in irons; and I saw the inside of a prison for the first time in my life, on a charge of mutinous conduct to one of my officers. You have heard me with extraordinary patience, Sir, and I am glad to tell you, in return, that we are not far now from the end of my story. You found some books, if I remember right, when you searched my luggage at the Somersetshire inn?"

Mr. Brock answered in the affirmative.

"Those books mark the next change in my life—and the last, before I took the usher's place at the school. My term of imprisonment was not a long one. Perhaps my youth pleaded for me; perhaps the Bristol magistrates took into consideration the time I had passed in irons on board ship. Any how, I was just turned seventeen when I found myself out on the world again. I had no friends to receive me; I had no place to go to. A sailor's life, after what had happened, was a life I recoiled from in disgust. I stood in the crowd on the bridge at Bristol, wondering what I should do with my freedom now I had got it back. Whether I had altered in the prison, or whether I was feeling the change in character that comes with coming manhood, I don't know; but the old reckless enjoyment of the old vagabond life seemed quite worn out of my nature. An awful sense of loneliness kept me wandering about Bristol, in horror of the quiet country, till after nightfall. I looked at the lights kindling in the parlor windows with a miserable envy of the happy people inside. A word of advice would have been worth something to me at that time. Well! I got it: a policeman advised me to move on. He was quite right—what else could I do? I looked up at the sky, and there was my old friend of many a night's watch at sea, the north star. 'All points of the compass are alike to me,' I thought to myself; 'I'll go your way.' Not even the star would keep me company that night. It got behind a cloud, and left me alone in the rain and darkness. I groped my way to a cart-shed, fell asleep, and dreamed of old times, when I served my gipsy-master and lived with the dogs. God! what I would have given when I woke to have felt Tommy's little cold muzzle in my hand! Why am I dwelling on these things? why don't I get on to the end? You shouldn't encourage me, Sir, by listening so patiently. After a week more of wandering, without hope to help me, or prospects to look to, I found myself in the streets of Shrewsbury, staring in at the windows of a bookseller's shop. An old man came to the shop-door, looked about him, and saw me. 'Do you want a job?' he asked. 'And are you not above doing it cheap?' The prospect of having something to do, and some human creature to speak a word to, tempted me, and I did a day's dirty work in the bookseller's warehouse for a shilling. More work followed at the same rate. In a week I was promoted to sweep out the shop and put up the shutters. In no very long time after I was trusted to carry the books out; and when quarter-day came, and the shopman left, I took his place. Wonderful luck! you will say; here I had found my way to a friend at last. I had found my way to one of the most merciless misers in England; and I had risen in the little world of Shrewsbury by the purely commercial process of underselling all my competitors. The job in the warehouse had been declined at the price by every idle man in the town—and I did it. The regular porter received his weekly pittance under weekly protest—I took two shillings less, and made no complaint. The shopman gave warning on the ground that he was underfed as well as underpaid. I received half his salary, and lived contentedly on his reversionary scraps. Never were two men so well suited to each other as that bookseller and I! His one object in life was to find somebody who would work for him at starvation wages. My one object in life was to find somebody who would give me an asylum over my head. Without a single sympathy in common—without a vestige of feeling of any sort, hostile or friendly, growing up between us on either side—without wishing each other good-night when we parted on the house stairs, or good-morning when we met at the shop counter—we lived alone in that house, strangers from first to last, for two whole years. A dismal existence for a lad of my age, was it not? - You are a clergyman and a scholar—surely you can guess what made the life endurable to me?"

Mr. Brock remembered the well-worn volumes which had been found in the usher's bag. "The books made it endurable to you," he said.

The eyes of the castaway kindled with a new light.

"Yes!" he said, "the books—the generous friends who met me without suspicion—the merciful masters who never used me ill! The only years of my life that I can look back on with something like pride are the years I passed in the miser's house. The only unalloyed pleasure I have ever tasted is the pleasure that I found for myself on the miser's shelves. Early and late, through the long winter nights and the quiet summer days, I drank at the fountain of knowledge, and never wearied of the draught. There were few customers to serve; for the books were mostly of the solid and scholarly kind. No responsibilities rested on me; for the accounts were kept by my master, and only the small sums of money were suffered to pass through my hands. He soon found out enough of me to know that my honesty was to be trusted, and that my patience might be counted on, treat me as he might. The one insight into his character which I obtained, on my side, widened the distance between us to its last limits. He was a confirmed opium-eater in secret—a prodigal in laudanum, though a miser in all besides. He never confessed his frailty, and I never told him I had found it out. He had his pleasure apart from me; and I had my pleasure apart from him. Week after week, month after month, there we sat without a friendly word ever passing between us—I alone with my book at the counter; he alone with his ledger in the parlor, dimly visible to me through the dirty window-pane of the glass door, sometimes poring over his figures, sometimes lost and motionless for hours in the ecstasy of his opium-trance. Time passed, and made no impression on us; the seasons of two years came and went, and found us still unchanged. One morning, at the opening of the third year, my master did not appear as usual to give me my allowance for breakfast. I went up stairs, and found him helpless in his bed. He refused to trust me with the keys of the cupboard, or to let me send for a doctor. I bought a morsel of bread, and went back to my books, with no more feeling for him (I honestly confess it) than he would have had for me under the same circumstances. An hour or two later I was roused from my reading by an occasional customer of ours, a retired medical man. He went up stairs. I was glad to get rid of him and return to my books. He came down again, and disturbed me once more. ‘I don’t much like you, my lad,’ he said; ‘but I think it my duty to say that you will soon have to shift for yourself. You are no great favorite in the town, and you may have some difficulty in finding a new place. Provide yourself with a written character from your master before it is too late.’ He spoke to me coldly. I thanked him coldly on my side, and got my character the same day. Do you think my master let me have it for nothing? Not he! He bargained with me on his death-bed. I was his creditor for a month’s salary, and he wouldn’t write a line of my testimonial until I had first promised to forgive him the debt. Three days afterward he died, enjoying to the last the happiness of having overreached his shopman. ‘Aha!’ he whispered, when the doctor formally summoned me to take leave of him, ‘I got you cheap!’ Was Ozias Midwinter’s stick as cruel as that? I think not. Well! there I was, out on the world again, but surely with better prospects this time. I had taught myself to read Latin, Greek, and German; and I had got my written character to speak for me. All useless! The doctor was quite right; I was not liked in the town. The lower order of the people despised me for selling my services to the miser at the miser’s price. As for the better classes I did with them (God knows how!) what I have always done with every body, except Mr. Armadale—I produced a disagreeable impression at first sight; I couldn’t mend it afterward; and there was an end of me in respectable quarters. It is quite likely I might have spent all my savings, my puny little golden offspring of two years’ miserable growth, but for a school advertisement which I saw in a local paper. The heartlessly mean terms that were offered encouraged me to apply, and I got the place. How I prospered in it, and what became of me next, there is no need to tell you. The thread of my story is all wound off; my vagabond life stands stripped of its mystery; and you know the worst of me at last.”

A moment of silence followed those closing words. Midwinter rose from the window-seat and came back to the table with the letter from Wildbad in his hand.

“My father’s confession has told you who I am; and my own confession has told you what my life has been,” he said, addressing Mr. Brock, without taking the chair to which the rector pointed. “I promised to make a clean breast of it when I first asked leave to enter this room. Have I kept my word?”

“It is impossible to doubt it,” replied Mr. Brock. “You have established your claim on my confidence and my sympathy. I should be insensible indeed if I could know what I now know of your childhood and your youth and not feel something of Allan’s kindness for Allan’s friend.”

“Thank you, Sir,” said Midwinter, simply and gravely.

He sat down opposite Mr. Brock at the table for the first time.

“In a few hours you will have left this place,” he proceeded. “If I can help you to leave it with your mind at ease I will. There is more to be said between us than we have said up to this time. My future relations with Mr. Armadale are still left undecided; and the serious question raised by my father’s letter is a question which we have neither of us faced yet.”

He paused and looked with a momentary impatience at the candle still burning on the table in the morning light. The struggle to speak with composure, and to keep his own feelings stoically out of view, was evidently growing harder and harder to him.

“It may possibly help your decision,” he went on, "if I tell you how I determined to act toward Mr. Armadale—in the matter of the similarity of our names—when I first read this letter, and when I had composed myself sufficiently to be able to think at all." He stopped, and cast a second impatient look at the lighted candle. "Will you excuse the odd fancy of an odd man?" he asked, with a faint smile. "I want to put out the candle—I want to speak of the new subject in the new light."

He extinguished the candle as he spoke, and let the first tenderness of the daylight flow uninterrupted into the room.

"I must once more ask your patience," he resumed, "if I return for a moment to myself and my circumstances. I have already told you that my step-father made an attempt to discover me some years after I had turned my back on the Scotch school. He took that step out of no anxiety of his own, but simply as the agent of my father's trustees. In the exercise of their discretion they had sold the estates in Barbadoes (at the time of the emancipation of the slaves, and the ruin of West Indian property) for what the estates would fetch. Having invested the proceeds they were bound to set aside a sum for my yearly education. This responsibility obliged them to make the attempt to trace me—a fruitless attempt, as you already know. A little later (as I have been since informed) I was publicly addressed by an advertisement in the newspapers—which I never saw. Later still, when I was twenty-one, a second advertisement appeared (which I did see) offering a reward for evidence of my death. If I was alive, I had a right to my half share of the proceeds of the estates on coming of age; if dead, the money reverted to my mother. I went to the lawyers and heard from them what I have just told you. After some difficulty in proving my identity—and, after an interview with my step-father, and a message from my mother, which has hopelessly widened the old breach between us—my claim was allowed, and my money is now invested for me in the funds under the name that is really my own."

Mr. Brock drew eagerly nearer to the table. He saw the end now to which the speaker was tending.

"Twice a year," Midwinter pursued, "I must sign my own name to get my own income. At all other times, and under all other circumstances, I may hide my identity under any name I please. As Ozias Midwinter Mr. Armadale first knew me—as Ozias Midwinter he shall know me to the end of my days. Whatever may be the result of this interview—whether I win your confidence, or whether I lose it—of one thing you may feel sure. Your pupil shall never know the horrible secret which I have trusted to your keeping. This is no extraordinary resolution—for, as you know already, it costs me no sacrifice of feeling to keep my assumed name. There is nothing in my conduct to praise—it comes naturally out of the gratitude of a thankful man. Review the circumstances for yourself, Sir, and set my own horror of revealing them to Mr. Armadale out of the question. If the story of the names is ever told, there can be no limiting it to the disclosure of my father's crime; it must go back to the story of Mrs. Armadale's marriage. I have heard her son talk of her; I know how he loves her memory. As God is my witness he shall never love it less dearly through me!"

Simply as the words were spoken, they touched the deepest sympathies in the rector's nature: they took his thoughts back to Mrs. Armadale's death-bed. There sat the man against whom she had ignorantly warned him in her son's interests—and that man, of his own free-will, had laid on himself the obligation of respecting her secret for her son's sake! The memory of his own past efforts to destroy the very friendship out of which this resolution had sprung rose and reproached Mr. Brock. He held out his hand to Midwinter for the first time. "In her name, and in her son's name," he said, warmly. "I thank you."

Without replying Midwinter spread the confession open before him on the table.

"I think I have said all that it was my duty to say," he began, "before we could approach the consideration of this letter. Whatever may have appeared strange in my conduct toward you and toward Mr. Armadale may be now trusted to explain itself. You can easily imagine the natural curiosity and surprise that I must have felt (ignorant as I then was of the truth) when the sound of Mr. Armadale's name first startled me as the echo of my own. You will readily understand that I only hesitated to tell him I was his namesake, because I hesitated to damage my position—in your estimation, if not in his—by confessing that I had come among you under an assumed name. And, after all that you have just heard of my vagabond life and my low associates, you will hardly wonder at the obstinate silence I maintained about myself, at a time when I did not feel the sense of responsibility which my father's confession has laid on me. We can return to these small personal explanations, if you wish it, at another time; they can not be suffered to keep us from the greater interests which we must settle before you leave this place. We may come now—" his voice faltered, and he suddenly turned his face toward the window so as to hide it from the rector's view. "We may come now," he repeated, his hand trembling visibly as it held the page, "to the murder on board the timber ship, and to the warning that has followed me from my father's grave."

Softly—as if he feared they might reach Allan, sleeping in the neighboring room—he read the last terrible words which the Scotchman's pen had written at Wildbad, as they fell from his father's lips.

"Avoid the widow of the man I killed—if the widow still lives. Avoid the maid whose wicked hand smoothed the way to the marriage—if the maid is still in her service. And more than all, avoid the man who bears the same name as your own. Offend your best benefactor, if that benefactor's influence has connected you one with the other. Desert the woman who loves you, if that woman is a link between you and him. Hide yourself from him under an assumed name. Put the mountains and the seas between you; be ungrateful; be unforgiving; be all that is most repellent to your own gentler nature rather than live under the same roof and breathe the same air with that man. Never let the two Allan Armadales meet in this world; never, never, never!"

After reading those sentences he pushed the manuscript from him without looking up. The fatal reserve which he had been in a fair way of conquering but a few minutes since possessed itself of him once more. Again his eyes wandered; again his voice sank in tone. A stranger who had heard his story, and who saw him now, would have said, "His look is lurking, his manner is bad; he is, every inch of him, his father's son."

"I have a question to ask you," said Mr. Brock, breaking the silence between them on his side. "Why have you just read that passage in your father's letter?"

"To force me into telling you the truth," was the answer. "You must know how much there is of my father in me before you trust me to be Mr. Armadale's friend. I got my letter yesterday, in the morning. Some inner warning troubled me, and I went down on the sea-shore by myself before I broke the seal. Do you believe the dead can come back to the world they once lived in? I believe my father came back in that bright morning light, through the glare of that broad sunshine and the roar of that joyful sea, and watched me while I read. When I got to the words that you have just heard, and when I knew that the very end which he had died dreading was the end that had really come, I felt the horror that had crept over him in his last moments creeping over me. I struggled against myself as he would have had me struggle. I tried to be all that was most repellent to my own gentler nature; I tried to think pitilessly of putting the mountains and the seas between me and the man who bore my name. Hours passed before I could prevail on myself to go back and run the risk of meeting Allan Armadale in this house. When I did get back, and when he met me at night on the stairs, I thought I was looking him in the face as my father looked his father in the face when the cabin door closed between them. Draw your own conclusions, Sir. Say, if you like, that the inheritance of my father's heathen belief in Fate is one of the inheritances he has left to me. I won't dispute it; I won't deny that all through yesterday his superstition was my superstition. The night came before I could find my way to calmer and brighter thoughts. But I did find my way. You may set it down in my favor that I lifted myself at last above the influence of this horrible letter. Do you know what helped me?"

"Did you reason with yourself?"

"I can't reason about what I feel."

"Did you quiet your mind by prayer?"

"I was not fit to pray."

"And yet something guided you to the better feeling and the truer view?"

"Something did."

"What was it?"

"My love for Allan Armadale."

He cast a doubting, almost a timid, look at Mr. Brock as he gave that answer, and, suddenly leaving the table, went back to the window-seat.

"Have I no right to speak of him in that way?" he asked, keeping his face hidden from the rector. "Have I not known him long enough; have I not done enough for him yet? Remember what my experience of other men had been when I first saw his hand held out to me; when I first heard his voice speaking to me in my sick room. What had I known of strangers' hands all through my childhood? I had only known them as hands raised to threaten and to strike me. His hand put my pillow straight, and patted me on the shoulder, and gave me my food and drink. What had I known of other men's voices when I was growing up to be a man myself? I had only known them as voices that jeered, voices that cursed, voices that whispered in corners with a vile distrust. His voice said to me, 'Cheer up, Midwinter! we'll soon bring you round again. You'll be strong enough in a week to go out for a drive with me in our Somersetshire lanes.' Think of the gipsy's stick; think of the devils laughing at me when I went by their windows with my little dead dog in my arms; think of the master who cheated me of my month's salary on his death-bed, and ask your own heart if the miserable wretch whom Allan Armadale has treated as his equal and his friend has said too much in saying that he loves him? I do love him! It will come out of me; I can't keep it back. I love the very ground he treads on! I would give my life—yes, the life that is precious to me now, because his kindness has made it a happy one—I tell you I would give my life—"

The next words died away on his lips; the hysterical passion rose and conquered him. He stretched out one of his hands with a wild gesture of entreaty to Mr. Brock; his head sank on the window-sill, and he burst into tears.

Even then the hard discipline of the man's life asserted itself. He expected no sympathy; he counted on no merciful human respect for human weakness. The cruel necessity of self-suppression was present to his mind while the tears were pouring over his cheeks. "Give me a minute," he said, faintly. "I'll fight it down in a minute; I won't distress you in this way again."

True to his resolution, in a minute he had fought it down. In a minute more he was able to speak calmly.

"We will get back, Sir, to those better thoughts which brought me last night from my room to yours," he resumed. "I can only repeat that I should never have torn myself from the hold which this letter fastened on me if I had not loved Allan Armadale with all that I have in me of a brother's love. I said to myself, 'If the thought of leaving him breaks my heart, the thought of leaving him is wrong!' That was some hours since, and I am in the same mind still. I can't believe—I won't believe—that a friendship which has grown out of nothing but kindness on one side, and nothing but gratitude on the other, is destined to lead to an evil end. I don't undervalue the strange circumstances which have made us namesakes—the strange circumstances which have brought us together and attached us to each other—the strange circumstances which have since happened to us separately. They may, and they do, all link themselves together in my thoughts; but they shall not daunt me. I won't believe that these events have happened in the order of Fate for an end that is evil; I will believe that they have happened in the order of God for an end that is good. Judge, you who are a clergyman, between the dead father, whose word is in these pages, and the living son, whose word is now on his lips! Which am I—now that the two Allan Armadales have met again in the second generation—an instrument in the hands of Fate, or an instrument in the hands of Providence? What is it appointed me to do—now that I am breathing the same air, and living under the same roof with the son of the man whom my father killed—to perpetuate my father's crime by mortally injuring him? or to atone for my father's crime by giving him the devotion of my whole life? The last of those two faiths is my faith, and shall be my faith, happen what may. In the strength of that better conviction I have come here to trust you with my father's secret, and to confess the wretched story of my own life. In the strength of that better conviction I can face you resolutely with the one plain question, which marks the one plain end of all that I have come here to say. Your pupil stands at the starting-point of his new career, in a position singularly friendless; his one great need is a companion of his own age on whom he can rely. The time has come, Sir, to decide whether I am to be that companion or not. After all you have heard of Ozias Midwinter, tell me plainly, will you trust him to be Allan Armadale's friend?"

Mr. Brock met that fearlessly frank question by a fearless frankness on his side.

"I believe you love Allan," he said; "and I believe you have spoken the truth. A man who has produced that impression on me is a man whom I am bound to trust. I trust you."

Midwinter started to his feet, his dark face flushing deep, his eyes fixed brightly and steadily at last on the rector's face. "A light!" he exclaimed, tearing the pages of his father's letter one by one from the fastening that held them. "Let us destroy the last link that holds us to the horrible past! Let us see this confession a heap of ashes before we part!"

"Wait!" said Mr. Brock. "Before you burn it there is a reason for looking at it once more."

The parted leaves of the manuscript dropped from Midwinter's hands. Mr. Brock took them up, and sorted them carefully until he found the last page.

"I view your father's superstition as you view it," said the rector. "But there is a warning given you here which you will do well (for Allan's sake, and for your own sake) not to neglect. The last link with the past will not be destroyed when you have burnt these pages. One of the actors in this story of treachery and murder is not dead yet. Read those words."

He pushed the page across the table with his finger on one sentence. Midwinter's agitation misled him. He mistook the indication, and read, "Avoid the widow of the man I killed—if the widow still lives."

"Not that sentence," said the rector. "The next."

Midwinter read it: "Avoid the maid whose wicked hand smoothed the way to the marriage—if the maid is still in her service."

"The maid and the mistress parted," said Mr. Brock, "at the time of the mistress's marriage. The maid and the mistress met again at Mrs. Armadale's residence in Somersetshire last year. I myself met the woman in the village, and I myself know that her visit hastened Mrs. Armadale's death. Wait a little, and compose yourself; I see I have startled you."

He waited as he was bid, his color fading away to a gray paleness, and the light in his clear brown eyes dying out slowly. What the rector had said had produced no transient impression on him; there was more than doubt, there was alarm in his face as he sat lost in his own thoughts. Was the struggle of the past night renewing itself already? Did he feel the horror of his hereditary superstition creeping over him again?

"Can you put me on my guard against her?" he asked, after a long interval of silence. "Can you tell me her name?"

"I can only tell you what Mrs. Armadale told me," answered Mr. Brock. "The woman acknowledged having been married in the long interval since she and her mistress had last met. But not a word more escaped her about her past life. She came to Mrs. Armadale to ask for money under a plea of distress. She got the money, and she left the house, positively refusing, when the question was put to her, to mention her married name."

"You saw her yourself in the village. What was she like?"

"She kept her veil down. I can't tell you."

"You can tell me what you did see?"

"Certainly. I saw as she approached me that she moved very gracefully, that she had a beautiful figure, and that she was a little over the middle height. I noticed, when she asked me the way to Mrs. Armadale's house, that her manner was the manner of a lady, and that the tone of her voice was remarkably soft and winning. Lastly, I remembered afterward that she wore a thick black veil, a black bonnet, a black silk dress, and a red Paisley shawl. I feel all the importance of your possessing some better means of identifying her than I can give you. But, unhappily—”

He stopped. Midwinter was leaning eagerly across the table, and Midwinter's hand was laid suddenly on his arm.

“Is it possible that you know the woman?” asked Mr. Brock, surprised at the sudden change in his manner.

“No.”

“What have I said, then, that has startled you so?”

“Do you remember the woman who threw herself from the river steamer?” asked the other, “the woman who caused that succession of deaths, which opened Allan Armadale's way to the Thorpe-Ambrose estate?”

“I remember the description of her in the police report,” answered the rector.

“That woman,” pursued Midwinter, “moved gracefully, and had a beautiful figure. That woman wore a black veil, a black bonnet, a black silk gown, and a red Paisley shawl—” He stopped, released his hold of Mr. Brock's arm, and abruptly resumed his chair. “Can it be the same?” he said to himself, in a whisper. “Is there a fatality that follows men in the dark? And is it following us in that woman's footsteps?”

If the conjecture was right, the one event in the past which had appeared to be entirely disconnected with the events that had preceded it, was, on the contrary, the one missing link which made the chain complete. Mr. Brock's comfortable common sense instinctively denied that startling conclusion. He looked at Midwinter with a compassionate smile.

“My young friend,” he said, kindly, “have you cleared your mind of all superstition as completely as you think? Is what you have just said worthy of the better resolution at which you arrived last night?”

Midwinter's head drooped on his breast; the color rushed back over his face: he sighed bitterly.

“You are beginning to doubt my sincerity,” he said. “I can't blame you.”

“I believe in your sincerity as firmly as ever,” answered Mr. Brock. “I only doubt whether you have fortified the weak places in your nature as strongly as you yourself suppose. Many a man has lost the battle against himself far oftener than you have lost it yet, and has nevertheless won his victory in the end. I don't blame you, I don't distrust you. I only notice what has happened, to put you on your guard against yourself. Come! come! Let your own better sense help you; and you will agree with me, that there is really no evidence to justify the suspicion that the woman whom I met in Somersetshire, and the woman who attempted suicide in London, are one and the same. Need an old man like me remind a young man like you that there are thousands of women in England with beautiful figures—thousands of women who are quietly dressed in black silk gowns and red Paisley shawls?”

Midwinter caught eagerly at the suggestion; too eagerly, as it might have occurred to a harder critic on humanity than Mr. Brock.

“You are quite right, Sir,” he said, “and I am quite wrong. Tens of thousands of women answer the description, as you say. I have been wasting time on my own idle fancies when I ought to have been carefully gathering up facts. If this woman ever attempts to find her way to Allan I must be prepared to stop her.” He began searching restlessly among the manuscript leaves scattered about the table, paused over one of the pages, and examined it attentively. “This helps me to something positive,” he went on; “this helps me to a knowledge of her age. She was twelve at the time of Mrs. Armadale's marriage; add a year, and bring her to thirteen; add Allan's age (twenty-two), and we make her a woman of five-and-thirty at the present time. I know her age; and I know that she has her own reasons for being silent about her married life. This is something gained at the outset, and it may lead, in time, to something more.” He looked up brightly again at Mr. Brock. “Am I in the right way now, Sir? Am I doing my best to profit by the caution which you have kindly given me?”

“You are vindicating your own better sense,” answered the rector, encouraging him to trample down his own imagination, with an Englishman's ready distrust of the noblest of the human faculties. “You are paving the way for your own happier life.”

“Am I?” said the other, thoughtfully.

He searched among the papers once more, and stopped at another of the scattered pages.

“The Ship!” he exclaimed suddenly, his color changing again, and his manner altering on the instant.

“What ship?” asked the rector.

“The ship in which the deed was done,” Midwinter answered, with the first signs of impatience that he had shown yet. “The ship in which my father's murderous hand turned the lock of the cabin door.”

“What of it?” said Mr. Brock.

He appeared not to hear the question; his eyes remained fixed intently on the page that he was reading.

“A French vessel, employed in the timber trade,” he said, still speaking to himself; “a French vessel, named La Grace de Dieu. If my father's belief had been the right belief—if the Fatality had been following me, step by step, from my father's grave—in one or other of my voyages I should have fallen in with that ship.” He looked up again at Mr. Brock. “I am quite sure about it now,” he said. “Those women are two—and not one.”

Mr. Brock shook his head.

“I am glad you have come to that conclusion," he said. "But I wish you had reached it in some other way."

Midwinter started passionately to his feet, and seizing on the pages of the manuscript with both hands, flung them into the empty fire-place.

"For God's sake, let me burn it!" he exclaimed. "As long as there is a page left I shall read it. And as long as I read it my father gets the better of me in spite of myself!"

Mr. Brock pointed to the match-box. In another moment the confession was in flames. When the fire had consumed the last morsel of paper Midwinter drew a deep breath of relief.

"I may say, like Macbeth, 'Why, so, being gone, I am a man again!'" he broke out with a feverish gayety. "You look fatigued, Sir; and no wonder," he added, in a lower tone. "I have kept you too long from your rest—I will keep you no longer. Depend on my remembering what you have told me; depend on my standing between Allan and any enemy, man or woman, who comes near him. Thank you, Mr. Brock; a thousand, thousand times, thank you! I came into this room the most wretched of living men; I can leave it now as happy as the birds that are singing outside."

As he turned to the door the rays of the rising sun streamed through the window and touched the heap of ashes lying black in the black fire-place. The sensitive imagination of Midwinter kindled instantly at the sight.

"Look!" he said, joyously. "The promise of the Future shining over the ashes of the Past!"

An inexplicable pity for the man at the moment of his life when he needed pity least stole over the rector's heart when the door had closed, and he was left by himself again.

"Poor fellow!" he said, with an uneasy surprise at his own compassionate impulse. "Poor fellow!"

CHAPTER III.

DAY AND NIGHT.

THE morning hours had passed; the noon had come and gone; and Mr. Brock had started on the first stage of his journey home.

After parting from the rector in Douglas Harbor the two young men had returned to Castle-town, and had there separated at the hotel door, Allan walking down to the waterside to look after his yacht, and Midwinter entering the house to get the rest that he needed after a sleepless night.

He darkened his room; he closed his eyes—but no sleep came to him. On this first day of the rector's absence his sensitive nature extravagantly exaggerated the responsibility which he now held in trust for Mr. Brock. A nervous dread of leaving Allan by himself, even for a few hours only, kept him waking and doubting until it became a relief rather than a hardship to rise from the bed again, and following in Allan's footsteps, to take the way to the waterside which led to the yacht.

The repairs of the little vessel were nearly completed. It was a breezy, cheerful day; the land was bright, the water was blue, the quick waves leaped crisply in the sunshine, the men were singing at their work. Descending to the cabin, Midwinter discovered his friend busily occupied in attempting to set the place to rights. Habitually the least systematic of mortals, Allan now and then awoke to an overwhelming sense of the advantages of order, and on such occasions a perfect frenzy of tidiness possessed him. He was down on his knees, hotly and wildly at work, when Midwinter looked in on him, and was fast reducing the neat little world of the cabin to its original elements of chaos with a misdirected energy wonderful to see.

"Here's a mess!" said Allan, rising composedly on the horizon of his own accumulated litter. "Do you know, my dear fellow, I begin to wish I had let well alone."

Midwinter smiled, and came to his friend's assistance with the natural neat-handedness of a sailor.

The first object that he encountered was Allan's dressing-case, turned upside down, with half the contents scattered on the floor, and with a duster and a hearth-broom lying among them. Replacing the various objects which formed the furniture of the dressing-case one by one, Midwinter lighted unexpectedly on a miniature portrait of the old-fashioned oval form, primly framed in a setting of small diamonds.

"You don't seem to set much value on this," he said. "What is it?"

Allan bent over him, and looked at the miniature.

"It belonged to my mother," he answered; "and I set the greatest value on it. It is a portrait of my father."

Midwinter put the miniature abruptly into Allan's hands, and withdrew to the opposite side of the cabin.

"You know best where the things ought to be put in your own dressing-case," he said, keeping his back turned on Allan. "I'll make the place tidy on this side of the cabin, and you shall make the place tidy on the other."

He began setting in order the litter scattered about him on the cabin table and on the floor. But it seemed as if fate had decided that his friend's personal possessions should fall into his hands that morning employ them where he might. One among the first objects which he took up was Allan's tobacco-jar with the stopper missing, and with a letter (which appeared by the bulk of it to contain inclosures) crumpled into the mouth of the jar in the stopper's place.

"Did you know that you had put this here?" he asked. "Is the letter of any importance?"

Allan recognized it instantly. It was the first of the little series of letters which had followed the cruising party to the Isle of Man—the letter which young Armadale had briefly referred to as bringing him "more worries from those everlasting lawyers," and had then dismissed from further notice as recklessly as usual.

"This is what comes of being particularly careful," said Allan; "here is an instance of my extreme thoughtfulness. You may not think it, but I put the letter there on purpose. Every time I went to the jar, you know, I was sure to see the letter; and every time I saw the letter I was sure to say to myself, 'This must be answered.' There's nothing to laugh at; it was a perfectly sensible arrangement—if I could only have remembered where I put the jar. Suppose I tie a knot in my pocket-handkerchief this time? You have a wonderful memory, my dear fellow. Perhaps you'll remind me in the course of the day, in case I forget the knot next."

Midwinter saw his first chance, since Mr. Brock's departure, of usefully filling Mr. Brock's place.

"Here is your writing-case," he said, "why not answer the letter at once? If you put it away again you may forget it again."

"Very true," returned Allan. "But the worst of it is, I can't quite make up my mind what answer to write. I want a word of advice. Come and sit down here, and I'll tell you all about it."

With his loud boyish laugh—echoed by Midwinter, who caught the infection of his gayety—he swept a heap of miscellaneous encumbrances off the cabin sofa, and made room for his friend and himself to take their places. In the high flow of youthful spirits the two sat down to their trifling consultation over a letter lost in a tobacco-jar. It was a memorable moment to both of them, lightly as they thought of it at the time. Before they had risen again from their places they had taken the first irrevocable step together on the dark and tortuous road of their future lives.

Reduced to plain facts, the question on which Allan now required his friend's advice may be stated as follows:

While the various arrangements connected with the succession to Thorpe-Ambrose were in progress of settlement, and while the new possessor of the estate was still in London, a question had necessarily arisen relating to the person who should be appointed to manage the property. The steward employed by the Blanchard family had written, without loss of time, to offer his services. Although a perfectly competent and trust-worthy man, he failed to find favor in the eyes of the new proprietor. Acting, as usual, on his first impulses, and resolved, at all hazards, to install Midwinter as a permanent inmate at Thorpe-Ambrose, Allan had determined that the steward's place was the place exactly fitted for his friend, for the simple reason that it would necessarily oblige his friend to live with him on the estate. He had accordingly written to decline the proposal made to him without consulting Mr. Brock, whose disapproval he had good reason to fear; and without telling Midwinter, who would probably (if a chance were allowed him of choosing) have declined taking a situation which his previous training had by no means fitted him to fill. Further correspondence had followed this decision, and had raised two new difficulties which looked a little embarrassing on the face of them, but which Allan, with the assistance of his lawyers, easily contrived to solve. The first difficulty, of examining the outgoing steward's books, was settled by sending a professional accountant to Thorpe-Ambrose; and the second difficulty, of putting the steward's empty cottage to some profitable use (Allan's plans for his friend comprehending Midwinter's residence under his own roof), was met by placing the cottage on the list of an active house-agent in the neighboring county town. In this state the arrangements had been left when Allan quitted London. He had heard and thought nothing more of the matter until a letter from the lawyers had followed him to the Isle of Man, inclosing two proposals to occupy the cottage—both received on the same day—and requesting to hear, at his earliest convenience, which of the two he was prepared to accept.

Finding himself, after having conveniently forgotten the subject for some days past, placed face to face once more with the necessity for decision, Allan now put the two proposals into his friend's hands, and, after a rambling explanation of the circumstances of the case, requested to be favored with a word of advice. Instead of examining the proposals Midwinter unceremoniously put them aside, and asked the two very natural and very awkward questions of who the new steward was to be, and why he was to live in Allan's house?

"I'll tell you who, and I'll tell you why, when we get to Thorpe-Ambrose," said Allan. "In the mean time we'll call the steward X. Y. Z., and we'll say he lives with me, because I'm devilish sharp, and I mean to keep him under my own eye. You needn't look surprised. I know the man thoroughly well; he requires a good deal of management. If I offered him the steward's place beforehand his modesty would get in his way, and he would say—'No.' If I pitch him into it neck and crop, without a word of warning and with nobody at hand to relieve him of the situation, he'll have nothing for it but to consult my interests, and say—'Yes.' X. Y. Z. is not at all a bad fellow, I can tell you. You'll see him when we go to Thorpe-Ambrose; and I rather think you and he will get on uncommonly well together."

The humorous twinkle in Allan's eye, the sly significance in Allan's voice, would have betrayed his secret to a prosperous man. Midwinter was as far from suspecting it as the carpenters who were at work above them on the deck of the yacht.

"Is there no steward now on the estate?" he asked, his face showing plainly that he was far from feeling satisfied with Allan's answer. "Is the business neglected all this time?"

"Nothing of the sort!" returned Allan. "The business is going with 'a wet sheet and a flowing sail, and a wind that follows free.' I'm not joking—I'm only metaphorical. A regular accountant has poked his nose into the books, and a steady-going lawyer's clerk attends at the office once a week. That doesn't look like neglect, does it? Leave the new steward alone for the present, and just tell me which of those two tenants you would take if you were in my place."

Midwinter opened the proposals and read them attentively.

The first proposal was from no less a person than the solicitor at Thorpe-Ambrose, who had first informed Allan at Paris of the large fortune that had fallen into his hands. This gentleman wrote personally to say that he had long admired the cottage, which was charmingly situated within the limits of the Thorpe-Ambrose grounds. He was a bachelor, of studious habits, desirous of retiring to a country seclusion after the wear and tear of his business hours; and he ventured to say that Mr. Armadale, in accepting him as a tenant, might count on securing an unobtrusive neighbor, and on putting the cottage into responsible and careful hands.

The second proposal came through the house-agent and proceeded from a total stranger. The tenant who offered for the cottage, in this case, was a retired officer in the army—one Major Milroy. His family merely consisted of an invalid wife and an only child—a young lady. His references were unexceptionable; and he, too, was especially anxious to secure the cottage, as the perfect quiet of the situation was exactly what was required by Mrs. Milroy in her feeble state of health.

"Well! which profession shall I favor?" asked Allan. "The army or the law?"

"There seems to me to be no doubt about it," said Midwinter. "The lawyer has been already in correspondence with you; and the lawyer's claim is, therefore, the claim to be preferred."

"I knew you would say that. In all the thousands of times I have asked other people for advice I never yet got the advice I wanted. Here's this business of letting the cottage as an instance. I'm all on the other side myself. I want to have the major."

"Why?"

Young Armadale laid his forefinger on that part of the agent's letter which enumerated Major Milroy's family, and which contained the three words—"a young lady."

"A bachelor of studious habits walking about my grounds," said Allan, "is not an interesting object; a young lady is. I have not the least doubt Miss Milroy is a charming girl. Ozius Midwinter of the serious countenance! think of her pretty muslin dress flitting about among your trees and committing trespasses on your property; think of her adorable feet trotting into your fruit-garden, and her delicious fresh lips kissing your ripe peaches; think of her dimpled hands among your early violets, and her little cream-colored nose buried in your blush-roses! What does the studious bachelor offer me in exchange for the loss of all this? He offers me a rheumatic brown object in gaiters and a wig. No! no! Justice is good, my dear friend; but, believe me, Miss Milroy is better."

"Can you be serious about any mortal thing, Allan?"

"I'll try to be, if you like. I know I ought to take the lawyer; but what can I do if the major's daughter keeps running in my head?"

Midwinter returned resolutely to the just and the sensible view of the matter, and pressed it on his friend's attention with all the persuasion of which he was master. After listening with exemplary patience until he had done, Allan swept a supplementary accumulation of litter off the cabin table and produced from his waistcoat-pocket a half-crown coin.

"I've got an entirely new idea," he said. "Let's leave it to chance."

The absurdity of the proposal—as coming from a landlord—was irresistible. Midwinter's gravity deserted him.

"I'll spin," continued Allan, "and you shall call. We must give precedence to the army, of course; so we'll say Heads, the major; Tails, the lawyer. One spin to decide. Now, then, look out!"

He spun the half-crown on the cabin table.

"Tails!" cried Midwinter, humoring what he believed to be one of Allan's boyish jokes.

The coin fell on the table with the Head uppermost.

"You don't mean to say you are really in earnest!" said Midwinter, as the other opened his writing-case and dipped his pen in the ink.

"Oh, but I am, though!" replied Allan. "Chance is on my side and Miss Milroy's; and you're outvoted, two to one. It's no use arguing. The major has fallen uppermost, and the major shall have the cottage. I won't leave it to the lawyers—they'll only be worrying me with more letters; I'll write myself."

He wrote his answers to the two proposals, literally in two minutes. One to the house-agent: "Dear Sir, I accept Major Milroy's offer; let him come in when he pleases. Yours truly, Allan Armadale." And one to the lawyer: "Dear Sir, I regret that circumstances prevent me from accepting your proposal. Yours truly, etc., etc." "People make a fuss about letter-writing," Allan remarked, when he had done. "I find it easy enough."

He wrote the addresses on his two notes and stamped them for the post, whistling gayly. While he had been writing he had not noticed how his friend was occupied. When he had done, it struck him that a sudden silence had fallen on the cabin; and looking up, he observed that Midwinter's whole attention was strangely concentrated on the half-crown, as it lay head uppermost on the table. Allan suspended his whistling in astonishment.

"What on earth are you doing?" he asked.

"I was only wondering," replied Midwinter.

"What about?" persisted Allan.

"I was wondering," said the other, handing him back the half-crown, "whether there is such a thing as chance."

Half an hour later the two notes were posted; and Allan, whose close superintendence of the repairs of the yacht had hitherto allowed him but little leisure time on shore, had proposed to while away the idle hours by taking a walk in Castletown. Even Midwinter's nervous anxiety to deserve Mr. Brock's confidence in him could detect nothing objectionable in this harmless proposal, and the young men set forth together to see what they could make of the metropolis of the Isle of Man.

It is doubtful if there is a place on the habitable globe which, regarded as a sight-seeing investment offering itself to the spare attention of strangers, yields so small a per-centage of interest in return as Castletown. Beginning with the water-side, there was an inner harbor to see, with a draw-bridge to let vessels through; an outer harbor, ending in a dwarf light-house; a view of a flat coast to the right, and a view of a flat coast to the left. In the central solitudes of the city there was a squat gray building called "the castle;" also a memorial pillar dedicated to one Governor Smelt, with a flat top for a statue, and no statue standing on it; also a barrack, holding the half company of soldiers allotted to the island, and exhibiting one spirit-broken sentry at its lonely door. The prevalent color of the town was faint gray. The few shops open were parted at frequent intervals by other shops closed and deserted in despair. The weary lounging of boatmen on shore was trebly weary here; the youth of the district smoked together in speechless depression under the lee of a dead wall; the ragged children said, mechanically, "Give us a penny," and before the charitable hand could search the merciful pocket, lapsed away again in misanthropic doubt of the human nature they addressed. The silence of the grave overflowed the church-yard and filled this miserable town. But one edifice, prosperous to look at, rose consolatory in the desolation of these dreadful streets. Frequented by the students of the neighboring "College of King William," this building was naturally dedicated to the uses of a pastry-cook's shop. Here, at least (viewed through the friendly medium of the window), there was something going on for a stranger to see; for here, on high stools, the pupils of the college sat, with swinging legs and slowly-moving jaws, and, hushed in the horrid stillness of Castletown, gorged their pastry gravely, in an atmosphere of awful silence.

"Hang me if I can look any longer at the boys and the tarts!" said Allan, dragging his friend away from the pastry-cook's shop. "Let's try if we can't find something else to amuse us in the next street."

The first amusing object which the next street presented was a carver-and-gilder's shop, expiring feebly in the last stage of commercial decay. The counter inside displayed nothing to view but the recumbent head of a boy, peacefully asleep in the unbroken solitude of the place. In the window were exhibited to the passing stranger three forlorn little fly-spotted frames; a small posting-bill, dusty with long-continued neglect, announcing that the premises were to let; and one colored print, the last of a series illustrating the horrors of drunkenness, on the fiercest temperance principles. The composition—representing an empty bottle of gin, an immensely spacious garret, a perpendicular Scripture-reader, and a horizontal expiring family—appealed to public favor, under the entirely unobjectionable title of 'The Hand of Death.' Allan's resolution to extract amusement from Castletown by main force had resisted a great deal, but it failed him at this stage of the investigations. He suggested trying an excursion to some other place. Midwinter readily agreeing, they went back to the hotel to make inquiries. Thanks to the mixed influence of Allan's ready gift of familiarity and total want of method in putting his questions, a perfect deluge of information flowed in on the two strangers, relating to every subject but the subject which had actually brought them to the hotel. They made various interesting discoveries in connection with the laws and constitution of the Isle of Man, and the manners and customs of the natives. To Allan's delight the Manxmen spoke of England as of a well-known adjacent island, situated at a certain distance from the central empire of the Isle of Man. It was further revealed to the two Englishmen that this happy little nation rejoiced in laws of its own, publicly proclaimed once a year by the governor and the two head-judges, grouped together on the top of an ancient mound, in fancy costumes appropriate to the occasion. Possessing this enviable institution, the island added to it the inestimable blessing of a local parliament, called the House of Keys, an assembly far in advance of the other parliament belonging to the neighboring island, in this respect—that the members dispensed with the people, and solemnly elected each other. With these, and many more local particulars, extracted from all sorts and conditions of men in and about the hotel, Allan whiled away the weary time in his own essentially desultory manner, until the gossip died out of itself, and Midwinter (who had been speaking apart with the landlord) quietly recalled him to the matter in hand. The finest coast scenery in the island was said to be to the westward and the southward, and there was a fishing town in those regions called Port St. Mary, with a hotel at which travelers could sleep. If Allan's impressions of Castletown still inclined him to try an excursion to some other place, he had only to say so, and a carriage would be produced immediately. Allan jumped at the proposal, and in ten minutes more he and Midwinter were on their way to the western wilds of the island.

With trifling incidents, the day of Mr. Brock's departure had worn on thus far. With trifling incidents, in which not even Midwinter's nervous watchfulness could see any thing to distrust, it was still to proceed, until the night came—a night which one at least of the two companions was destined to remember to the end of his life.

Before the travelers had advanced two miles on their road an accident happened. The horse fell, and the driver reported that the animal had seriously injured himself. There was no alternative but to send for another carriage to Castletown, or to get on to Port St. Mary on foot. Deciding to walk, Midwinter and Allan had not gone far before they were overtaken by a gentleman driving alone in an open chaise. He civilly introduced himself as a medical man, living close to Port St. Mary, and offered seats in his carriage. Always ready to make new acquaintances, Allan at once accepted the proposal. He and the doctor (whose name was ascertained to be Hawbury) became friendly and familiar before they had been five minutes in the chaise together; Midwinter sitting behind them, reserved and silent, on the back seat. They separated just outside Port St. Mary, before Mr. Hawbury's house, Allan boisterously admiring the doctor's neat French windows, and pretty flower-garden and lawn, and wringing his hand at parting, as if they had known each other from boyhood upward. Arrived in Port St. Mary, the two friends found themselves in a second Castletown on a smaller scale. But the country round, wild, open, and hilly, deserved its reputation. A walk brought them well enough on with the day—still the harmless, idle day that it had been from the first—to see the evening near at hand. After waiting a little to admire the sun, setting grandly over hill, and heath, and crag, and talking, while they waited, of Mr. Brock and his long journey home, they returned to the hotel to order their early supper. Nearer and nearer the night, and the adventure which the night was to bring with it, came to the two friends; and still the only incidents that happened were incidents to be laughed at, if they were noticed at all. The supper was badly cooked; the waiting-maid was impenetrably stupid; the old-fashioned bell-rope in the coffee-room had come down in Allan's hands, and striking in its descent a painted china shepherdess on the chimney-piece, had laid the figure in fragments on the floor. Events as trifling as these were still the only events that had happened, when the twilight faded, and the lighted candles were brought into the room.

Finding Midwinter, after the double fatigue of a sleepless night and a restless day, but little inclined for conversation, Allan left him resting on the sofa, and lounged into the passage of the hotel, on the chance of discovering somebody to talk to. Here another of the trivial incidents of the day brought Allan and Mr. Hawbury together again, and helped—whether happily or not yet remained to be seen—to strengthen the acquaintance between them on either side.

The "bar" of the hotel was situated at one end of the passage, and the landlady was in attendance there, mixing a glass of liquor for the doctor, who had just looked in for a little gossip. On Allan's asking permission to make a third in the drinking and the gossiping Mr. Hawbury civilly handed him the glass which the landlady had just filled. It contained cold brandy and water. A marked change in Allan's face, as he suddenly drew back and asked for whisky instead, caught the doctor's medical eye. "A case of nervous antipathy," said Mr. Hawbury, quietly taking the glass away again. The remark obliged Allan to acknowledge that he had an insurmountable loathing (which he was foolish enough to be a little ashamed of mentioning) to the smell and taste of brandy. No matter with what diluting liquid the spirit was mixed, the presence of it—instantly detected by his organs of taste and smell—turned him sick and faint if the drink touched his lips. Starting from this personal confession the talk turned on antipathies in general; and the doctor acknowledged, on his side, that he took a professional interest in the subject, and that he possessed a collection of curious cases at home, which his new acquaintance was welcome to look at, if Allan had nothing else to do that evening, and if he would call, when the medical work of the day was over, in an hour's time.

Cordially accepting the invitation (which was extended to Midwinter also, if he cared to profit by it) Allan returned to the coffee-room to look after his friend. Half asleep and half awake, Midwinter was still stretched on the sofa, with the local newspaper just dropping out of his languid hand.

"I heard your voice in the passage," he said, drowsily. "Who were you talking to?"

"The doctor," replied Allan. "I am going to smoke a cigar with him in an hour's time. Will you come too?"

Midwinter assented with a weary sigh. Always shyly unwilling to make new acquaintances, fatigue increased the reluctance he now felt to become Mr. Hawbury's guest. As matters stood, however, there was no alternative but to go; for with Allan's constitutional imprudence there was no safely trusting him alone any where, and more especially in a stranger's house. Mr. Brock would certainly not have left his pupil to visit the doctor alone; and Midwinter was still nervously conscious that he occupied Mr. Brock's place.

"What shall we do till it's time to go?" asked Allan, looking about him. "Any thing in this?" he added, observing the fallen newspaper and picking it up from the floor.

"I'm too tired to look. If you find any thing interesting read it out," said Midwinter, thinking that the reading might help to keep him awake.

Part of the newspaper, and no small part of it, was devoted to extracts from books recently published in London. One of the works most largely laid under contribution in this manner was of the sort to interest Allan: it was a highly-spiced narrative of Traveling Adventures in the wilds of Australia. Pouncing on an extract which described the sufferings of the travelling-party, lost in a trackless wilderness, and in danger of dying by thirst, Allan announced that he had found something to make his friend's flesh creep, and began eagerly to read the passage aloud. Resolute not to sleep, Midwinter followed the progress of the adventure, sentence by sentence, without missing a word. The consultation of the lost travelers, with death by thirst staring them in the face; the resolution to press on while their strength lasted; the fall of a heavy shower, the vain efforts made to catch the rain-water, the transient relief experienced by sucking their wet clothes; the sufferings renewed a few hours after; the night-advance of the strongest of the party, leaving the weakest behind; the following a flight of birds when morning dawned; the discovery by the lost men of the broad pool of water that saved their lives—all this Midwinter's fast-failing attention mastered painfully, Allan's voice growing fainter and fainter on his ear with every sentence that was read. Soon the next words seemed to drop away gently, and nothing but the slowly-sinking sound of the voice was left. Then the light in the room darkened gradually; the sound dwindled into delicious silence; and the last waking impressions of the weary Midwinter came peacefully to an end.

The next event of which he was conscious was a sharp ringing at the closed door of the hotel. He started to his feet with the ready alacrity of a man whose life has accustomed him to wake at the shortest notice. An instant's look round showed him that the room was empty; and a glance at his watch told him that it was close on midnight. The noise made by the sleepy servant in opening the door, and the tread the next moment of quick footsteps in the passage, filled him with a sudden foreboding of something wrong. As he hurriedly stepped forward to go out and make inquiry the door of the coffee-room opened, and the doctor stood before him.

"I am sorry to disturb you," said Mr. Hawbury. "Don't be alarmed; there's nothing wrong."

"Where is my friend?" asked Midwinter.

"At the pier-head," answered the doctor.

"I am, to a certain extent, responsible for what he is doing now; and I think some careful person, like yourself, ought to be with him."

The hint was enough for Midwinter. He and the doctor set out for the pier immediately—Mr. Hawbury mentioning on the way the circumstances under which he had come to the hotel.

Punctual to the appointed hour Allan had made his appearance at the doctor's house; explaining that he had left his weary friend so fast asleep on the sofa that he had not had the heart to wake him. The evening had passed pleasantly, and the conversation had turned on many subjects—until, in an evil hour, Mr. Hawbury had dropped a hint which showed that he was fond of sailing, and that he possessed a pleasure-boat of his own in the harbor. Excited on the instant by his favorite topic, Allan had left his host no hospitable alternative but to take him to the pier-head and show him the boat. The beauty of the night and the softness of the breeze had done the rest of the mischief—they had filled Allan with irresistible longings for a sail by moonlight. Prevented from accompanying his guest by professional hindrances which obliged him to remain on shore, the doctor, not knowing what else to do, had ventured on disturbing Midwinter rather than take the responsibility of allowing Mr. Armadale (no matter how well he might be accustomed to the sea) to set off on a sailing trip at midnight entirely by himself.

The time taken to make this explanation brought Midwinter and the doctor to the pier-head. There, sure enough, was young Armadale in the boat, hoisting the sail, and singing the sailor's "Yo-heave-ho!" at the top of his voice.

"Come along, old boy!" cried Allan. "You're just in time for a frolic by moonlight!"

Midwinter suggested a frolic by daylight, and an adjournment to bed in the mean time.

"Bed!" cried Allan, on whose harum-scarum high spirits Mr. Hawbury's hospitality had certainly not produced a sedative effect. "Hear him, doctor! one would think he was ninety! Bed, you drowsy old dormouse! Look at that—and think of bed if you can!"

He pointed to the sea. The moon was shining in the cloudless heaven; the night breeze blew soft and steady from the land; the peaceful waters rippled joyfully in the silence and the glory of the night. Midwinter turned to the doctor, with a wise resignation to circumstances: he had seen enough to satisfy him that all words of remonstrance would be words simply thrown away.

"How is the tide?" he asked.

Mr. Hawbury told him.

"Are the oars in the boat?"

"Yes."

"I am well used to the sea," said Midwinter, descending the pier steps. "You may trust me to take care of my friend, and to take care of the boat."

"Good-night, doctor!" shouted Allan. "Your whisky and water is delicious—your boat's a little beauty—and you're the best fellow I ever met in my life!"

The doctor laughed, and waved his hand; and the boat glided out from the harbor, with Midwinter at the helm.

As the breeze then blew they were soon abreast of the westward headland, bounding the bay of Poolvash; and the question was started whether they should run out to sea or keep along the shore. The wisest proceeding, in the event of the wind failing them, was to keep by the land. Midwinter altered the course of the boat, and they sailed on smoothly in a south-westerly direction, abreast of the coast.

Little by little the cliffs rose in height, and the rocks, massed wild and jagged, showed rifted black chasms yawning deep in their seaward sides. Off the bold promontory called Spanish Head Midwinter looked ominously at his watch. But Allan pleaded hard for half an hour more, and for a glance at the famous channel of the Sound, which they were now fast nearing, and of which he had heard some startling stories from the workmen employed on his yacht. The new change which Midwinter's compliance with this request rendered it necessary to make in the course of the boat, brought her close to the wind; and revealed, on one side, the grand view of the southernmost shores of the Isle of Man, and, on the other, the black precipices of the islet called the Calf, separated from the main land by the dark and dangerous channel of the Sound.

Once more Midwinter looked at his watch. "We have gone far enough," he said. "Stand by the sheet!"

"Stop!" cried Allan, from the bows of the boat. "Good God! here's a wrecked ship right ahead of us!"

Midwinter let the boat fall off a little, and looked where the other pointed.

There, stranded midway between the rocky boundaries on either side of the Sound—there, never again to rise on the living waters from her grave on the sunken rock; lost and lonely in the quiet night; high, and dark, and ghostly in the yellow moonshine, lay the Wrecked Ship.

"I know the vessel," said Allan, in great excitement. "I heard my workmen talking of her yesterday. She drifted in here on a pitch-dark night when they couldn't see the lights. A poor old worn-out merchantman, Midwinter, that the shipbrokers have bought to break up. Let's run in and have a look at her."

Midwinter hesitated. All the old sympathies of his sea-life strongly inclined him to follow Allan's suggestion; but the wind was falling light, and he distrusted the broken water and the swirling currents of the channel ahead. "This is an ugly place to take a boat into when you know nothing about it," he said.

"Nonsense!" returned Allan. "It's as light as day, and we float in two feet of water."

Before Midwinter could answer the current caught the boat and swept them onward through the channel straight toward the Wreck.

"Lower the sail," said Midwinter, quietly, "and ship the oars. We are running down on her fast enough now, whether we like it or not."

Both well accustomed to the use of the oar, they brought the course of the boat under sufficient control to keep her on the smoothest side of the channel—the side which was nearest to the Islet of the Calf. As they came swiftly up with the wreck, Midwinter resigned his oar to Allan; and, watching his opportunity, caught a hold with the boat-hook on the forechains of the vessel. The next moment they had the boat safely in hand, under the lee of the Wreck.

The ship's ladder used by the workmen hung over the forechains. Mounting it, with the boat's rope in his teeth, Midwinter secured one end, and lowered the other to Allan in the boat. "Make that fast," he said, "and wait till I see if it's all safe on board." With those words he disappeared behind the bulwark.

"Wait?" repeated Allan, in the blankest astonishment at his friend's excessive caution. "What on earth does he mean? I'll be hanged if I wait—where one of us goes the other goes too!"

He hitched the loose end of the rope round the forward thwart of the boat; and, swinging himself up the ladder, stood the next moment on the deck. "Any thing very dreadful on board?" he inquired, sarcastically, as he and his friend met.

Midwinter smiled. "Nothing whatever," he replied. "But I couldn't be sure that we were to have the whole ship to ourselves till I got over the bulwark and looked about me."

Allan took a turn on the deck, and surveyed the wreck critically from stem to stern.

"Not much of a vessel," he said; "the Frenchmen generally build better ships than this."

Midwinter crossed the deck, and eyed Allan in a momentary silence.

"Frenchmen?" he repeated, after an interval. "Is this vessel French?"

"Yes."

"How do you know?"

"The men I have got at work on the yacht told me. They know all about her."

Midwinter came a little nearer. His swarthy face began to look, to Allan's eyes, unaccountably pale in the moonlight.

"Did they mention what trade she was engaged in?"

"Yes—the timber trade."

As Allan gave that answer Midwinter's lean brown hand clutched him fast by the shoulder, and Midwinter's teeth chattered in his head like the teeth of a man struck by a sudden chill.

"Did they tell you her name?" he asked, in a voice that dropped suddenly to a whisper.

"They did, I think. But it has slipped my memory. Gently, old fellow; those long claws of yours are rather tight on my shoulder."

"Was the name—?" he stopped, removed his hand, and dashed away the great drops that were gathering on his forehead—"Was the name La Grace de Dieu?"

"How the deuce did you come to know it? That's the name, suré enough. La Grace de Dieu."

At one bound Midwinter leapt on the bulwark of the wreck.

"The boat!!!" he cried, with a scream of horror that rang far and wide through the stillness of the night, and brought Allan instantly to his side.

The lower end of the carelessly-hitched rope was loose on the water; and ahead, in the track of the moonlight, a small black object was floating out of view. The boat was adrift.

SHERIDAN'S VICTORY OF MIDDLETOWN.

SHERIDAN'S battle-fields of Strasburg and Middletown are near neighbors. A regiment of infantry can march from one to another in two hours; and both are overlooked, almost overhung, by the bold brow of the Massanutten Mountain. Indeed, if Early, on the 18th of October, the day previous to his brilliant attack and singular defeat, wished to view the length and breadth of the Union position, he had only to ascend the conical height which rises like a citadel close in rear of the gigantic natural parapets of Fisher's Hill, where his own army lay intrenched. Along the base of this cone I had seen his musketry flashing in a spiteful semicircle during half an hour of the evening of the 22d of September, making a desperate and vain struggle to secure, not victory, but undisturbed retreat. That headlong, night-long flight and pursuit did not cease until Sheridan was south of Mount Crawford. Then he returned at his leisure, sweeping the fertile Shenandoah Valley from mountain to mountain with his cavalry, destroying every barn and every stack of forage, and turning once to wrest from Lomax his head-quarter wagons, eleven of his twelve pieces of artillery, and two hundred prisoners. Fisher's Hill was abandoned because it presents no good defensible line on its southern slope. But four or five miles to the north of it Sheridan halted, and here was fought the extraordinary battle of the 19th of October.

The Union position was an echelon of three lines, posted on three separate crests of moderate height. The left and most advanced crest was held by the Army of Western Virginia; the central one, half a mile to the rear of the first, by the Nineteenth Corps; the right and rearmost by the Sixth Corps. Crook commanded the first step of the echelon, Emory the second, Wright the third. Behind Crook's left and at right angles to it, guarding against a turning movement from that quarter, lay a force about equivalent to a brigade, known as Kitching's Provisional Division. The fronts, and to some extent the flanks, of the Army of Western Virginia and of the Nineteenth Corps were strengthened by breast-works of logs and earth, with batteries in position. Between these two commands ran the Strasburg and Winchester pike, the great highway of this part of the valley. The entire echelon occupied by the infantry and artillery was at least three miles in length, in addition to which the rolling country on the right of the Sixth Corps was occupied by Torbert's superb cavalry. In front the position was impregnable except by a surprise, and to turn it was an enterprise so dangerous that it was hardly dreaded.

But it seems that it was not safe to rely on the timidity of Early. It is impossible not to accord admiration to this misguided man and unlucky General for his elasticity under misfortune. Undismayed by three severe defeats, or possibly goaded by them to an act of sublime desperation, he planned and performed the most audacious, most difficult, and best-executed nocturnal flank movement of the war. He had just received a reinforcement of twelve thousand men, which increased his strength to twenty-seven thousand. Eight thousand, it is reported, were unarmed; but they were organized and officered, and were thus ready for service the moment they could get muskets; they needed only a successful attack to fit them out with the spoils of dead, wounded, and prisoners. Of this reinforcement, which arrived the day before the battle, we knew nothing. Indeed I suspect that we were very imperfectly aware of the condition of Early's army all the time that it lay in this position. Of course we had repeatedly pushed out strong reconnoitring columns; but to reconnoitre Fisher's Hill, with its bluffs and precipices and forests, was much like reconnoitring a first-class regular fortress; unless you stormed and took it you could not find out what was in it. Accordingly we no more knew the strength than we knew the designs of the army whose noiseless steps, like the footfalls of stealing panthers, were creeping upon us through that moonless, misty night of October. Early was equally uninformed, he was even misinformed, with regard to us. He attacked in the belief that the Sixth Corps was at Front Royal, whereas it was with us, and that Sheridan was in Washington, whereas he had come as far on his return as Winchester.

Before midnight Early's entire army was in motion. His cavalry and light artillery had orders to advance upon our right so as to occupy the attention of Torbert and of the Sixth Corps. His infantry marched in five columns, of which Gordon's, Ramseur's, and Pegram's were to place themselves by daybreak on the left-rear of the whole Union position, while Kershaw's and Wharton's should at the same hour be close under the intrenched crest held by the army of Western Virginia. To turn our left it was necessary to descend into the gorge at the base of the Massanutten Mountain, ford the north fork of the Shenandoah, and skirt Crook's position for miles, passing in some places within four hundred yards of his pickets. Three days previous the movement would have been impossible, as a brigade of our cavalry then held the road along which the rebels now filed without opposition. As it was, Early's enterprise was hazardous almost beyond parallel. Had we caught him in the midst of it we should have ruined him: our infantry would have cut his in two, while our cavalry would have prevented retreat to Fisher's Hill: he would have lost half his army, and we should not have lost a thousand men. But the management of the advance was admirable: the canteens had been left in camp lest they should clatter against the shanks of the bayonets: the men conducted themselves with the usual intelligence of the American soldier, whether Northern or Southern; and this fearfully perilous night march under the nose of a powerful enemy was accomplished with a success little less than miraculous. There was a moment, indeed, when the audacious column trod on the brink of destruction. About two o'clock in the morning the pickets of the Fifth New York Heavy Artillery, serving as infantry in Kitching's Division, heard a rustling of underbrush and a muffled, multitudinous trampling. Two posts were relieved and sent into camp with the information. General Crook ordered his command to be upon the alert, and most of the front line went into the trenches. But there was not a private in the army, and hardly an officer, who believed that the often-beaten and badly-beaten Early would venture an attack. No reconnoissance was sent out to see if the alarm were well-founded; the gaps in the front line caused by the detachment of regiments on picket were not filled up from the reserve; and when the assault took place it found many muskets unloaded. An hour before daybreak the rebel infantry, shivering with cold, but formed and ready for battle, lay within six hundred yards of Union camps, which were either sleeping or only half awake with suspicion. On the extreme right was Gordon, diagonally in rear of the Nineteenth Corps; on the left of Crook, facing Kitching's provisional division, was Ramseur supported by Pegram; in front of Crook was Kershaw supported by Wharton. There is even an incredible story that Kershaw's men regularly relieved a portion of the pickets of the Army of Western Virginia.

That morning I was in my saddle before daybreak. The Second Division, Nineteenth Corps, was to make at early dawn a reconnoissance on Fisher's Hill; and General Emory had ordered that an aid should report to him the exact minute of the departure of the column. I mention this circumstance as an example, probably curious to civilians, of the careful supervision which a veteran officer maintains over his command. Accordingly I was with General Grover, the commander of the Second Division, waiting for the troops to move. The "awful rose of dawn," softened and sombered in color by thick morning mist, had just faintly blossomed over a low eastern crest, and dark lines of infantry were dimly visible in the gray light, when, far away on our left, a terrific rattle of musketry burst forth with amazing suddenness, followed by scream on scream of the well-known rebel battle-yell, the savage clamor revealing to us in an instant that Early, in great force, had assaulted Crook's position. Grover listened to the appalling outburst of battle without even a gesture of surprise, and said to an aid in his usual tranquil tone, "Tell the brigade commanders to move their men into the trenches."

I galloped back to corps head-quarters to inform General Emory of what he knew as well as I.

"Go and report to the General commanding," he replied, "that the enemy have attacked Crook's left in force."

As I rode away I heard him remark, "I said so. I knew that if we were attacked it would be there."

I must be permitted here to do justice to the prevision of my corps commander. Two days previous to this he had visited Crook's position, and had asserted that it did not command the valley in its front, and that we could be turned from that quarter. "They can march thirty thousand men through there," he said, "and we not know it till we have them on our flank."

I found General Wright, surrounded by his staff, preparing to mount.

"Have you any knowledge how the assault has succeeded?" he asked, when I had delivered my message.

"None. I can only guess. I suppose it has failed. I infer it from the sudden cessation of the firing and yelling."

It was a bad guess. Under cover of the fog Kershaw's column swept through Crook's pickets without responding to their scattering musketry, and took most of them prisoners. The men in the trenches, unable to see what was going on, and receiving no timely notice from the outposts, fired too late, or, caught with unloaded rifles, did not fire at all. There was a bloody struggle over the breast-works, but it did not last five minutes. Through the unmanned gaps in the lines poured the rebels in a roaring torrent; and then came a brief massacre, followed by lasting panic and disorganization. Less than a quarter of an hour of that infernal musketry and yelling, which we heard so plainly and understood so imperfectly, changed the gallant Army of Western Virginia—that army which had charged with such magnificent success at Winchester and Strasburg—into a mass of fugitives hurrying back upon the position of the Nineteenth Corps. There were regiments, indeed, which fought with a steadiness worthy of their ancient reputation; but no considerable nor continuing line of resistance was established any where after the first break, and the rebel advance was only checked to re-form. No day-break rush of moccasined savages was ever more silently, rapidly, and dextrously executed than this charge of Kershaw. The second battalion of the Fifth New York Heavy Artillery was taken on the picket line almost entire; and the resistance of the whole command was so momentary that, while it lost seven hundred prisoners, it had hardly a hundred killed and wounded.

Now came the turn of the Nineteenth Corps to fight alone. The Army of Western Virginia had temporarily disappeared as an organization, and the Sixth Corps was menaced by cavalry and light artillery, covering no one knew what force of infantry. When I reached our headquarters on my return from General Wright's I was amazed by hearing on our left-rear a lively rattle of picket musketry. I thought of riding up to the misty crest, a quarter of a mile distant, which stopped the view in that direction; but no heavy firing ensued, and I concluded that it was only a trifling affair between our outposts and some scouting party of cavalry. Had I put my first thought into execution I should have seen Gordon's column, solidly massed, coming swiftly up the slope, disdaining to reply to the pickets, and driving them with the mere weight of its advance. Here, as every where throughout the battle, the enemy knew our ground perfectly, and in consequence moved over it without wasting their time in reconnoitring or their troops in skirmishing. It was this amazing rapidity of manœuvre, this audacity which could not be foreseen nor guarded against, that beat us. To fight with any chance of success we must change our whole front; and yet we did not know it, nor had we the time to effect it. The position which Gordon was now on the point of seizing was a broad, bare hill, of which the southwestern declivity sloped gently toward the camp of the Nineteenth Corps, and commanded it. From the moment that he held it we were sure to go: ten thousand men there would easily drive out fifteen thousand here; all the more easily, of course, if they could take them, as we were taken, in reverse. The rebel force on this side, including the now not distant divisions of Ramseur and Pegram, was as strong as Emory's, and it was supported by another column, almost as numerous, coming up through the woods on our left and along the pike in our front. The Nineteenth Corps was not only attacked in rear, but it was outnumbered. It might hold on for an hour; and so it did hold on for a hopeless, sanguinary hour, but that was all that mortals could do.

General Emory had already been joined by Generals Wright and Crook when I found him near the breast-works. He knew consequently that a great disaster had happened, but he said nothing of it in my hearing, and I was far from guessing it. I saw, indeed, a ceaseless flow of stragglers pouring out of the wood on our left, and passing us toward the rear; but I supposed that they were the cooks, etc., of Crook's command getting out of the range of fire, according to the prudent custom of non-combatants. It seems that M'Millan's Brigade had already been pushed out in that direction to arrest the progress of the enemy, and to enable the West Virginian Army to rally. Fearing that this brigade had broken, General Emory sent me to find out who the stragglers were. As I approached the wood the stream of fugitives increased in volume until it was like a division in column of march, except that there were no files, no ranks, no organization. They were not breathless, not running, but they were going to the rear in utter confusion.

"To the Eighth Corps," "To the Eighth Corps," man after man responded when I asked what command they belonged to.

"Captain, what does this mean?" I said to the first officer whom I met.

"Why, I suppose it means that we are retreating," he replied, with a bitter smile.

"What! has Crook been driven from his position?" I exclaimed, realizing at last the all but incredible calamity.

"His men have," he said, with the same hopeless smile, glancing around at the horde of retreating soldiers.

In going back to the General I rode along the line of M'Millan's Brigade, and warned such regimental commanders as I could see that their fiery trial was at hand. I had scarcely left it when another aid came up with orders for it to advance, and, breasting the current of fugitives, it pushed into the tangled wood which was soon to be its slaughter-pen. About the same time General Emory ordered two other brigades across the pike, with instructions to face toward the crest on which Gordon was beginning to show himself. The remaining three brigades of the corps continued at the breast-works. It was evident that to hold our position we needed the help of the Sixth Corps, and it was almost equally evident that it would not arrive in time.

A roar of musketry from the wood told us that M'Millan's Brigade had opened its struggle, but did not tell us how hopelessly it was overmatched, flanked on the left as it was by Ramseur, and charged in front and on the right by Kershaw. Within a space of ten minutes a sanguinary drama was enacted in that tangled thicket of trees and undergrowth. My own old regiment, the Twelfth Connecticut, fired three volleys at close quarters before it was forced into the first retreat that it ever made under the assault of an enemy. The resistance of the other regiments was similarly desperate, bloody, brief, and hopeless. In the haste of slaughter men could not reload, but fought with their bayonets and clubbed rifles. After the battle was over we found corpses here with their skulls crushed by the blows of musket-butts, and with their life-blood clotted around the triangular wounds made by bayonets. The opposing troops were so intermingled that they could not in all cases distinguish each other as enemies. "What the devil are you firing this way for?" said Lieutenant Mullen, of the Twelfth Connecticut, to a squad which he supposed from its position to belong to the Eighth Vermont, but which was shooting down the men of his company. The answer was half a dozen rifle shots, fortunately ill-aimed, and an equally inefficacious summons of, "Surrender, you damned Yankee!" Lieutenant-Colonel Lewis, of the same regiment, was saluted by cries of, "Shoot that officer!" followed by a scattering volley of harmless bullets. As the shattered ranks came out upon the open ground they were raked by the fire of a line drawn up across the very hollow through which they had entered the wood not twenty minutes previous. During that day the brigade lost more than one-third of its fighting men, the greater part of them on this horrible hill of sacrifice, where it offered itself up for the salvation of the army. Among those who died here was Corporal William Putnam, of Company C, Twelfth Connecticut, a lineal descendant of the revolutionary general and patriot, and a brave, noble young soldier.

Not a regimental color was lost, and the brigade rallied two hundred yards from the scene of its defeat. But this second stand was feeble and momentary, effecting nothing but a little more useless bloodshed. As a rule, troops can not be rallied for good under the same fire that has already broken them, unless they are supported by a reinforcement strong enough to take the brunt of the contest off their hands at least for a few minutes. A semicircle of dropping musketry converged on the new position, coming up the pike on the right, out of the wood in front, and down the slope on the left. The men seemed bewildered, and could not be brought to fire; indeed, it was difficult for them to judge which way they ought to fire. As I rode along the rear, begging them to stand fast and use their rifles, I was amazed to observe how these veterans of many fights differed from their former selves as I had seen them on fields of victory. To get another desperate struggle out of them here was evidently impossible; and some one wiser than I, and possessed of more authority, ordered a retreat.

About this time our other two advanced brigades were pushed back, partially by the fire which came up the pike, but chiefly by that of Gordon, whose division was now deployed on the crest, stretching far behind us and even holding a wood in rear of the private grounds where both Sheridan and Emory had pitched their head-quarters. Our tents had been struck, loaded, and driven away under a shower of bullets. The ambulance, ammunition, and provision trains were in full retreat along a miserable country road, which crossed Cedar Creek by a single narrow ford and led in a circuitous direction toward Winchester. To carry off this immense mass of clumsy vehicles with a loss of only four or five was a wonderful feat under the circumstances, and greatly to the credit of our quartermasters and commissaries. Several of the drivers and animals were brought down by Gordon's musketry. The ammunition wagons had scarcely begun to file out of park when a bold rebel trooper dashed up and said, "Here, move that train out this way." One of the infantry guard, a recruit of the One Hundred and Seventy-sixth New York, answered, "What the hell have you got to do with this train?" and knocked the fellow over with a bullet.

As is usual in battles the comic was mingled with the tragic. Patrick, one of our negro waiters, made a gallant attempt to lead off the cow of our mess, but the creature was slow, and the pair were overtaken by half a dozen bullets and a shout of, "Come here, you black son of a gun!" Patrick dropped the leading rope and showed his heels, leaving the cow on the field with a ball in her comely round abdomen. At the little stone-house near our head-quarters a reporter of the New York Herald was yelling for his blanket-roll, and getting it through the half-opened door-way, which was immediately closed in his face to keep out the bullets. The poor woman and children who occupied this house remained shut in it all day, cowering below the level of the windows for safety. The appearance of the country northward from this point was both curious and doleful. All who did not fight, and many whose business it was to fight, together with many whose bloody clothing showed that their fighting for that day was over, were moving to the rear confusedly, and yet with extraordinary deliberation. Over a space of a mile square the fields were dotted with wagons, ambulances, pack-mules, army followers, and soldiers, the latter chiefly from Crook's command, none of them running, but all unquestionably taking the directest safe route to Winchester.

About the time that our people on the pike gave way General Emory's white horse, a conspicuous mark on account of his color, was killed by a rifle bullet; but he remounted immediately, and rode to the right of the position to see what could be done with the brigades which still occupied the trenches and had not been brought into action. A few moments afterward, all show of resistance on this line having ceased, I followed in search of him. Looking rearward I saw a brigade, I do not know what brigade, or it might have been only a large regiment, retreat at double-quick until it fell into confusion, when I saw the officers spring out with drawn swords, struggle with the panic and overcome it, after which the retreat continued, but at the ordinary marching step and in good order. Another brigade, equally unknown to me, I saw come toward the pike, also at a double-quick, go into line, and make a momentary attempt to face the long, victorious front of Gordon. I did not see the noble death of Lieutenant Morton, of the First Maine Battery, although it must have happened at about this period of the battle. Ordered by Major Bradbury to check the rebels with grape, as they had been checked by the same battery during a dangerous crisis of the fight at Winchester, he galloped to the pike with two pieces, unlimbered and opened fire, without the support of infantry and within two hundred paces of the rebel line, losing his horses, his guns, half his men, and his life in the heroic, hopeless effort. With these temporary exceptions every thing that lived was drifting steadily toward the right of our position, swept thither by the steady tide of hostile musketry, through which the boom of Early's artillery began to thunder. The last belated stragglers were hurrying from our camps and parades, leaving behind them only the helpless wounded and the dead who needed no succor. The hard-trodden earth was flecked with little whiffs of dust raised by bullets, and their sharp, angry whit-whit sang perpetually through an atmosphere acrid with the smoke of gunpowder. Here and there were splashes of blood, and trailing zigzags of blood, and great clotting pools of blood, and stiffening bodies of men and horses. I never on any other battle-field saw so much blood as on this of Middletown. The firm limestone soil would not receive it, and there was no pitying summer grass to hide it.

When I rejoined General Emory he had just made his last possible disposition for further resistance on his original ground; he had formed Birge's Brigade on the reverse side of its own breast-works, while M'Millan had posted Davis's Brigade in a similar manner. This shallow ditch on the outside of a redoubt was the final hold that the Nineteenth Corps had on its position. It was in the case of a man who has been pushed out of a window, and who desperately clings to the sill with the ends of his fingers. Behind the troops was a steep and rocky hill-side, gnarled with stunted trees, affording no chance of rallying, and a miserable chance of orderly retreat. To me the condition of things seemed utterly forlorn and hopeless. But the General was bent upon fighting his ship, so to speak, till even her quarter-deck was under water.

"What has Bradbury stopped firing for?" he asked. "Captain, ride over to that hill, and tell the Chief of Artillery to reopen with those pieces."

Descending a rough gully, and mounting a stony height, I found Bradbury sitting on his horse behind Taft's Battery, and gave him the message.

"Our infantry is in the way," he said. "Moreover, we ought to move. The blackguards are between us and Winchester already, and we shall lose these guns if we stop any longer."

A broad view of the field was to be had from this elevated point; and I could clearly see that the battle on our present line was lost beyond redemption; was indeed already roaring and smoking half a mile to the rear of us. The Sixth Corps was pushing toward the wood behind the late site of our head-quarters, and endeavoring to regain possession of the pike, but with doubtful prospects of success. Gordon, extending constantly by the right, and supported now by the full force of Ramseur and Pegram, seemed to be outflanking them as he had previously outflanked us. Except the two brigades of Birge and Davis, all our Nineteenth Corps, unable to rally on an uncovered slope, was retreating across the front and toward the right of the Sixth Corps' position. I had scarcely taken in this fact when Taft was ordered to withdraw in the same direction. The only road left him was the natural face of the steep and rocky hill. The attempt was coolly and carefully made: no New Hampshire stage-driver could be more deliberately sagacious over a nasty piece of road than were these artillerymen; but three of the four brass Napoleons were left bottom up in the rugged gullies.

And now the struggle to retain possession of our camp was over. Birge's and Davis's brigades filed in good order down a stony slope overgrown with thickets, forded Cedar Creek, and mounted the irregular height on the right of the Sixth Corps. Here they formed line of battle along a low crest over which Kershaw's bullets were singing. Other troops were there; but what they were I can not say—I was too busy to ask. One line had four regimental colors in it, and must have been a brigade, but could not have contained more than two hundred men. In front of us, firing from the undulating plateau which we had just quitted, we could see the rebel infantry. For a few minutes the battle was sharp here; and then it slowly swept rearward again. It was Early's continually extending right which turned us out of this, as it had turned us out of every other line that we had attempted to hold. The Sixth Corps could no more outfront it or resist it than we. All our fighting that morning was fragmentary, and consequently feeble in effect, however gallant in purpose and bloody in character. We never could get men enough into action at once; the enemy forever overlapped our front and doubled back our left. As a group of camp-followers passed me I heard one of them say loudly and cheerfully, "The bloody Sixth is going in. They'll stop these blasted cusses. They say that, by Jesus, they'll hold 'em!"

But the "bloody Sixth" was forced to go, like the Army of Western Virginia and the Nineteenth Corps before it, only perhaps with rather more deliberation and unity, just in proportion as it had more time to prepare for the struggle, and to learn the course of the hostile advance. I was beside Birge and close in rear of his brigade, when I saw him look anxiously toward the pike and then order a retreat. The Sixth Corps was retiring, and we were in danger of being enfiladed. A thousand yards further to the rear, on another crest, the line again halted, fronted, and opened fire, while strenuous efforts were made to bring up and reorganize the mass of stragglers who were sauntering across the fields toward Winchester. Chase's Battery and what remained of Taft's went into position; and for perhaps half an hour the battle raged with fury, our men standing up to their work with the persevering courage of veterans; and then, once more, we went slowly to the rear, the movement commencing inevitably on the left, where the Sixth Corps was anew outflanked by that indefatigable Gordon. Fifteen hundred yards further back we again turned at bay. The men hastily gathered rails and threw up rude field-works under a long-range fire of the enemy's artillery. A regiment of cavalry commanded by a jolly, red-faced colonel, whose name I did not learn, deployed in line with drawn sabres, and turned back some hundreds of stragglers, who were immediately clapped into whatsoever regiment came handiest. The Nineteenth and Sixth Corps were united. We had succeeded at last in dragging our left flank out of the grasp of Gordon. We were in fair condition to fight a defensive battle. Whether the rebels perceived this, or whether they were simply wearied and disorganized with pursuing, I can not say; but their advance was now slow and cautious. There was no musketry; only a little long-range artillery. I supposed that we should make a final stand in this position. But we had been driven clean off the pike; and, as it was necessary to recover it before we could consider our communications secure, General Wright again ordered the whole army to retreat. No longer disturbed by the fire of the enemy the line filed into columns of march by regiments, and moved deliberately in the direction of Winchester, inclining diagonally toward the pike.

Allow me here a digression on fugitives. The non-combatant public must not be permitted to believe that defeated and retreating soldiers run at full speed for any considerable distance. When a regiment breaks it usually goes at first like one man, with a movement as simultaneous as if it were in obedience to an order, and for one or two hundred yards it keeps on a run, which of course shatters the organization in proportion to the speed of the fugitives and the nature of the country. But presently, one after another, even while the bullets are whizzing about them, the men drop into a walk. Once out of the immediate presence of the foe, they seem to be satisfied. They walk quietly toward the rear, not crazed with terror, but intelligently choosing the best cover, slipping through hollows and woods, stopping to rest in little knots behind buildings, and taking care of themselves with an admirable though provoking intelligence. But although they are so cool, you need not suppose that you will find it an easy task to rally them. Try it; they will stare at you and walk on; they seem to say by their looks, "We have already done our best, and done it uselessly; we have stood up with a better chance than you can show us, and been whipped; now let somebody else face the music." Draw your sword on them, and they will halt; but turn away, and they are again sidling rearward. The greatest trouble with them seems to be that they have got out of their places in the military machine. If one of them sees his own company he will generally rejoin it; he will even join another company of the same regiment, but not another regiment. An officer who loses his command appears similarly bewildered. He rarely attempts to rally any but his own men, and wanders about in search of them, letting the battle go. But if you are a superior officer, or even a staff officer, you can seize upon this lost being and put him in command of a squad of rallied men, and he will lead them gallantly back into the battle, his morale restored by the authority which he feels has been delegated to him, and the responsibility which has been thrust upon him.

This is about the kind of talk that I heard used in rallying fugitives: "Halt, men! Where the —— are you going to? You will be no safer at the rear than here. You can't retreat forever. This is the best cover you will find; and you must fight it out somewhere. Halt, and lie down and form a line. Don't be discouraged, boys. It's all right. I tell you, boys, it's all right. We were surprised this morning; it wasn't a fair fight. But we are wide awake now; we are all in shape now. We are ready to turn the joke on them."

"Bully for you!" replies one soldier. Another smiles incredulously, and says, "All right? It doesn't look much like it." But both fall into line, lie down behind the rough field-work which is being built, and recap their pieces.

Let us return to the retreating army. Its columns were three miles from the point where the fight had commenced, and the van of its multitudinous stragglers was already entering Winchester. I wish it to be distinctly understood that at this period of the day we had suffered a clear defeat; that we were in the condition under which most generals are satisfied to withdraw their troops from the scene of contest in decent order. We had completely lost one battle; we had lost camps, lines of earth-works, twenty-four guns, and twelve hundred prisoners; we had not been routed, but we had been undeniably and badly beaten. The battle of the morning and the battle of the afternoon were two different combats; in the first we were flanked and driven, in the second we flanked and pursued.

At this time, at the close of this unfortunate struggle of five hours, we were joined by Sheridan, who had passed the night in Winchester on his way back from Washington, and who must have heard of Early's attack about the time that its success became decisive. It was near ten o'clock when he came up the pike at a three-minute trot, swinging his cap and shouting to the stragglers, "Face the other way, boys. We are going back to our camps. We are going to lick them out of their boots."

The wounded by the roadside raised their hoarse voices to shout; the great army of fugitives turned about at sight of him, and followed him back to the front; they followed him back to the slaughter as hounds follow their master. The moment he reached the army he ordered it to face about, form line, and advance to the position which it had last quitted. Then for two hours he rode along the front, studying the ground and encouraging the men. "Boys, if I had been here this never should have happened," he said in his animated, earnest way. "I tell you it never should have happened. And now we are going back to our camps. We are going to get a twist on them. We are going to lick them out of their boots."

The Sixth Corps held the pike and its vicinity. On its right the Nineteenth Corps was formed in double line, under cover of a dense wood, the first division on the right, the second on the left. The rearmost line threw up a rude breast-work of stones, rails, and trees, covered by the advanced line standing to arms, and by a strong force of skirmishers stationed two hundred yards to the front but still within the forest. For two hours all was silence, preparation, reorganization, and suspense. Then came a message from Sheridan to Emory that the enemy in column were advancing against the Nineteenth Corps; and shortly afterward the column appeared among the lights and shadows of the autumnal woods, making for the centre of our second division. There was an awful rattle of musketry, which the forest re-echoed into a deep roar, and when the firing stopped and the smoke cleared away no enemy was visible. Emory immediately sent word to Sheridan that the attack had been repulsed.

"That's good, that's good!" Sheridan answered, gayly. "Thank God for that! Now then, tell General Emory if they attack him again to go after them, and to follow them up, and to sock it to them, and to give them the devil. We'll get the tightest twist on them yet that ever you saw. We'll have all those camps and cannon back again." All this with the nervous animation characteristic of the man, the eager and confident smile, and the energetic gesture of the right hand down into the palm of the left at every repetition of the idea of attack.

At half past three came more explicit orders. "The entire line will advance. The Nineteenth Corps will move in connection with the Sixth Corps. The right of the Nineteenth will swing toward the left so as to drive the enemy upon the pike."

One of our staff officers exclaimed, "By Jove, if we beat them now it will be magnificent!"

"And we are very likely to do it," said General Emory. "They will be so far from expecting us."

It must be understood that the enemy's left was now his strong point, being supported by successive wooded crests; while his right ran out to the pike across undulating open fields which presented no natural line of resistance. Sheridan's plan was to push them off the crests by a turning movement of our right, and then, when they were doubled up on the pike, sling his cavalry at them across the Middletown meadows. With a solemn tranquillity of demeanor our infantry rose from the position where it had been lying, and advanced through the forest into the open ground beyond. There was a silence of suspense; then came a screaming, cracking, humming rush of shell; then a prolonged roar of musketry, mingled with the long-drawn yell of our charge; then the artillery ceased, the musketry died into spattering bursts, and over all the yell rose triumphant. Every thing on the first line, the stone-walls, the advanced crest, the tangled wood, the half-finished breast-works had been carried. The first body of rebel troops to break and fly was Gordon's Division, the same which had so perseveringly flanked us in the morning, and which was now flanked by our own first division of the Nineteenth Corps.

After this there was a lull in the assault, though not in the battle. The rebel artillery reopened spitefully from a new position, and our musketry responded from the crest and wood which we had gained. Sheridan dashed along the front, reorganizing the line for a second charge, cheering the men with his confident smile and emphatic assurances of success, and giving his orders in person to brigade, division, and corps commanders. He took special pains with the direction of our First Division, wheeling it in such a manner as to face square toward the pike, and form nearly a right angle to the enemy's front. Now came a second charge upon a second line of stone-walls, crests, and thickets, executed with as much enthusiasm and rapidity as if the army had just come into action. Remember that our gallant fellows had eaten nothing since the previous evening; that they had lost their canteens, and were tormented with thirst; that they had been fighting and manœuvring, frequently at double-quick, for nearly twelve hours; and that they were sadly diminished in numbers by the slaughter and confusion of the morning. Remember, too, that this lost battle was retrieved without a reinforcement. Only veterans, and only veterans of the best quality, disciplined, intelligent, and brave, could put forth such a supreme effort at the close of a long, bloody, and disastrous conflict. As one of Sheridan's staff officers followed up our First Division, and watched the yelling, running, panting soldiers, not firing a shot, but simply dashing along with parched, open mouths, he said, "Those men are doing all that flesh and blood can."

"Your fellows on the right went in mighty pretty this afternoon," I heard Custer say that evening to Emory. "I had to sing out to my men, 'Are you going to let the infantry beat you?'"

Every body now knows by reputation this brilliant officer, and can understand that we have a right to be proud of his praise.

The battle was over. Cavalry on the flanks and infantry in the centre, we carried the second line with the same rush and with even greater ease than the first. Again Early's army was "whirling up the Valley," in more hopeless confusion this time than after Winchester or Strasburg, no exertions of the rebel officers being sufficient to establish another line of resistance, or to check, even momentarily, the flow and spread of the panic. Colonel Love of the One Hundred and Sixteenth New York dashed his horse into the broken ranks of the Second South Carolina and captured its battle-flag, escaping unhurt from the bullets of the color-guard. But the fighting soon swept far ahead of the tired infantry, which followed in perfect peace over the ground that during the morning it had stained with the blood of its retreat. Dead and wounded men, dead and wounded horses, dismounted guns, broken-down caissons, muskets with their stocks shattered and their barrels bent double by shot, splinters of shell, battered bullets, and blood over all, like a delirium of Lady Macbeth or the Chourineur, bore testimony to the desperate nature of the long, wide-spread conflict. The number of slaughtered horses was truly extraordinary, showing how largely the cavalry had been used, and how obstinately the artillery had been fought. I noticed that almost every dead soldier was covered by an over-coat or blanket, placed over him by some friend or perhaps brother. Of the wounded a few lay quiet and silent; here and there one uttered wild, quavering cries expressive of intense agony or despair; others, and these the majority, groaned from time to time gently and with a pitiful, patient courage. One man, whose light-blue trousers were clotted with that dull crimson so sickeningly common, and whose breath was short and voice hoarse, called feebly as we passed, "Hurrah for General Emory!"

"Are you badly hurt, my lad?" asked Emory, stopping his horse.

"My leg is broken by a rifle-ball, General. I suppose I shall lose it. But I still feel—as if I could say—Hurrah for General Emory. I fought under you—at Sabine Cross Roads—and Pleasant Hill."

The General dismounted to give the sufferer a glass of whisky, and left a guard to see that he was put into an ambulance.

It was nearly dark when our corps reached its camps. No new arrangement of the line was attempted; in the twilight of evening the regiments filed into the same positions that they had quitted in the twilight of dawn; and the tired soldiers lay down to rest among dead comrades and dead enemies. They had lost every thing but what they bore on their backs or in their hands; their shelter-tents, knapsacks, canteens, and haversacks had been plundered by the rebels; and they slept that night, as they had fought that day, without food.

But there was no rest for the enemy or for our cavalry. All the way from our camps to Strasburg, a distance of four miles, the pike was strewn with the debris of a beaten army; and the scene in Strasburg itself was such a flood of confused flight and chase, such a chaos of wreck and bedlam of panic, as no other defeat of the war can parallel. Guns, caissons, ammunition wagons, baggage wagons, and ambulances by the hundred, with dead or entangled and struggling horses, were jammed in the streets of the little town, impeding alike fugitives and pursuers. Our troopers dodged through the press as they best could, pistoling, sabring, and taking prisoners. A private of the Fifth New York Cavalry, riding up to a wagon, ordered the five rebels who were in it to surrender; and when they only lashed their horses into a wilder gallop he shot two with his revolver and brought in the three others. The usually gallant and elastic Southern infantry was so stupefied by fatigue and cowed by defeat that it seemed like a flock of animals, actually taking no notice of mounted men and officers from our army who wandered into the wide confusion of its retreat. Lieutenant Gray, Company D, First Rhode Island Artillery, galloped up to a retreating battery and ordered it to face about. "I was told to go to the rear as rapidly as possible," remonstrated the sergeant in command. "You don't seem to know who I am," answered Gray. "I am one of those d—d Yanks. Countermarch immediately!" The battery was countermarched, and Gray was leading it off alone, when a squadron of our cavalry came up and made the capture a certainty.

The victory was pushed, as Sheridan has pushed all his victories, to the utmost possible limit of success, the cavalry halting that night at Fisher's Hill, but starting again at dawn and continuing the chase to Woodstock, sixteen miles from Middletown.

It was a gay evening at our head-quarters, although we were worn-out with fatigue, and as chilled, starved, and shelterless as the soldiers, our tents, baggage, rations, and cooks having all gone to Winchester. Notwithstanding these discomforts, notwithstanding the thought of slain and wounded comrades, it was delightful to talk the whole day over, even of our defeat of the morning, because we could say, "All's well that ends well." It was laughable to think of the fugitives who had fled beyond the hearing of our victory, and who were now on their way to Martinsburg, spreading the news that Sheridan's army had been totally defeated, and that they (of course) were the only survivors. Then every half hour or so somebody galloped in from the advance with such a tale of continuing success that we could hardly grant our credence to it before a fresh messenger arrived, not so much to confirm the story as to exaggerate it.

It was "Hurrah! twenty cannon taken at Strasburg. That makes twenty-six so far."

"Glorious!—Don't believe it.—Isn't it splendid?—Impossible!—All our own back again," answered the contradictory chorus.

Then came another plunge of hoofs reining up with another "Hurrah! forty-six guns! More wagons and ambulances than you can count!"

In truth the amount of material captured in this victory was extraordinary. Two days after the battle I saw near Sheridan's head-quarters a row of forty-nine pieces of artillery, of which twenty-four had been lost by us and retaken, while the others were Early's own. In addition the rebels lost fifty wagons, sixty-five ambulances (some of them marked "Stonewall Brigade"), sixteen hundred small-arms, several battle-flags, fifteen hundred prisoners, and probably two thousand killed and wounded. Our own losses were: Crook's command, one hundred killed and wounded, and seven hundred prisoners; the Nineteenth Corps, sixteen hundred killed and wounded, and one hundred prisoners; the Sixth Corps, thirteen hundred killed and wounded; total, three thousand eight hundred.

Of all retrieved battles, in all history that I can remember, this one, it seems to me, is the most remarkable. It is more wonderful than Shiloh or Marengo in this respect, that the abandoned arena was regained by the very men who had lost it, without other aid than their own unwearied courage guided by a master spirit. There was here no Buell with twenty thousand fresh soldiers; no Desaix with six thousand veteran grenadiers. The only reinforcement which the Army of the Shenandoah received or needed to recover its lost field of battle, camps, intrenchments, and cannon was one man—Sheridan.

“WANTED—AN EDUCATION.”

WHEN I was a child I wrote (as a child) a “composition.” Its subject was “Education,” as stated in large letters at the head of the sheet, and it went on in the following original manner:

“Education is a very good thing. We ought all to try to get an education. We ought to study all we can and get our lessons perfectly, that we may get an education, and that our teacher may be pleased with us. Nobody is much respected who has not an education. That is what our parents send us to school for, to learn our books, and not to spend our time in talk and play, as idle children do,” etc., etc.

I wrote it very carefully, and copied it neatly. The teacher said, “Very well, indeed!” So did my parents, and exhorted me to live up to my precepts. I did my best at it, and nearly killed myself. Inasmuch as it did not absolutely finish my career, it modified my views essentially.

Did it ever occur to any body what was expected of an unfortunate woman-child? I dare say not, in detail.

At about eighteen she is expected to leave school an educated, “finished” young lady, ready for society and its criticisms; ready for the home circle and its duties. She is expected by some to flutter forth an accomplished belle—for did she not graduate from Madame Fandango’s celebrated seminary last summer?

“She must be an excellent scholar,” says papa, looking over Madame Fandango’s prospectus: “Mathematics, history, literature, music, French, German, Italian, drawing, painting, embroidery. What a number of things! She will be a charming companion for us at home!” and Paterfamilias folds away Madame Fandango’s crow-quilled receipt—“for Tuition of Angelina”—with a complacent smile.

“She ought to sew nicely by this time!” remarks Aunt Faithful; “when I was her age I had worked a splendid sampler.”

“When I was her age,” sighs Grandma, “I was the best cook and housekeeper in the county.”

“And when I was her age,” caps on the Mother, with a look of triumph at Aunt Faithful which age could not wither nor custom stale, “I was engaged to be married!”

It would take a great deal to satisfy such critics, and one could hardly expect it. But she did her best. Angelina worked like Hercules over her appointed tasks. In an evil hour she was discovered by her teacher to be a bright and ambitious scholar, and whip and spur have been applied (metaphorically) ever since. Since she was eight or nine years old she has trudged daily back and forth, to and from school, with a load of books, port-folio, and slates, big enough to discourage an aspirant for college honors. She had only time for an hour or two of play in the course of the entire day; and this, by teachers and parents, was deemed amply sufficient, and more time could not be spared if she was to keep up with her classes.

“Our school has but one session,” says mamma, “and Angelina comes home for the day at two o’clock.”

“True; but from half past eight till two is a long stretch of study for a growing girl with no dinner.”

“She can carry a lunch if she likes, and generally does.”

“Yes, but it does not amount to much after all. Firstly, it generally consists of a dough-nut, a pickle, a piece of mince-pie, and a bit of pound-cake—a good recipe for sick headache of itself. Then the recess is but half an hour, and if she will keep up with her class, she must take that time to look over the lesson which comes directly after the brief intermission. Besides, you and I well remember that school lunches, except of candy and lemons, are not ‘genteel.’”

After school, nearly the entire session having been passed in recitations, she goes home loaded with books; makes a savage raid on the pantry in search of the remains of the family dinner or lunch, eating far too much, if indeed her head does not ache so badly that she can not eat at all. Then back to study for next day’s lesson. The binomial theorem must be solved, a composition or French exercise be written, and the history and geometry looked over for to-morrow. Her lunch has destroyed her relish for the evening meal. She has had no exercise to awaken an appetite, and it is little more than a matter of form, from which she hurries back to her studies for the evening. There is no social family intercourse. Papa dozes over his paper; mamma follows suit over her knitting; the brothers study in like manner, or, if grown up, stroll down town to see what is going on—and generally find out. At nine or ten she goes to bed. Early in the morning comes up the well of the staircase the trilling of scales. She is at her lessons again, practicing her two hours before breakfast!

“How in the world else is she to get an education?”

Nor can it be otherwise if the girl is to keep up to her daily drill. It is a forced march up the Hill of Science from September till June, when the blessed country out of doors, in some shape, may claim the weary head and exhausted frame.

Angelina graduates. She has been a bright scholar, and perhaps takes a medal; maybe more than one. But the muslin of her dress on that memorable evening is not whiter than her cheeks; except, probably, a spot of hectic excitement. She has “finished” now, and Brother Fred says, “Sis knows it all.”

Does she?

She could not make a tea-biscuit to save her life. Of bread she is as ignorant as of the philosopher’s stone. She cannot mend a stocking, nor make a garment fit to be seen; and as for nursing the sick, she would be as likely to insist upon her patient making an inward application of a poultice as an outward. But perhaps, poor girl! she has learned nursing by experience of sickness and suffering in her own person. Otherwise, woe to her patients!

"But, at least, her intellectual training has been such that she will readily acquire new accomplishments and adapt herself to new contingencies."

That is nearly the only good thing in the whole system; for it is undoubtedly true that knowing one thing will help one to learn others, and that the habit of systematic application is invaluable as a life-discipline. But this severe course of scholastic training has been as much as her mind could bear, and far too much for the physical constitution of a growing girl. She has had no girlhood if she is faithful to the exactions of her teachers. Setting aside for once (for the subject has already been ably discussed) the bad ventilation of many school-rooms, their foul air, hot stoves, and cold draughts, and uncomfortable, figure-destroying desks and seats, half an hour's play (provided she plays, which, in nine cases out of ten, she does not do) is not nearly enough for one's daily exercise to give one's muscles fair play. Young girls of that age (twelve to sixteen) often feel a disinclination to exercise. They are too old for childish romps, and no provision is made for others more suited to their early maturity. Every school ought to possess a "romping gymnasium," and a teacher who would give the girls just enough instruction in the use of the apparatus that they might not injure themselves or each other, and then let them alone to be as wild tomboys as they liked. It will be their best teacher, depend upon it. Let them even scream, if they like. It will be bad for nervous neighbors, but good for the girls. Nature is not so far extinct that they will not soon enter into the genuine spirit of the thing, in a way that will astonish prim people.

There are some excellent private schools in which a day is set apart for reading fine selections of poetry, history, travels, or fiction, and recitations of the best poetry; and at such times all not occupied with the exercises are encouraged and taught to practice needle-work or knitting. This is a good arrangement, and has the best results in its way. But for some reason it is not known in public schools, which is a pity, where most of the system is so good. Pupils of the public schools take as prominent a position in life as others, and ought to be as well fitted for their places; and literary taste is a necessity, and not a luxury, in this land of books, to say nothing of the incidental knowledge of needle-work, and the habit of gleaning up the moments which might otherwise be wasted.

It would be a beneficial thing, too, if teachers would occasionally go over, with deliberation, the daily tasks of their pupils. The mechanical labor of the written exercises, both mathematical and lingual, is considerable, as they would discover; and the length of time consumed in even a perfect recitation ought to afford some idea of the time required for a young and inexperienced mind to acquire it.

A page or two of mathematical problems, a page or two of French or German exercises, from six to twenty pages of history, dates, events, personages, and a written abstract of the whole, are not half, even, of an ordinary day's work. There are, besides, chemistry, philosophy, rhetoric, and half a dozen more things.

Just try it, dear teacher, and tell me how much time it leaves for wholesome play, what time to bring papa's slippers, to help little brother's lesson, to tell little sister a story, because she has been so lonesome all day, or to take the slightest interest in the business of her parents' household, and help play the agreeable to big Brother Tom, who is inclined to be wild, but stays at home tolerably contented if "Sis will only keep him company. Somehow it's so dull for a fellow after tea."

So far from expecting girls to do more than they do, it is a perpetual wonder to me that they do so much.

If any of this elaborate training went to serve a practical purpose regrets would be idle. The only real use to which this hard-earned treasure of an education can be put, that of instructing her own little children, if haply her married life is blest with them, is superseded by the multitude of family and household cares, poor health, consequent upon an overtaxed constitution, and accomplishments are forgotten and cast aside by the press of unpostponable duties. She is broken down with her precious load, for she attempted so much that nothing was thoroughly learned, and nothing was well done. Her French is not spoken in France; her German and Italian are equally unsatisfactory; her trills and quavers pass away like a dream; and her music is forgotten, except, perchance, a very simple set of quadrilles, which she sometimes plays for birthdays and Christmases; and of school-days she has little left but bad headaches and a disinclination to study for the remainder of her natural life.

Schools are good, but so much school and so little home is very bad. It would be well if parents would insist that no longer lessons should be given out than could be both learned and recited in school-hours, even if the plan necessitated longer school sessions. This might even be a benefit, for then the recess might be a little longer; and the girls, not feeling so hurried, would enjoy the rest and the play-time far better than now. And if the health of your daughters and the happiness of your home circle be of any consequence, it is time something were done to modify and moderate the interminable lessons and study-hours at home which are now exacted by teachers.

Many good purposes would be attained by this. Sufficient time for exercise would be secured—for a ride, perhaps, if that height of equestrian felicity be attainable; or a walk, for either business or pleasure; for mother's errands, or a call on a sick friend; for a deed of charity, or a careless girl-stroll in search of nothing but the pure pleasure of simply being out of doors.

The climate of America is stimulating, the air is keen and vivifying. It is natural to be lithe, active, nervous, ambitious, and intellectual, intense in feeling, and impulsive in action. We require different diet and habits of life from Europeans. The weather is variable, and dress must conform to it. The present style for young ladies leaves little to be desired in this, for the range of modes is so great that one may adapt dress to taste in a way never before permitted by the fickle goddess. Thick shoes and flannels, warm cloaks, furs, and water-proof mantles are "stylish." And this is good; but it is of no avail to own as many garments as Queen Elizabeth if one must never go out to wear them; "if one must stay at home and study, rain or shine, blow high or low, for fear of black marks," and blame in class for imperfect, because endless lessons.

Or, if need be, that the last touches of the tea-table (or even the first), or bit of nice cookery, to please father and brothers when they come home in the evening, it will be all the better for the emancipated school-girl. There'll be time then for a pleasant word to the little one, who is so glad to see sister after "all day at school;" time for the evening hymn, or the tender old ballad, so dear to the elders of the family; for the romp, the game, the family dance, or to give a rest to mother's tired fingers sometimes at the missing buttons, or the big basket of stockings that need "only a stitch."

Then we should not see so many girls with ceaseless headaches, and unblushing ignorance of every home-like accomplishment. Then, perhaps, when the neighbor or old friend, or the guest whose experience of life and travel has given him a greater breadth of view, and whose talents and attainments make his society almost a liberal education in itself, shall fill a chair at the fireside, the young lady may be spared from her books to receive that finer culture which attrition with minds of a better scope and rarer training can alone produce, which is a thing impossible when the dry routine of school-books and school rules are solely relied upon as the only mechanism of education. This is a very different thing from an early introduction into society, a thing almost always very undesirable; for it is true that no being is so ignorant as a newly-fledged graduate of either a fashionable seminary or a first-class public school of a high grade. She knows a little music, a little singing, a little—a very little—drawing and painting, and some embroidery (a good deal of the pictorial accomplishment being due to the assistance of the teacher), a good deal of mathematics, which she forgets as speedily as possible; and, as an old gentleman friend of mine remarks, "a smattering of English," besides attempts at all the other modern languages; for she must know a little of every thing, and neither teacher nor parents are satisfied unless this intellectual salsmagundi is inevitably set before them when Miss graduates.

Setting rare genius out of the question, excellence is rarely attained in many things. Why not adhere to one accomplishment—the one for which taste is shown—and cultivate that to a pitch of real excellence? The result would be more satisfactory; and in event of reverses, a livelihood is so much easier obtained by one well learned, than by a sprinkling of so many.

Then Society claims its victim, and Iphigenia is ready for the altar. She is weary of school and worn-out by routine, and eagerly seizes the opportunity now offered for a general good time. She has been cheated out of her girlhood, and now the "young lady" takes her revenge. She is in a whirl of pleasant engagements all day, and nearly all night, and it certainly looks as if the one thing desirable were to forget all about the "odious school and the dreadful studies!"

Who can blame the girl if she does feel thus? She must be a girl sometime, and it is partly your fault, father and mother of the beautiful daughter. So look to it that girlishness and frolic and genuine old-fashioned fun have a place in the programme of your child's life; for if she does not, she may sometime be extremely ridiculous, if nothing worse happens.

There is no objection to a high order of study for girls; the more of the right sort the better; and the study of any branch of education is a culture and a discipline to the mind, and in that a benefit. But as a woman's, especially an American woman's, life is always more or less practical and homely in its detail, whether one chance to be the Judge's lady or only Maud Muller, it is not well to lose sight of the necessary preliminary training for these possibilities. Though, as a people, we possess a wonderful faculty of many-sidedness, it is always difficult, even for us, to do well what one is unaccustomed to do; and though I would never seek to narrow the sphere of woman's activity and possible civilization, I would modestly suggest that too much is expected of young people, and too little of those that are older. There may be no discernible boundary to one's mental acquirements in the way of careful study and reflection, but there is an absolute limit to the stretch of one's memory; and we must take care that the blanket which we are tucking so luxuriously about our shoulders does not leave our feet bare to the January night.

The teachers persist in this routine because the parents have not moral courage to insist upon a different order of things; and parents let it go on, partly from a certain timidity at encountering the objections of the learned preceptors to any innovations, partly from the pressure of home and business cares; taking it for granted that the teachers know best, after all. It redounds to pocket and position that Miss So-and-so's pupils are so thoroughly taught. The pallid faces, curved spines, and aching heads tell a story of different import at home; and parents may well tremble, even if they do admire the intellectual result. And, though the carefully educated young lady may, when she marries, forget the most of what was so laboriously learned, and she retain little of her school-acquisition but her neuralgia, dyspepsia, and weak back, yet she feels just as much anxiety that her daughters shall go through this process as did her own parents. And so Da capo.

There is coming a day to this country which calls for a different sort of training from all this. An impatience of control, and a contempt for the rules by which commonwealths, either large or small, are governed, are among the symptoms. There is scarcely a lady in the land who will not tell you that it is as difficult again to rule well her household as it was years ago. "How are you going to do without me?" said an "insulted" cook the other day. "You can't cook yourself, nor can you get any body else, for I shall tell all the girls to stay away from you, for you ain't a nice person to live with."

Then, if you are able to walk quietly into the kitchen, as my friend did, and successfully prepare a nice dinner, without fear or favor, while she is getting ready to fulfill her threat of "laving," see if Bridget does not cool down, and wash up the china afterward, and swallow down her wrath, and be a better servant ever after. And if she does carry out her purpose you will even enjoy the interregnum, and feel fully qualified to train any decent girl to take her place.

"But some are invalids, and can not do this; chronic invalids, perhaps."

God help the invalid who falls alive into the hands of hireling servants! But if so many girls were not so broken in health by the severities of a fashionable education and the follies of a fashionable life, there would not be nearly the number of invalids over which to lament.

If the kitchen cabinets are sure that the head of the house is equal to all the details of the concern—from dusting the statuette in the drawing-room and the books and papers of the library, down to sponging and kneading the bread, making coffee, and roasting the joint, getting-up "his" linen, or "baby's" frocks—they will be far less exacting, for they know then that they only hold their place by the tenure of good and faithful conduct, and that they are luxuries, not necessities.

How many bitter tears have been shed over the long years so utterly wasted in learning what seems in one's extremity of so little avail, when the very thing most needed is of so little account! Angelina sings gloriously the Borgia drinking-song; but Edwin will wait long for his breakfast if he waits for Angelina's coffee.

"She will learn all this in time. No use slaving a girl in the kitchen before she is married, just to teach her."

Trials and troubles come fast enough, and we ought to spare the dear young people all we can. And, after all, these things are not so difficult. One wonders sometimes that, when they are so easily learned, they are not oftener better known. But it is the fate of simple acquisitions. "Are not the rivers of Damascus better than the waters of Jordan?" Suppose, for example, the mother says to the daughters, "Girls, to-morrow is mince-pie day, let us all help prepare the meat together. It is so lonesome in the kitchen alone!" The mother has seen that the kitchen is warm, clean, and lighted; the apple-parers come out, the nice cold meat is sliced and chopped, the apples selected and prepared, the sweets and spices delicately adjusted to the taste of the family; and the process takes the rank of a fine art under the critical supervision of the lady-workers. Having assisted in this way a few times, actually participating in the process, the proportions become familiar, and mince-pie becomes a formula, not a lottery. (N.B. I detest mince-pie, but have mentioned it to illustrate my subject, the process being so eminently gregarious.)

By thus making common cause with the good mother or housekeeper, three results are attained: Firstly, "a good time," for one can gossip as merrily over the apple-pan as over crochet-work; the assistance is a real rest to the "working bee;" and the young ladies acquire much useful information. Furthermore, any thing which tends to cement a comfortable confidence between mother and daughter is good. It is better to talk honest, good, loving talk than to have one read aloud, as some recommend. Our people are reading too much and talking too little. Were the case reversed we should all come to a better knowledge of each other, and conversation might become a real power in the land. So, girls, talk with mother all you can!

"Any body can learn any thing," is the king of American maxims (I mean the President). The thing is to choose what is best and most expedient to learn.

Clearly that for which we shall have most need and shall use oftenest. To care for the house and the household, and especially the home; to "welcome the coming, speed the parting guest;" to enliven the winter evenings; to comfort the sorrowing, and nurse the sick; to superintend the "daily bread;" to wash, dress, train, and pet the little ones God has given you; to feed your own soul with life everlasting; and to sympathize in all pursuits and tastes of your family with ready love and patience.

To do all of this requires health and education in that direction. How much of either does any ordinary course of scholarship insure? The old custom of a family governess, though liable to great abuse (of the governess principally), was preferable to this, by bringing every thing under the parents' eyes. But it is not American in its spirit. Masses must collide with masses in the politico-social system; and so it occurs that the idea of gregarious education is so popular. There is no real objection to schools. Whatever tends to foster a genial and kindly feeling among all grades of the people of this great republic is a public benefit.

The doctrine of fair play and equal rights has no better exponent than an honest, intelligent school-boy or girl; and to their credit be it spoken, that there are no better patriots than the pupils of the public schools. An active, working kind of patriots too, if they are young. And it is to insure to all young people the entire benefit of this generally excellent system that we throw out these hints, and utter our moan over the aching heads and overtaxed minds of the half-risen generation. It is that clear heads, not aching ones, may be the rule, not the exception; that students may not be so overtaxed that their acquisitions of learning become a burden and no help, and the brightest and best may not fall exhausted by the way-side; and most of all, that the central point of life for which men toil and fight, and for which women pray—which children love, and the aged revere as they look with misty eyes down the vista of by-gone years—may be indeed the Home for which we have striven through tears and blood, worthy to be the watchword of a nation.

"Marrying for a home," is often used as a term of reproach. It should not be so. It is a legitimate reason and excuse for marriage. But it should be a home in the best sense which presents itself as such a goal of desire. It should not be a hospital merely, nor a lodging-house, nor a study, nor an upholsterer's show-room, nor a ball-room, nor an office, nor a dress-maker's shop, nor a nursery, nor any other domestic "means of grace." Though it may be all these in turn, they are not the end and aim of a home. And to this end let us see to it that too ambitious children and too exacting teachers do not rob us of our jewels; that they do not claim all the strength and interest of our children, but especially our daughters, from our homes and firesides to swell the triumph of some "institute" or other—those firesides which too many regard as a means and not the end of their education; and not stopping at the harm done, their own parents insure that their own possible homes of the future be prematurely darkened by sickness, sorrow, and early death, or, what is even sadder, endless years of chronic suffering. Visit the schools in person, look over the lessons of your children, and you will soon discover sufficient cause for the languid step and pale face and habitual air of care and anxiety, and you will take courage to claim for yourselves and your own loving nurture some of those unreasonable hours of study now more than uselessly spent.

Then your care and teaching will have power to make a home with them now, and for them by-and-by, whose atmosphere is peace, industry, rest, and hearty happiness; where each one bears his share of the burden of life cheerfully and patiently; where comfort is not sacrificed to show; where cruel debts do not grin between the damask curtains and leer over the costly arm-chairs; where soft colors and choice books make up the most of the outer beauty, and neatness and care insure that the hidden corners are a part of the harmonious whole; where harsh words do not intrude; where common interest, common pursuits, and common amusements unite parents and children; and where it is no sin to laugh loudly nor shame to pray earnestly.

ENGLISH FOR THE PORTUGUESE.

MESSRS. J. P. AILLAUD AND CO., of Paris, "Booksellers to their Majesties the Emperor of Brazil and the King of Portugal," have put forth "The New Guide of the Conversation in Portuguese and English," by those two eminent linguists José da Fonseca and Pedro Carolino, the second edition of which now lies before us. The Preface, which is written in English, sets forth the nature and scope of the book. The Authors say:

"A choice of familiar dialogues, clean of gallicisms, and despoiled phrases, it was missing yet to studious portuguese and brazilian Youth; and also to persons of other nations, that wish to know the portuguese language. We sought all we may do, to correct that want, composing and divising the present little work in two parts. The first includes a greatest vocabulary proper names by alphabetical order; and the second forty three Dialogues adapted to the usual precisions of the life. For that reason we did put, with a scrupulous exactness, a great variety own expressions to english and portuguese idioms; without to attach us selves (as make some others) almost at a literal translation; translation what only will be for to accustom the portuguese pupils, or-foreign, to speak very bad any of the mentioned idioms.

"We were increasing this second edition with a phraseology, in the first part, and some familiar letters, anecdotes, idiotisms, proverbs, and to second a coin's index.

"The Works which we were conferring for this labour, fond use us for nothing; but those what were publishing to Portugal, or out, they were almost all composed for some foreign, or for some national little acquainted in the spirit of both languages. It was resulting from that carelessness to rest these Works fill of imperfections, and anomalies of style; in spite of the infinite typographical faults which some times, invert the sense of the periods. It increase not to contain any of those Works the figured pronunciation of the english words, nor the prosodical accent in the portuguese: indispensable object whom wish to speak the english and portuguese languages correctly.

"We expect then, who the little book (for the care what we wrote him, and for her typographical correction) that may be worth the acceptance of the studious persons, and especialy of the Youth, at which we dedicate him particularly."

The work opens with a vocabulary, in which an attempt is made to give the Portuguese student an idea of the pronunciation of the English words. Bearing in mind that the Portuguese x represents our sh, our readers are requested to guess the very common English words indicated by the following figured Pronunciation: baú-elz, es-teu-meuk, legue, djá, txine, irs, ai-bal, biúti, es-pi-txe, uotx-in-gue, pé'-xenn'ce, keux'-eune, u-umen-ne-hu-ai-eune lin-ine, bé'-thin-gue-teub, xi'-se, keur-ten'-ze, u-ud-kok, skritxe-aul. Then follows a series of Dialogues in Portuguese, with translations into English, of which we quote "Dialogue 15: For to Speak French:"

Cómo vái Vm. côm ô sêu francêz? Está já muito adiantado?	How is the french? Are you too learned now?
Bêm pouco; êu não sêi quá-si náda.	No too much, i know almost nothing.
Côm tudo, dizem qué Vm. ô fália muito bêm.	They tell however that you speak very well.
Ôs qué tál dizem estão múi enganados.	These which tell it they mistake one's.
Certifico-lhê qué assim m'ô dissêrão.	I assure you who was told me.
Púde articular algúmas pá-lavras qué aprendí dè côr.	I could to tell some word's that i know by heart.
É quánto bástá pára começár á fallár.	It is what it must for to commence to speak.
Não bástá qué êu comêce, é necessário qué acábe.	It is not the whole to begin, it must finish.
Recêio commettêr êrros.	I apprehend, to make some faults.
Fálle sêmpre bêm ôu má.	Speak always, right or bad.

Não tenha medo; a lingua franceza não é difficil. Not apprehend you, the french language is not difficult.

Conheço isso; e quê é muito engraçada. Pôr feliz me daria se a soubesse! I know it, and she have great deal of agreeableness. Who i would be. If i was know it!

A applicação é o único meio d'apprendê-la. It must to study for to learn it.

Quanto tempo há quê a está-da? How long there is it what you learn it?

Inda não há um mês. It is not yet a month.

Cômo se chama seu mestre? How is called your master?

Chama-se N***. It is called N***.

Há muito tempo quê o conheço. Elle deu lições a alguns amigos meus. Não diz elle a Vm. ser urgente fallar francez? I know him it is long; he has taught a many of my friends. Don't he tell you that it must to speak french?

Sim, senhor, é muitas vezes. Yes, sir, he tell me it often.

Pois porque o não falla Vm. Then why you not speak french?

Côm quem quer Vm. quê eu o falle? With which will you that i speak?

Côm os quê o fallarem côm Vm.? With them who shall speak you.

Eu bém quizera fallar-o, mas não me atrevo. I would to speak too, bud i don't dare.

Deve ser ousado, e não ter vergonha. It must not fear; it must to be hardy.

Afterwards follows a collection of Letters and Anecdotes. These are usually translated from French classic authors into Portuguese, with a translation into English "clean of gallicisms," as the authors assure the readers, "without to attach us selves (as make some others), almost at a literal translation."

Boileau writes to Racine; his letter, translated into Portuguese, and thence into the English of the "New Guide of the Conversation," reads thus:

I can't, my dear sir, to express you my surprise; and though i might had the greatest hopes of the world, i was not leave yet to challenge my self of the fortune of Master the Dean. Are you who have all do, since it is to you than we owe the happy protection of Mistress of Maintenon. All my embarrasement it is to know as i will discharge my so much obligations what i ought you. Adieu, my dear sir, believe me don't there is any body which love you more sincerely, neither bi more reasons as me.

Rousseau writes to M. Boulet:

With a single friend as you, sir, should be one's self a lways quiet, if the acknowledgment was exclude the confusion. The mine grow to the sight of yours kindnesses. It is true that having now, by to serv me, three or four persons that it must to main tain and to pay them, i went some a helps; but i went not that of the fourth part what you send me. I am too much better, but i saw not to keep as a fillet so thin what the attachement at the idle trashes from that world. There it a moment, sir, where all fancy disappear, and to the appiness what one owe to content one's self to work.

Flechier writes "at M<sup>m</sup> of the Roure" the following exquisite congratulatory note:

More i was impatient, madam, at do you my compliment on your wedding; more pleasure i have to do you to day. The heaven was seems, since several years, to go for or to prepare you a husband who might be worthy you. I was give you at him: the happyness it is like of one and another pars. Think which benedictions shall be followed the union of two hearts well matched!

The following anecdotes, selected from the best authors, are not altogether unfamiliar to readers of English, though they look a little odd in their present shape:

Siward, duke of Northumberland, being very ill, though, he was unworthy of their courage to expect the death in a bed; he will die the arms on the hands. As he fell to approach her last hour he was commanded to hers servants to arm of all parts, and they were put him upon a arm-chair, keeping the bare-sword. He was challenged the death as a blusterer.

Cuttler, a very rich man too many avaricious, commonly he was travel at a horse, and single for to avoid all expences. In the evening at to arrive at the inn did feign to be indispense. to the end that one bring him the supper. He did ordered to the stable knave to bring in their room some straw. for to put in their boots he made to warm her bed and was go to sleep. When the servant was draw again, he come up again, and with the straw of their boots, and the candle what was leave him he made a small fire where he was roast a herring what he did keep of her pochet. He was always the precaution one to provide him self of a small of bread and one bring up a water bottle, and thus with a little money.

A little master frizzled, perfumed and covered of gold, had leaded to the church, for to marry, a coquethish to the dye glistening the parson, having considered a minute that disfigured couple, told him: "Now before to pronounce the conjungo, let avow me for fear of quiproquo, which from both is the bride?"

A traveller, which a storm had bennumb of cold, he come in a field's inn, and find it so fill of companies that he cannot to approach of the chimney. "What carry to the my horse a oyster's basket," tell him to the host. "To your horse cry out this. Do you think that he wake eating them?—Make what i command you," reply the gentleman. At the words, all the assistants run to the stable, and our traveller he get warm him self. Gentleman, tell the host coming again, i shall have lay it upon my head the horse will not it.—So, take again the traveller, which was very warmed one's, then it must that i eat them."

Two friends who from long they not were seen meet one's selves for hazard. "How do is thou? told one of the two.—No very well, told the other, and i am married from that i saw thee." Good news!—Not quit, because i had married with a bad woman.—So much worse!—"Not so much great deal worse; because her dower was from two thousand lewis."—Well, that comfort.—"Not absolutely; why i had emploted this sum for to buy some muttons, which are all deads of the rot."—That is indeed very sorry!—"Not so sorry, because the selling of hers hide have bring me above the price of the muttons."—So you are then indemnified?—"Not quit, because my house where i was deposed my money, finish to be consumed by the flames."—Oh! here is a great misfortune!—"Not so great nor i either, because my wife and my house are burned together."

Cesar, seing one day to Roma, some strangers very riches, which bore between hir arms little dogs and little monkeles and who was carressign them too tenderly, was asking, with so many great deal reason; whether the women of her country don't had some children?

Then follows a collection of "Idiotisms and Proverbs," in Portuguese, with their corresponding equivalents as expressed in English. We select a few common ones. If the subjects of Don Pedro do not learn to speak very curious English, it will not be the fault of Senhores da Fonseca and Carolino.

Dar de narizes a alguem.	To meet any-one nose at nose.
Tantas cabeças, tantas sentenças.	So many heads so much opinions.
As paredes teem ouvidos.	The walls have hearsay.
Não merece o pão que come.	He is not valuable to breat that he eat.
Lança poeira nos olhos.	He throw the dust to eyes.
Isso faz agua na boca.	That make to come water in the mouth.
Do dito ao feito vai muita differença.	A thing is tell, and another thing is make.
Quem se pica alhos come.	That which feel one's snotty blow blow one's nose.
A cavallo dado não se lhe olha para o dente.	A horse baared don't look him the tooth.
Dar de olho a alguem.	To do a wink to some body.
Não é tão feio como o pintão.	He is not so devil as he is black.
Vogue a galé, venha o que vier.	Come weal, arrive what he may be.
Não há melhor mostarda que a fome.	There is not better sauce who the appetite.
Não tem eira, nem ramo de figueira.	He is beggar as a church rat.
Voltar á vaca fria.	To come back at their muttons.
Nem tudo o que luz é ouro.	All what shine is not gold.

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

IN FOUR BOOKS.—BOOK THE SECOND. BIRDS OF A FEATHER.

CHAPTER XI.

SOME AFFAIRS OF THE HEART.

LITTLE Miss Peecher, from her little official dwelling-house, with its little windows like the eyes in needles, and its little doors like the covers of school-books, was very observant indeed of the object of her quiet affections. Love, though said to be afflicted with blindness, is a vigilant watchman, and Miss Peecher kept him on double duty over Mr. Bradley Headstone. It was not that she was naturally given to playing the spy—it was not that she was at all secret, plotting, or mean—it was simply that she loved the irresponsible Bradley with all the primitive and homely stock of love that had never been examined or certificated out of her. If her faithful slate had had the latent qualities of sympathetic paper, and its pencil those of invisible ink, many a little treatise calculated to astonish the pupils would have come bursting through the dry sums in school-time under the warming influence of Miss Peecher's bosom. For, oftentimes when school was not, and her calm leisure and calm little house were her own, Miss Peecher would commit to the confidential slate an imaginary description of how, upon a balmy evening at dusk, two figures might have been observed in the market-garden ground round the corner, of whom one, being a manly form, bent over the other, being a womanly form of short stature and some compactness, and breathed in a low voice the words, "Emma Peecher, wilt thou be my own?" after which the womanly form's head reposed upon the manly form's shoulder, and the nightingales tuned up. Though all unseen, and unsuspected by the pupils, Bradley Headstone even pervaded the school exercises. Was Geography in question? He would come triumphantly flying out of Vesuvius and Ætna ahead of the lava, and would boil unharmed in the hot springs of Iceland, and would float majestically down the Ganges and the Nile. Did History chronicle a king of men? Behold him in pepper-and-salt pantaloons, with his watch-guard round his neck. Were copies to be written? In capital B's and H's most of the girls under Miss Peecher's tuition were half a year ahead of every other letter in the alphabet. And Mental Arithmetic, administered by Miss Peecher, often devoted itself to providing Bradley Headstone with a wardrobe of fabulous extent: fourscore and four neck-ties at two and ninepence-halfpenny, two gross of silver watches at four pounds fifteen and sixpence, seventy-four black hats at eighteen shillings; and many similar superfluities.

The vigilant watchman, using his daily opportunities of turning his eyes in Bradley's direction, soon apprised Miss Peecher that Bradley was more preoccupied than had been his wont, and more given to strolling about with a downcast and reserved face, turning something difficult in his mind that was not in the scholastic syllabus. Putting this and that together—combining under the head "this," present appearances and the intimacy with Charley Hexam, and ranging under the head "that" the visit to his sister, the watchman reported to Miss Peecher his strong suspicions that the sister was at the bottom of it.

"I wonder," said Miss Peecher, as she sat making up her weekly report on a half-holiday afternoon, "what they call Hexam's sister?"

Mary Anne, at her needle-work, attendant and attentive, held her arm up.

"Well, Mary Anne?"

"She is named Lizzie, ma'am."

"She can hardly be named Lizzie, I think, Mary Anne," returned Miss Peecher, in a tuncfully instructive voice. "Is Lizzie a Christian name, Mary Anne?"

Mary Anne laid down her work, rose, hooked herself behind, as being under catechisation, and replied: "No, it is a corruption, Miss Peecher."

"Who gave her that name?" Miss Peecher was going on, from the mere force of habit, when she checked herself, on Mary Anne's evincing theological impatience to strike in with her god-fathers and her godmothers, and said: "I mean of what name is it a corruption?"

"Elizabeth, or Eliza, Miss Peecher."

"Right, Mary Anne. Whether there were any Lizzies in the early Christian Church must be considered very doubtful, very doubtful." Miss Peecher was exceedingly sage here. "Speaking correctly, we say, then, that Hexam's sister is called Lizzie; not that she is named so. Do we not, Mary Anne?"

"We do, Miss Peecher."

"And where," pursued Miss Peecher, complacent in her little transparent fiction of conducting the examination in a semi-official manner for Mary Anne's benefit, not her own, "where does this young woman, who is called but not named Lizzie, live? Think, now, before answering."

"In Church Street, Smith Square, by Mill Bank, ma'am."

"In Church Street, Smith Square, by Mill Bank," repeated Miss Peecher, as if possessed beforehand of the book in which it was written.

"Exactly so. And what occupation does this young woman pursue, Mary Anne? Take time."

"She has a place of trust at an outfitter's in the City, ma'am."

"Oh!" said Miss Peecher, pondering on it; but smoothly added, in a confirmatory tone, "At an outfitter's in the City. Ye-es?"

"And Charley—" Mary Ann was proceeding, when Miss Peecher stared.

"I mean Hexam, Miss Peecher."

"I should think you did, Mary Anne. I am glad to hear you do. And Hexam—?"

"Says," Mary Anne went on, "that he is not pleased with his sister, and that his sister won't be guided by his advice, and persists in being guided by somebody else's; and that—"

"Mr. Headstone coming across the garden!" exclaimed Miss Peecher, with a flushed glance at the looking-glass. "You have answered very well, Mary Anne. You are forming an excellent habit of arranging your thoughts clearly. That will do."

The discreet Mary Anne resumed her seat and her silence, and stitched, and stitched, and was stitching when the schoolmaster's shadow came in before him, announcing that he might be instantly expected.

"Good-evening, Miss Peecher," he said, pursuing the shadow, and taking its place.

"Good-evening, Mr. Headstone. Mary Anne, a chair."

"Thank you," said Bradley, seating himself in his constrained manner. "This is but a flying visit. I have looked in, on my way, to ask a kindness of you as a neighbor."

"Did you say on your way, Mr. Headstone?" asked Miss Peecher.

"On my way to—where I am going."

"Church Street, Smith Square, by Mill

Bank," repeated Miss Peecher, in her own thoughts.

"Charley Hexam has gone to get a book or two he wants, and will probably be back before me. As we leave my house empty, I took the liberty of telling him I would leave the key here. Would you kindly allow me to do so?"

"Certainly, Mr. Headstone. Going for an evening walk, Sir?"

"Partly for a walk, and partly for—on business."

"Business in Church Street, Smith Square, by Mill Bank," repeated Miss Peecher to herself.

"Having said which," pursued Bradley, laying his door-key on the table, "I must be already going. There is nothing I can do for you, Miss Peecher?"

"Thank you, Mr. Headstone. In which direction?"

"In the direction of Westminster."

"Mill Bank," Miss Peecher repeated in her own thoughts once again. "No, thank you, Mr. Headstone; I'll not trouble you."

"You couldn't trouble me," said the schoolmaster.

"Ah!" returned Miss Peecher, though not aloud; "but you can trouble me!" And for all her quiet manner, and her quiet smile, she was full of trouble as he went his way.

She was right touching his destination. He held as straight a course for the house of the dolls' dress-maker as the wisdom of his ancestors, exemplified in the construction of the intervening streets, would let him, and walked with a bent head hammering at one fixed idea. It had been an immovable idea since he first set eyes upon her. It seemed to him as if all that he could suppress in himself he had suppressed, as if all that he could restrain in himself he had restrained, and the time had come—in a rush, in a moment—when the power of self-command had departed from him. Love at first sight is a trite expression quite sufficiently discussed; enough that in certain smouldering natures like this man's, that passion leaps into a blaze, and makes such head as fire does in a rage of wind, when other passions, but for its mastery, could be held in chains. As a multitude of weak, imitative natures are always lying by, ready to go mad upon the next wrong idea that may be broached—in these times generally some form of tribute to Somebody for something that never was done, or, if ever done, that was done by Somebody Else—so these less ordinary natures may lie by for years, ready on the touch of an instant to burst into flame.

The schoolmaster went his way, brooding and brooding, and a sense of being vanquished in a struggle might have been pieced out of his worried face. Truly, in his breast there lingered a resentful shame to find himself defeated by this passion for Charley Hexam's sister, though in the very self-same moments he was concentrating himself upon the object of bringing the passion to a successful issue.

He appeared before the dolls' dress-maker, sitting alone at her work. "Oho!" thought that sharp young personage, "it's you, is it? I know your tricks and your manners, my friend!"

"Hexam's sister," said Bradley Headstone, "is not come home yet?"

"You are quite a conjuror," returned Miss Wren.

"I will wait, if you please, for I want to speak to her."

"Do you?" returned Miss Wren. "Sit down. I hope it's mutual."

Bradley glanced distrustfully at the shrewd face again bending over the work, and said, trying to conquer doubt and hesitation:

"I hope you don't imply that my visit will be unacceptable to Hexam's sister?"

"There! Don't call her that. I can't bear you to call her that," returned Miss Wren, snapping her fingers in a volley of impatient snaps, "for I don't like Hexam."

"Indeed?"

"No." Miss Wren wrinkled her nose, to express dislike. "Selfish. Thinks only of himself. The way with all of you."

"The way with all of us? Then you don't like me?"

"So-so," replied Miss Wren, with a shrug and a laugh. "Don't know much about you."

"But I was not aware it was the way with all of us," said Bradley, returning to the accusation, a little injured. "Won't you say, some of us?"

"Meaning," returned the little creature, "every one of you, but you. Hah! Now look this lady in the face. This is Mrs. Truth. The Honorable. Full-dressed."

Bradley glanced at the doll she held up for his observation—which had been lying on its face on her bench, while with a needle and thread she fastened the dress on at the back—and looked from it to her.

"I stand the Honorable Mrs. T. on my bench in this corner against the wall, where her blue eyes can shine upon you," pursued Miss Wren, doing so, and making two little dabs at him in the air with her needle, as if she pricked him with it in his own eyes; "and I defy you to tell me, with Mrs. T. for a witness, what you have come here for."

"To see Hexam's sister."

"You don't say so!" retorted Miss Wren, hitching her chin. "But on whose account?"

"Her own."

"Oh, Mrs. T.!" exclaimed Miss Wren. "You hear him!"

"To reason with her," pursued Bradley, half humoring what was present, and half angry with what was not present; "for her own sake."

"Oh, Mrs. T.!" exclaimed the dress-maker.

"For her own sake," repeated Bradley, warming, "and for her brother's, and as a perfectly disinterested person."

"Really, Mrs. T.," remarked the dress-maker, "since it comes to this, we must positively turn you with your face to the wall." She had hardly done so when Lizzie Hexam arrived, and showed some surprise on seeing Bradley Headstone there, and Jenny shaking her little fist at him close before her eyes, and the Honorable Mrs. T. with her face to the wall.

"Here's a perfectly disinterested person, Lizzie dear," said the knowing Miss Wren, "come to talk with you, for your own sake and your brother's. Think of that. I am sure there ought to be no third party present at any thing so very kind and so very serious; and so, if you'll remove the third party up stairs, my dear, the third party will retire."

Lizzie took the hand which the dolls' dress-maker held out to her for the purpose of being supported away, but only looked at her with an inquiring smile, and made no other movement.

"The third party hobbles awfully, you know, when she's left to herself," said Miss Wren, "her back being so bad, and her legs so queer; so she can't retire gracefully unless you help her, Lizzie."

"She can do no better than stay where she is," returned Lizzie, releasing the hand, and laying her own lightly on Miss Jenny's curls. And then to Bradley: "From Charley, Sir?"

In an irresolute way, and stealing a clumsy look at her, Bradley rose to place a chair for her, and then returned to his own.

"Strictly speaking," said he, "I come from Charley, because I left him only a little while ago; but I am not commissioned by Charley. I come of my own spontaneous act."

With her elbows on her bench, and her chin upon her hands, Miss Jenny Wren sat looking at him with a watchful sidelong look. Lizzie, in her different way, sat looking at him too.

"The fact is," began Bradley, with a mouth so dry that he had some difficulty in articulating his words: the consciousness of which rendered his manner still more ungainly and undecided; "the truth is, that Charley, having no secrets from me (to the best of my belief), has confided the whole of this matter to me."

He came to a stop, and Lizzie asked: "What matter, Sir?"

"I thought," returned the schoolmaster, stealing another look at her, and seeming to try in vain to sustain it; for the look dropped as it lighted on her eyes, "that it might be so superfluous as to be almost impertinent, to enter upon a definition of it. My allusion was to this matter of your having put aside your brother's plans for you, and given the preference to those of Mr. —I believe the name is Mr. Eugene Wrayburn."

He made this point of not being certain of the name, with another uneasy look at her, which dropped like the last.

Nothing being said on the other side he had to begin again, and began with new embarrassment.

"Your brother's plans were communicated to me when he first had them in his thoughts. In point of fact he spoke to me about them when I was last here—when we were walking back together, and when I—when the impression was fresh upon me of having seen his sister."

There might have been no meaning in it, but the little dress-maker here removed one of her supporting hands from her chin, and musingly turned the Honorable Mrs. T. with her face to the company. That done she fell into her former attitude.

"I approved of his idea," said Bradley, with his uneasy look wandering to the doll, and unconsciously resting there longer than it had rested on Lizzie, "both because your brother ought naturally to be the originator of any such scheme, and because I hoped to be able to promote it. I should have had inexpressible pleasure, I should have taken inexpressible interest, in promoting it. Therefore I must acknowledge that when your brother was disappointed, I too was disappointed. I wish to avoid reservation or concealment, and I fully acknowledge that."

He appeared to have encouraged himself by having got so far. At all events he went on with much greater firmness and force of emphasis: though with a curious disposition to set his teeth, and with a curious tight-screwing movement of his right hand in the clenching palm of his left, like the action of one who was being physically hurt, and was unwilling to cry out.

"I am a man of strong feelings, and I have strongly felt this disappointment. I do strongly feel it. I don't show what I feel; some of us are obliged habitually to keep it down. To keep it down. But to return to your brother. He has taken the matter so much to heart that he has remonstrated (in my presence he remonstrated) with Mr. Eugene Wrayburn, if that be the name. He did so quite ineffectually. As any one not blinded to the real character of Mr. —Mr. Eugene Wrayburn—would readily suppose."

He looked at Lizzie again, and held the look. And his face turned from burning red to white, and from white back to burning red, and so for the time to lasting deadly white.

"Finally, I resolved to come here alone and appeal to you. I resolved to come here alone, and entreat you to retract the course you have chosen, and instead of confiding in a mere stranger—a person of most insolent behavior to your brother and others—to prefer your brother and your brother's friend."

Lizzie Hexam had changed color when those changes came over him, and her face now expressed some anger, more dislike, and even a touch of fear. But she answered him very steadily.

"I can not doubt, Mr. Headstone, that your visit is well meant. You have been so good a friend to Charley that I have no right to doubt it. I have nothing to tell Charley, but that I accepted the help to which he so much objects before he made any plans for me; or certainly before I knew of any. It was considerably and delicately offered, and there were reasons that had weight with me which should be as dear to Charley as to me. I have no more to say to Charley on this subject."

His lips trembled and stood apart, as he followed this repudiation of himself, and limitation of her words to her brother.

"I should have told Charley, if he had come to me," she resumed, as though it were an afterthought, "that Jenny and I find our teacher very able and very patient, and that she takes great pains with us. So much so, that we have said to her we hope in a very little while to be able to go on by ourselves. Charley knows about teachers, and I should also have told him, for his satisfaction, that ours comes from an institution where teachers are regularly brought up."

"I should like to ask you," said Bradley Headstone, grinding his words slowly out, as though they came from a rusty mill; "I should like to ask you, if I may without offense, whether you would have objected—no; rather, I should like to say, if I may without offense, that I wish I had had the opportunity of coming here with your brother and devoting my poor abilities and experience to your service."

"Thank you, Mr. Headstone."

"But I fear," he pursued, after a pause, furtively wrenching at the seat of his chair with one hand, as if he would have wrenched the chair to pieces, and gloomily observing her while her eyes were cast down, "that my humble services would not have found much favor with you?"

She made no reply, and the poor stricken wretch sat contending with himself in a heat of passion and torment. After a while he took out his handkerchief and wiped his forehead and hands.

"There is only one thing more I had to say, but it is the most important. There is a reason against this matter, there is a personal relation concerned in this matter, not yet explained to you. It might—I don't say it would—it might—induce you to think differently. To proceed under the present circumstances is out of the question. Will you please come to the understanding that there shall be another interview on the subject?"

"With Charley, Mr. Headstone?"

"With—well," he answered, breaking off, "yes! Say with him too. Will you please come to the understanding that there must be another interview under more favorable circumstances, before the whole case can be submitted?"

"I don't," said Lizzie, shaking her head, "understand your meaning, Mr. Headstone."

"Limit my meaning for the present," he interrupted, "to the whole case being submitted to you in another interview."

"What case, Mr. Headstone? What is wanting to it?"

"You—you shall be informed in the other interview." Then he said, as if in a burst of irrepressible despair, "I—I leave it all incomplete! There is a spell upon me, I think!" And then added, almost as if he asked for pity, "Good-night!"

He held out his hand. As she, with manifest hesitation, not to say reluctance, touched it, a strange tremble passed over him, and his face, so deadly white, was moved as by a stroke of pain. Then he was gone.

The dolls' dress-maker sat with her attitude unchanged, eying the door by which he had departed, until Lizzie pushed her bench aside and sat down near her. Then, eying Lizzie as she had previously eyed Bradley and the door, Miss Wren chopped that very sudden and keen chop in which her jaws sometimes indulged, leaned back in her chair with folded arms, and thus expressed herself:

"Humph! If he—I mean, of course, my dear, the party who is coming to court me when the time comes—should be that sort of man, he may spare himself the trouble. He wouldn't do to be trotted about and made useful. He'd take fire and blow up while he was about it."

"And so you would be rid of him," said Lizzie, humoring her.

"Not so easily," returned Miss Wren. "He wouldn't blow up alone. He'd carry me up with him. I know his tricks and his manners."

"Would he want to hurt you, do you mean?" asked Lizzie.

"Mightn't exactly want to do it, my dear," returned Miss Wren; "but a lot of gunpowder among lighted lucifer-matches in the next room might almost as well be here."

"He is a very strange man," said Lizzie, thoughtfully.

"I wish he was so very strange a man as to be a total stranger," answered the sharp little thing.

It being Lizzie's regular occupation when they were alone of an evening to brush out and smooth the long fair hair of the dolls' dress-maker, she unfastened a ribbon that kept it back while the little creature was at her work, and it fell in a beautiful shower over the poor shoulders that were much in need of such adorning rain. "Not now, Lizzie dear," said Jenny; "let us have a talk by the fire." With those words, she in her turn loosened her friend's dark hair, and it dropped of its own weight over her bosom, in two rich masses. Pretending to compare the colors and admire the contrast, Jenny so managed a mere touch or two of her nimble hands, as that she herself laying a cheek on one of the dark folds, seemed blinded by her own clustering curls to all but the fire, while the fine handsome face and brow of Lizzie were revealed without obstruction in the sober light.

"Let us have a talk," said Jenny, "about Mr. Eugene Wrayburn."

Something sparkled down among the fair hair resting on the dark hair; and if it were not a star—which it couldn't be—it was an eye; and if it were an eye, it was Jenny Wren's eye, bright and watchful as the bird's whose name she had taken.

"Why about Mr. Wrayburn?" Lizzie asked.

"For no better reason than because I'm in the humor. I wonder whether he's rich!"

"No, not rich."

"Poor?"

"I think so, for a gentleman."

"Ah! To be sure! Yes, he's a gentleman. Not of our sort; is he?"

A shake of the head, a thoughtful shake of the head, and the answer, softly spoken, "Oh no, oh no!"

The dolls' dress-maker had an arm round her friend's waist. Adjusting the arm, she slyly took the opportunity of blowing at her own hair where it fell over her face; then the eye down there, under lighter shadows sparkled more brightly and appeared more watchful.

"When He turns up, he sha'n't be a gentleman; I'll very soon send him packing, if he is. However, he's not Mr. Wrayburn; I haven't captivated him. I wonder whether any body has, Lizzie!"

"It is very likely."

"Is it very likely? I wonder who!"

"Is it not very likely that some lady has been taken by him, and that he may love her dearly?"

"Perhaps. I don't know. What would you think of him, Lizzie, if you were a lady?"

"I a lady!" she repeated, laughing. "Such a fancy!"

"Yes. But say: just as a fancy, and for instance."

"I a lady! I, a poor girl who used to row poor father on the river. I, who had rowed poor father out and home on the very night when I saw him for the first time. I, who was made so timid by his looking at me, that I got up and went out!"

("He did look at you, even that night, though you were not a lady!" thought Miss Wren.)

"I a lady!" Lizzie went on in a low voice, with her eyes upon the fire. "I, with poor father's grave not even cleared of undeserved stain and shame, and he trying to clear it for me! I a lady!"

"Only as a fancy, and for instance," urged Miss Wren.

"Too much, Jenny dear, too much! My fancy is not able to get that far." As the low fire gleamed upon her, it showed her smiling mournfully and abstractedly.

"But I am in the humor, and I must be humored, Lizzie, because after all I am a poor little thing, and have had a hard day with my bad child. Look in the fire, as I like to hear you tell how you used to do when you lived in that dreary old house that had once been a wind-mill. Look in the—what was its name when you told fortunes with your brother that I don't like?"

"The hollow down by the flare?"

"Ah! That's the name! You can find a lady there, I know."

"More easily than I can make one of such material as myself, Jenny."

The sparkling eye looked steadfastly up, as the musing face looked thoughtfully down. "Well?" said the dolls' dress-maker, "We have found our lady?"

Lizzie nodded, and asked, "Shall she be rich?"

"She had better be, as he's poor."

"She is very rich. Shall she be handsome?"

"Even you can be that, Lizzie, so she ought to be."

"She is very handsome."

"What does she say about him?" asked Miss Jenny, in a low voice: watchful, through an intervening silence, of the face looking down at the fire.

"She is glad, glad, to be rich, that he may have the money. She is glad, glad, to be beautiful, that he may be proud of her. Her poor heart—"

"Eh? Her poor heart?" said Miss Wren.

"Her heart—is given him, with all its love and truth. She would joyfully die with him, or, better than that, die for him. She knows he has failings, but she thinks they have grown up through his being like one cast away, for the want of something to trust in, and care for, and think well of. And she says, that lady rich and beautiful that I can never come near, 'Only put me in that empty place, only try how little I mind myself, only prove what a world of things I will do and bear for you, and I hope that you might even come to be much better than you are, through me who am so much worse, and hardly worth the thinking of beside you.'"

As the face looking at the fire had become exalted and forgetful in the rapture of these words, the little creature, openly clearing away her fair hair with her disengaged hand, had gazed at it with earnest attention and something like alarm. Now that the speaker ceased, the little creature laid down her head again, and moaned, "O me, O me, O me!"

"In pain, dear Jenny?" asked Lizzy, as if awakened.

"Yes, but not the old pain. Lay me down, lay me down. Don't go out of my sight to-night. Lock the door and keep close to me." Then turning away her face, she said in a whisper to herself, "My Lizzie, my poor Lizzie! O my blessed children, come back in the long bright slanting rows, and come for her, not me. She wants help more than I, my blessed children!"

She had stretched her hands up with that higher and better look, and now she turned again, and folded them round Lizzie's neck, and rocked herself on Lizzie's breast.

CHAPTER XII.

MORE BIRDS OF PREY.

ROGUE RIDERHOOD dwelt deep and dark in Limehouse Hole, among the riggers, and the mast, oar, and block makers, and the boat-builders, and the sail-lofts, as in a kind of ship's hold stored full of waterside characters, some no better than himself, some very much better, and none much worse. The Hole, albeit in a general way not over-nice in its choice of company, was rather shy in reference to the honor of cultivating the Rogue's acquaintance; more frequently giving him the cold shoulder than the warm hand, and seldom or never drinking with him unless at his own expense. A part of the Hole, indeed, contained so much public spirit and private virtue that not even this strong leverage could move it to good fellowship with a tainted accuser. But there may have been the drawback on this magnanimous morality, that its exponents held a true witness before Justice to be the next unneighborly and accursed character to a false one.

Had it not been for the daughter whom he often mentioned, Mr. Riderhood might have found the Hole a mere grave as to any means it would yield him of getting a living. But Miss Pleasant Riderhood had some little position and connection in Limehouse Hole. Upon the smallest of small scales, she was an unlicensed pawnbroker, keeping what was popularly called a Leaving Shop, by lending insignificant sums on insignificant articles of property deposited with her as security. In her four-and-twentieth year of life, Pleasant was already in her fifth year of this way of trade. Her deceased mother had established the business, and on that parent's demise she had appropriated a secret capital of fifteen shillings to establishing herself in it; the existence of such capital in a pillow being the last intelligible confidential communication made to her by the departed, before succumbing to dropsical conditions of snuff and gin, incompatible equally with coherence and existence.

Why christened Pleasant, the late Mrs. Riderhood might possibly have been at some time able to explain, and possibly not. Her daughter had no information on that point. Pleasant she found herself, and she couldn't help it. She had not been consulted on the question, any more than on the question of her coming into these terrestrial parts, to want a name. Similarly, she found herself possessed of what is colloquially termed a swivel eye (derived from her father), which she might perhaps have declined if her sentiments on the subject had been taken. She was not otherwise positively ill-looking, though anxious, meagre, of a muddy complexion, and looking as old again as she really was.

As some dogs have it in the blood, or are trained, to worry certain creatures to a certain point, so—not to make the comparison disrespectfully—Pleasant Riderhood had it in the blood, or had been trained, to regard seamen, within certain limits, as her prey. Show her a man in a blue jacket, and, figuratively speaking, she pinned him instantly. Yet, all things considered, she was not of an evil mind or an unkindly disposition. For, observe how many things were to be considered according to her own unfortunate experience. Show Pleasant Riderhood a Wedding in the street, and she only saw two people taking out a regular license to quarrel and fight. Show her a Christening, and she saw a little heathen personage having a quite superfluous name bestowed upon it, inasmuch as it would be commonly addressed by some abusive epithet: which little personage was not in the least wanted by any body, and would be shoved and banged out of every body's way, until it should grow big enough to shove and bang. Show her a Funeral, and she saw an unremunerative ceremony in the nature of a black masquerade, conferring a temporary gentility on the performers, at an immense expense, and representing the only formal party ever given by the deceased. Show her a live father, and she saw but a duplicate of her own father, who from her infancy had been taken with fits and starts of discharging his duty to her, which duty was always incorporated in the form of a fist or a leathern strap, and being discharged hurt her. All things considered, therefore, Pleasant Riderhood was not so very, very bad. There was even a touch of romance in her—of such romance as could creep into Limehouse Hole—and maybe sometimes of a summer evening, when she stood with folded arms at her shop-door, looking from the reeking street to the sky where the sun was setting, she may have had some vaporous visions of far-off islands in the southern seas or elsewhere (not being geographically particular), where it would be good to roam with a congenial partner among groves of bread-fruit, waiting for ships to be wafted from the hollow ports of civilization. For, sailors to be got the better of, were essential to Miss Pleasant's Eden.

Not on a summer evening did she come to her little shop-door, when a certain man standing over against the house on the opposite side of the street took notice of her. That was on a cold shrewd windy evening, after dark. Pleasant Riderhood shared, with most of the lady inhabitants of the Hole, the peculiarity that her hair was a ragged knot, constantly coming down behind, and that she never could enter upon any undertaking without first twisting it into place. At that particular moment, being newly come to the threshold to take a look out of doors, she was winding herself up with both hands after this fashion. And so prevalent was the fashion, that on the occasion of a fight or other disturbance in the Hole, the ladies would be seen flocking from all quarters universally twisting their back-hair as they came along, and many of them, in the hurry of the moment, carrying their back-combs in their mouths.

It was a wretched little shop, with a roof that any man standing in it could touch with his hand; little better than a cellar or cave, down three steps. Yet in its ill-lighted window, among a flaring handkerchief or two, an old peacoat or so, a few valueless watches and compasses, a jar of tobacco and two crossed pipes, a bottle of walnut ketchup, and some horrible sweets—these creature discomforts serving as a blind to the main business of the Leaving Shop—was displayed the inscription SEAMAN'S BOARDING-HOUSE.

Taking notice of Pleasant Riderhood at the door, the man crossed so quickly that she was still winding herself up, when he stood close before her.

"Is your father at home?" said he.

"I think he is," returned Pleasant, dropping her arms; "come in."

It was a tentative reply, the man having a sea-faring appearance. Her father was not at home, and Pleasant knew it. "Take a seat by the fire," was her hospitable words, when she had got him in; "men of your calling are always welcome here."

"Thankee," said the man.

His manner was the manner of a sailor, and his hands were the hands of a sailor, except that they were smooth. Pleasant had an eye for sailors, and she noticed the unused color and texture of the hands, sunburnt though they were, as sharply as she noticed their unmistakable looseness and suppleness, as he sat himself down with his left arm carelessly thrown across his left leg a little above the knee, and the right arm as carelessly thrown over the elbow of the wooden chair, with the hand curved, half open and half shut, as if it had just let go a rope.

"Might you be looking for a Boarding-House?" Pleasant inquired, taking her observant stand on one side of the fire.

"I don't rightly know my plans yet," returned the man.

"You ain't looking for a Leaving Shop?"

"No," said the man.

"No," assented Pleasant, "you've got too much of an onfit on you for that. But if you should want either, this is both."

"Ay, ay!" said the man, glancing round the place. "I know. I've been here before."

"Did you Leave any thing when you were here before?" asked Pleasant, with a view to principal and interest.

"No." The man shook his head.

"I am pretty sure you never boarded here?"

"No." The man again shook his head.

"What did you do here when you were here before?" asked Pleasant. "For I don't remember you."

"It's not at all likely you should. I only stood at the door, one night—on the lower step there—while a ship-mate of mine looked in to speak to your father. I remember the place well." Looking very curiously round it.

"Might that have been long ago?"

"Ay, a goodish bit ago. When I came off my last voyage."

"Then you have not been to sea lately?"

"No. Been in the sick bay since then, and been employed ashore."

"Then, to be sure, that accounts for your hands."

The man with a keen look, a quick smile, and a change of manner, caught her up. "You're a good observer. Yes. That accounts for my hands."

Pleasant was somewhat disquieted by his look, and returned it suspiciously. Not only was his change of manner, though very sudden, quite collected, but his former manner, which he resumed, had a certain suppressed confidence and sense of power in it that were half threatening.

"Will your father be long?" he inquired.

"I don't know. I can't say."

"As you supposed he was at home, it would seem that he has just gone out? How's that?"

"I supposed he had come home," Pleasant explained.

"Oh! You supposed he had come home? Then he has been some time out? How's that?"

"I don't want to deceive you. Father's on the river in his boat."

"At the old work?" asked the man.

"I don't know what you mean," said Pleasant, shrinking a step back. "What on earth d'ye want?"

"I don't want to hurt your father. I don't want to say I might, if I chose. I want to speak to him. Not much in that, is there? There shall be no secrets from you; you shall be by. And plainly, Miss Riderhood, there's nothing to be got out of me, or made of me. I am not good for the Leaving Shop, I am not good for the Boarding-House, I am not good for any thing in your way to the extent of sixpenn'orth of halfpence. Put the idea aside, and we shall get on together."

"But you're a sea-faring man?" argued Pleasant, as if that were a sufficient reason for his being good for something in her way.

"Yes and no. I have been, and I may be again. But I am not for you. Won't you take my word for it?"

The conversation had arrived at a crisis to justify Miss Pleasant's hair in tumbling down. It tumbled down accordingly, and she twisted it up, looking from under her bent forehead at the man. In taking stock of his familiarly worn rough-weather nautical clothes, piece by piece, she took stock of a formidable knife in a sheath at his waist ready to his hand, and of a whistle hanging round his neck, and of a short jagged knotted club with a loaded head that peeped out of a pocket of his loose outer jacket or frock. He sat quietly looking at her; but, with these appendages partially revealing themselves, and with a quantity of bristling oakum-colored head and whisker, he had a formidable appearance.

"Won't you take my word for it?" he asked again.

Pleasant answered with a short dumb nod. He rejoined with another short dumb nod. Then he got up and stood with his arms folded, in front of the fire, looking down into it occasionally, as she stood with her arms folded, leaning against the side of the chimney-piece.

"To while away the time till your father comes," he said—"pray is there much robbing and murdering of seamen about the water-side now?"

"No," said Pleasant.

"Any?"

"Complaints of that sort are sometimes made, about Ratcliffe and Wapping, and up that way. But who knows how many are true?"

"To be sure. And it don't seem necessary."

"That's what I say," observed Pleasant. "Where's the reason for it? Bless the sailors, it ain't as if they ever could keep what they have without it."

"You're right. Their money may be soon got out of them, without violence," said the man.

"Of course it may," said Pleasant; "and then they ship again, and get more. And the best thing for 'em, too, to ship again as soon as ever they can be brought to it. They're never so well off as when they're afloat."

"I'll tell you why I ask," pursued the visitor, looking up from the fire. "I was once beset that way myself, and left for dead."

"No?" said Pleasant. "Where did it happen?"

"It happened," returned the man, with a ruminative air, as he drew his right hand across his chin, and dipped the other in the pocket of his rough outer coat, "it happened somewhere about here as I reckon. I don't think it can have been a mile from here."

"Were you drunk?" asked Pleasant.

"I was muddled, but not with fair drinking. I had not been drinking, you understand. A mouthful did it."

Pleasant with a grave look shook her head; importing that she understood the process, but decidedly disapproved.

"Fair trade is one thing," said she, "but that's another. No one has a right to carry on with Jack in that way."

"The sentiment does you credit," returned the man, with a grim smile; and added, in a mutter, "the more so, as I believe it's not your father's.—Yes, I had a bad time of it, that time. I lost every thing, and had a sharp struggle for my life, weak as I was."

"Did you get the parties punished?" asked Pleasant.

"A tremendous punishment followed," said the man, more seriously; "but it was not of my bringing about."

"Of whose, then?" asked Pleasant.

The man pointed upward with his forefinger, and, slowly recovering that hand, settled his chin in it again as he looked at the fire. Bringing her inherited eye to bear upon him, Pleasant Riderhood felt more and more uncomfortable, his manner was so mysterious, so stern, so self-possessed.

"Any ways," said the damsel, "I am glad punishment followed, and I say so. Fair trade with sea-faring men gets a bad name through deeds of violence. I am as much against deeds of violence being done to sea-faring men, as sea-faring men can be themselves. I am of the same opinion as my mother was, when she was living. Fair trade, my mother used to say, but no robbery and no blows." In the way of trade Miss Pleasant would have taken—and indeed did take when she could—as much as thirty shillings a week for board that would be dear at five, and likewise conducted the Leaving business upon correspondingly equitable principles; yet she had that tenderness of conscience and those feelings of humanity, that the moment her ideas of trade were overstepped, she became the seaman's champion, even against her father whom she seldom otherwise resisted.

But she was here interrupted by her father's voice exclaiming angrily, "Now, Poll Parrot!" and by her father's hat being heavily flung from his hand and striking her face. Accustomed to such occasional manifestations of his sense of parental duty, Pleasant merely wiped her face on her hair (which of course had tumbled down) before she twisted it up. This was another common procedure on the part of the ladies of the Hole, when heated by verbal or fistic altercation.

"Blest if I believe such a Poll Parrot as you was ever learned to speak!" growled Mr. Riderhood, stooping to pick up his hat, and making a feint at her with his head and right elbow; for he took the delicate subject of robbing seamen in extraordinary dudgeon, and was out of humor too. "What are you Poll Parroting at now? Ain't you got nothing to do but fold your arms and stand a Poll Parroting all night?"

"Let her alone," urged the man. "She was only speaking to me."

"Let her alone too!" retorted Mr. Riderhood, eying him all over. "Do you know she's my daughter?"

"Yes."

"And don't you know that I won't have no Poll Parroting on the part of my daughter? No, nor yet that I won't take no Poll Parroting from no man? And who may you be, and what may you want?"

"How can I tell you until you are silent?" returned the other, fiercely.

"Well," said Mr. Riderhood, quailing a little, "I am willing to be silent for the purpose of hearing. But don't Poll Parrot me."

"Are you thirsty, you?" the man asked, in the same fierce, short way, after returning his look.

"Why nat'rally," said Mr. Riderhood, "ain't I always thirsty!" (Indignant at the absurdity of the question.)

"What will you drink?" demanded the man.

"Sherry wine," returned Mr. Riderhood, in the same sharp tone, "if you're capable of it."

The man put his hand in his pocket, took out half a sovereign, and begged the favor of Miss Pleasant that she would fetch a bottle. "With the cork undrawn," he added, emphatically, looking at her father.

"I'll take my Alfred David," muttered Mr. Riderhood, slowly relaxing into a dark smile, "that you know a move. Do I know you? N—n—no, I don't know you."

The man replied, "No, you don't know me." And so they stood looking at one another surly enough, until Pleasant came back.

"There's small glasses on the shelf," said Riderhood to his daughter. "Give me the one without a foot. I gets my living by the sweat of my brow, and it's good enough for me." This had a modest self-denying appearance; but it soon turned out that as, by reason of the impossibility of standing the glass upright while there was any thing in it, it required to be emptied as soon as filled, Mr. Riderhood managed to drink in the proportion of three to one.

With his Fortunatus's goblet ready in his hand, Mr. Riderhood sat down on one side of the table before the fire, and the strange man on the other: Pleasant occupying a stool between the latter and the fireside. The back-ground, composed of handkerchiefs, coats, shirts, hats, and other old articles "On Leaving," had a general dim resemblance to human listeners; especially where a shiny black sou'wester suit and hat hung, looking very like a clumsy mariner with his back to the company, who was so curious to overhear, that he paused for the purpose with his coat half pulled on, and his shoulders up to his ears in the uncompleted action.

The visitor first held the bottle against the light of the candle, and next examined the top of the cork. Satisfied that it had not been tampered with, he slowly took from his breast-pocket a rusty clasp-knife, and, with a cork-screw in the handle, opened the wine. That done, he looked at the cork, unscrewed it from the cork-screw, laid each separately on the table, and, with the end of the sailor's knot of his neckerchief, dusted the inside of the neck of the bottle. All this with great deliberation.

At first Riderhood had sat with his footless glass extended at arm's-length for filling, while the very deliberate stranger seemed absorbed in his preparations. But gradually his arm reverted home to him, and his glass was lowered and lowered until he rested it upside down upon the table. By the same degrees his attention became concentrated on the knife. And now, as the man held out the bottle to fill all round, Riderhood stood up, leaned over the table to look closer at the knife, and stared from it to him.

"What's the matter?" asked the man.

"Why, I know that knife!" said Riderhood.

"Yes, I dare say you do."

He motioned to him to hold up his glass, and filled it. Riderhood emptied it to the last drop and began again.

"That there knife—"

"Stop," said the man, composedly. "I was going to drink to your daughter. Your health, Miss Riderhood."

"That knife was the knife of a seaman named George Radfoot."

"It was."

"That seaman was well beknown to me."

"He was."

"What's come to him?"

"Death has come to him. Death came to him in an ugly shape. He looked," said the man, "very horrible after it."

"Arter what?" said Riderhood, with a frowning stare.

"After he was killed."

"Killed? Who killed him?"

Only answering with a shrug, the man filled the footless glass, and Riderhood emptied it: looking amazedly from his daughter to his visitor.

"You don't mean to tell a honest man—" he was recommencing with his empty glass in his hand, when his eye became fascinated by the stranger's outer coat. He leaned across the table to see it nearer, touched the sleeve, turned the cuff to look at the sleeve-lining (the man, in his perfect composure, offering not the least objection), and exclaimed, "It's my belief as this here coat was George Radfoot's too!"

"You are right. He wore it the last time you ever saw him, and the last time you ever will see him—in this world."

"It's my belief you mean to tell me to my face you killed him!" exclaimed Riderhood; but, nevertheless, allowing his glass to be filled again.

The man only answered with another shrug, and showed no symptom of confusion.

"Wish I may die if I know what to be up to with this chap!" said Riderhood, after staring at him, and tossing his last glassful down his throat. "Let's know what to make of you. Say something plain."

"I will," returned the other, leaning forward across the table, and speaking in a low, impressive voice. "What a liar you are!"

The honest witness rose, and made as though he would fling his glass in the man's face. The man not wincing, and merely shaking his forefinger half knowingly, half menacingly, the piece of honesty thought better of it and sat down again, putting the glass down too.

"And when you went to that lawyer yonder in the Temple with that invented story," said the stranger, in an exasperatingly comfortable sort of confidence, "you might have had your strong suspicions of a friend of your own, you know. I think you had, you know."

"Me my suspicions? Of what friend?"

"Tell me again whose knife was this?" demanded the man.

"It was possessed by, and was the property of—him as I have made mention on," said Riderhood, stupidly evading the actual mention of the name.

"Tell me again whose coat was this?"

"That there article of clothing likewise belonged to, and was wore by—him as I have made mention on," was again the dull Old Bailey evasion.

"I suspect that you gave him the credit of the deed, and of keeping cleverly out of the way. But there was small cleverness in his keeping out of the way. The cleverness would have been, to have got back for one single instant to the light of the sun."

"Things is come to a pretty pass," growled Mr. Riderhood, rising to his feet, goaded to stand at bay, "when bullyers as is wearing dead men's clothes, and bullyers as is armed with dead men's knives, is to come into the houses of honest live men, getting their livings by the sweats of their brows, and is to make these here sort of charges with no rhyme and no reason, neither the one nor yet the other! Why should I have had my suspicions of him?"

"Because you knew him," replied the man; "because you had been one with him, and knew his real character under a fair outside; because on the night which you had afterward reason to believe to be the very night of the murder, he came in here, within an hour of his having left his ship in the docks, and asked you in what lodgings he could find room. Was there no stranger with him?"

"I'll take my world-without-end everlasting Alfred David that you warn't with him," answered Riderhood. "You talk big, you do, but things look pretty black against yourself, to my thinking. You charge again' me that George Radfoot got lost sight of, and was no more thought of. What's that for a sailor? Why there's fifty such, out of sight and out of mind, ten times as long as him—through entering in different names, re-shipping when the out'ard voyage is made, and what not—a turning up to light every day about here, and no matter made of it. Ask my daughter. You could go on Poll Parroting enough with her, when I warn't come in: Poll Parrot a little with her on this pint. You and your suspicions of my suspicions of him! What are my suspicions of you? You tell me George Radfoot got killed. I ask you who done it and how you know it. You carry his knife and you wear his coat. I ask you how you come by 'em? Hand over that there bottle!" Here Mr. Riderhood appeared to labor under a virtuous delusion that it was his own property. "And you," he added, turning to his daughter, as he filled the footless glass, "if it warn't wasting good sherry wine on you, I'd chuck this at you, for Poll Parroting with this man. It's along of Poll Parroting that such like as him gets their suspicions, whereas I gets mine by arguement, and being nat'rally a honest man, and sweating away at the brow as a honest man ought." Here he filled the footless goblet again, and stood chewing one half of its contents and looking down into the other as he slowly rolled the wine about in the glass; while Pleasant, whose sympathetic hair had come down on her being apostrophized, rearranged it, much in the style of the tail of a horse when proceeding to market to be sold.

"Well? Have you finished?" asked the strange man.

"No," said Riderhood, "I ain't. Far from it. Now then! I want to know how George Radfoot come by his death, and how you come by his kit?"

"If you ever do know, you won't know now."

"And next I want to know," proceeded Riderhood, "whether you mean to charge that what-you-may-call-it-murder—"

"Harmon murder, father," suggested Pleasant.

"No Poll Parroting!" he vociferated, in return. "Keep your mouth shut!—I want to know, you Sir, whether you charge that there crime on George Radfoot?"

"If you ever do know, you won't know now."

"Perhaps you done it yourself?" said Riderhood, with a threatening action.

"I alone know," returned the man, sternly shaking his head, "the mysteries of that crime. I alone know that your trumped-up story can not possibly be true. I alone know that it must be altogether false, and that you must know it to be altogether false. I come here to-night to tell you so much of what I know, and no more."

Mr. Riderhood, with his crooked eye upon his visitor, meditated for some moments, and then refilled his glass, and tipped the contents down his throat in three tips.

"Shut the shop-door!" he then said to his daughter, putting the glass suddenly down. "And turn the key and stand by it! If you know all this, you Sir," getting, as he spoke, between the visitor and the door, "why han't you gone to Lawyer Lightwood?"

"That, also, is alone known to myself," was the cool answer.

"Don't you know that, if you didn't do the deed, what you say you could tell is worth from five to ten thousand pound?" asked Riderhood.

"I know it very well, and when I claim the money you shall share it."

The honest man paused, and drew a little nearer to the visitor, and a little further from the door.

"I know it," repeated the man, quietly, "as well as I know that you and George Radfoot were one together in more than one dark business; and as well as I know that you, Roger Riderhood, conspired against an innocent man for blood-money; and as well as I know that I can—and that I swear I will!—give you up on both scores, and be proof against you in my own person, if you defy me!"

"Father!" cried Pleasant, from the door. "Don't defy him! Give way to him! Don't get into more trouble, father!"

"Will you leave off a Poll Parroting, I ask you?" cried Mr. Riderhood, half beside himself between the two. Then, propitiatingly and crawlingly: "You Sir! You han't said what you want of me. Is it fair, is it worthy of yourself, to talk of my defying you afore ever you say what you want of me?"

"I don't want much," said the man. "This accusation of yours must not be left half made and half unmade. What was done for the blood-money must be thoroughly undone."

"Well; but Shipmate—"

"Don't call me Shipmate," said the man.

"Captain, then," urged Mr. Riderhood; "there! You won't object to Captain. It's an honorable title, and you fully look it. Captain! Ain't the man dead? Now I ask you fair. Ain't Gaffer dead?"

"Well," returned the other, with impatience, "yes, he is dead. What then?"

"Can words hurt a dead man, Captain? I only ask you fair."

"They can hurt the memory of a dead man, and they can hurt his living children. How many children had this man?"

"Meaning Gaffer, Captain?"

"Of whom else are we speaking?" returned the other, with a movement of his foot, as if Rogue Riderhood were beginning to sneak before him in the body as well as the spirit, and he spurned him off. "I have heard of a daughter, and a son. I ask for information; I ask your daughter; I prefer to speak to her. What children did Hexam leave?"

Pleasant, looking to her father for permission to reply, that honest man exclaimed with great bitterness:

"Why the devil don't you answer the Captain? You can Poll Parrot enough when you ain't wanted to Poll Parrot, you perverse jade!"

Thus encouraged, Pleasant explained that there were only Lizzie, the daughter in question, and the youth. Both very respectable, she added.

"It is dreadful that any stigma should attach to them," said the visitor, whom the consideration rendered so uneasy that he rose, and paced to and fro, muttering, "Dreadful! Unforeseen? How could it be foreseen!" Then he stopped, and asked aloud: "Where do they live?"

Pleasant further explained that only the daughter had resided with the father at the time of his accidental death, and that she had immediately afterward quitted the neighborhood.

"I know that," said the man, "for I have been to the place they dwelt in, at the time of the inquest. Could you quietly find out for me where she lives now?"

Pleasant had no doubt she could do that. Within what time, did she think? Within a day. The visitor said that was well, and he would return for the information, relying on its being obtained. To this dialogue Riderhood had attended in silence, and he now obsequiously bespake the Captain.

"Captain! Mentioning them unfort'net words of mine respecting Gaffer, it is contrairily to be bore in mind that Gaffer always were a precious rascal, and that his line were a thieving line. Likeways when I went to them two Governors, Lawyer Lightwood and the t'other Governor, with my information, I may have been a little over-eager for the cause of justice, or (to put it another way) a little over-stimulated by them feelings which rouses a man up, when a pot of money is going about, to get his hand into that pot of money for his family's sake. Besides which, I think the wine of them two Governors was—I will not say a hocussed wine, but fur from a wine as was elthy for the mind. And there's another thing to be remembered, Captain. Did I stick to them words when Gaffer was no more, and did I say bold to them two Governors, 'Governors both, wot I informed I still inform; wot was took down I hold to?' No. I says, frank and open—no shuffling, mind you, Captain!—'I may have been mistook, I've been a thinking of it, it mayn't have been took down correct on this and that, and I won't swear to thick and thin, I'd rayther forfeit your good opinions than do it.' And so far as I know," concluded Mr. Riderhood, by way of proof and evidence to character, "I have actiwallly forfeited the good opinions of several persons—even your own, Captain, if I understand your words—but I'd sooner do it than be forswore. There; if that's conspiracy, call me conspirator."

"You shall sign," said the visitor, taking very little heed of this oration, "a statement that it was all utterly false, and the poor girl shall have it. I will bring it with me for your signature when I come again."

"When might you be expected, Captain?" inquired Riderhood, again dubiously getting between him and the door.

"Quite soon enough for you. I shall not disappoint you; don't be afraid."

"Might you be inclined to leave any name, Captain?"

"No, not at all. I have no such intention."

"'Shall' is summ'at of a hard word, Captain," urged Riderhood, still feebly dodging between him and the door, as he advanced. "When you say a man 'shall' sign this and that and t'other, Captain, you order him about in a grand sort of a way. Don't it seem so to yourself?"

The man stood still, and angrily fixed him with his eyes.

"Father, father!" entreated Pleasant, from the door, with her disengaged hand nervously trembling at her lips; "don't! Don't get into trouble any more!"

"Hear me out, Captain, hear me out! All I was wishing to mention, Captain, afore you took your departer," said the sneaking Mr. Riderhood, falling out of his path, "was, your handsome words relating to the reward."

"When I claim it," said the man, in a tone which seemed to leave some such words as "you dog" very distinctly understood, "you shall share it."

Looking steadfastly at Riderhood, he once more said in a low voice, this time with a grim sort of admiration of him as a perfect piece of evil, "What a liar you are!" and, nodding his head twice or thrice over the compliment, passed out of the shop. But to Pleasant he said good-night kindly.

The honest man who gained his living by the sweat of his brow remained in a state akin to stupefaction, until the footless glass and the unfinished bottle conveyed themselves into his mind. From his mind he conveyed them into his hands, and so conveyed the last of the wine into his stomach. When that was done, he awoke to a clear perception that Poll Parroting was solely chargeable with what had passed. Therefore, not to be remiss in his duty as a father, he threw a pair of sea-boots at Pleasant, which she ducked to avoid, and then cried, poor thing, using her hair for a pocket-handkerchief.

CHAPTER XIII.

A SOLO AND A DUET.

THE wind was blowing so hard when the visitor came out at the shop-door into the darkness and dirt of Limehouse Hole, that it almost blew him in again. Doors were slamming violently, lamps were flickering or blown out, signs were rocking in their frames, the water of the kennels, wind-dispersed, flew about in drops like rain. Indifferent to the weather, and even preferring it to better weather for its clearance of the streets, the man looked about him with a scrutinizing glance. "Thus much I know," he murmured. "I have never been here since that night, and never was here before that night, but thus much I recognize. I wonder which way did we take when we came out of that shop. We turned to the right as I have turned, but I can recall no more. Did we go by this alley? Or down that little lane?"

He tried both, but both confused him equally, and he came straying back to the same spot. "I remember there were poles pushed out of upper windows on which clothes were drying, and I remember a low public house, and the sound flowing down a narrow passage belonging to it of the scraping of a fiddle and the shuffling of feet. But here are all these things in the lane, and here are all these things in the alley. And I have nothing else in my mind but a wall, a dark doorway, a flight of stairs, and a room."

He tried a new direction, but made nothing of it; walls, dark doorways, flights of stairs and rooms, were too abundant. And, like most people so puzzled, he again and again described a circle, and found himself at the point from which he had begun. "This is like what I have read in narratives of escape from prison," said he, "where the little track of the fugitives in the night always seems to take the shape of the great round world, on which they wander; as if it were a secret law."

Here he ceased to be the oakum-headed, oakum-whiskered man on whom Miss Pleasant Riderhood had looked, and, allowing for his being still wrapped in a nautical over-coat, became as like that same lost wanted Mr. Julius Handford as never man was like another in this world. In the breast of the coat he stowed the bristling hair and whisker, in a moment, as the favoring wind went with him down a solitary place that it had swept clear of passengers. Yet in that same moment he was the Secretary also, Mr. Boffin's Secretary. For John Rokesmith, too, was as like that same lost wanted Mr. Julius Handford as never man was like another in this world.

"I have no clew to the scene of my death," said he. "Not that it matters now. But having risked discovery by venturing here at all, I should have been glad to track some part of the way." With which singular words he abandoned his search, came up out of Limehouse Hole, and took the way past Limehouse Church. At the great iron gate of the church-yard he stopped and looked in. He looked up at the high tower spectrally resisting the wind, and he looked round at the white tombstones, like enough to the dead in their winding-sheets, and he counted the nine tolls of the clock-bell.

"It is a sensation not experienced by many mortals," said he, "to be looking into a church-yard on a wild windy night, and to feel that I no more hold a place among the living than these dead do, and even to know that I lie buried somewhere else, as they lie buried here. Nothing uses me to it. A spirit that was once a man could hardly feel stranger or lonelier, going unrecognized among mankind, than I feel.

"But this is the fanciful side of the situation. It has a real side, so difficult that, though I think of it every day, I never thoroughly think it out. Now, let me determine to think it out as I walk home. I know I evade it as many men—perhaps most men—do evade thinking their way through their greatest perplexity. I will try to pin myself to mine. Don't evade it, John Harmon; don't evade it; think it out!

"When I came back to England, attracted to the country with which I had none but most miserable associations, by the accounts of my fine inheritance that found me abroad, I came back, shrinking from my father's money, shrinking from my father's memory, mistrustful of being forced on a mercenary wife, mistrustful of my father's intention in thrusting that marriage on me, mistrustful that I was already growing avaricious, mistrustful that I was slackening in gratitude to the two dear noble honest friends who had made the only sunlight in my childish life or that of my heart-broken sister. I came back, timid, divided in my mind, afraid of myself and every body here, knowing of nothing but wretchedness that my father's wealth had ever brought about. Now, stop, and so far think it out, John Harmon. Is that so? That is exactly so.

"On board serving as third mate was George Radfoot. I knew nothing of him. His name first became known to me about a week before we sailed through my being accosted by one of the ship-agent's clerks as 'Mr. Radfoot.' It was one day when I had gone aboard to look to my preparations, and the clerk, coming behind me as I stood on deck, tapped me on the shoulder and said, 'Mr. Radfoot, look here,' referring to some papers that he had in his hand. And my name first became known to Radfoot, through another clerk within a day or two, and while the ship was yet in port, coming up behind him, tapping him on the shoulder and beginning, 'I beg your pardon, Mr. Harmon—' I believe we were alike in bulk and stature but not otherwise, and that we were not strikingly alike, even in those respects, when we were together and could be compared.

"However, a sociable word or two on these mistakes became an easy introduction between us, and the weather was hot, and he helped me to a cool cabin on deck along-side his own, and his first school had been at Brussels as mine had been, and he had learned French as I had learned it, and he had a little history of himself to relate—God only knows how much of it true, and how much of it false—that had its likeness to mine. I had been a seaman too. So we got to be confidential together, and the more easily yet, because he and every one on board had known by general rumor what I was making the voyage to England for. By such degrees and means he came to the knowledge of my uneasiness of mind, and of its setting at that time in the direction of desiring to see and form some judgment of my allotted wife, before she could possibly know me for myself; also to try Mrs. Boffin and give her a glad surprise. So the plot was made out of our getting common sailors' dresses (as he was able to guide me about London), and throwing ourselves in Bella Wilfer's neighborhood, and trying to put ourselves in her way, and doing whatever chance might favor on the spot, and seeing what came of it. If nothing came of it I should be no worse off, and there would merely be a short delay in my presenting myself to Lightwood. I have all these facts right? Yes. They are all accurately right.

"His advantage in all this was, that for a time I was to be lost. It might be for a day or for two days, but I must be lost sight of on landing, or there would be recognition, anticipation, and failure. Therefore, I disembarked with my valise in my hand—as Potterson the steward and Mr. Jacob Kibble my fellow-passenger afterward remembered—and waited for him in the dark by that very Limehouse Church which is now behind me.

"As I had always shunned the port of London, I only knew the church through his pointing out its spire from on board. Perhaps I might recall, if it were any good to try, the way by which I went to it alone from the river; but how we two went from it to Riderhood's shop I don't know—any more than I know what turns we took and doubles we made after we left it. The way was purposely confused no doubt.

"But let me go on thinking the facts out, and avoid confusing them with my speculations. Whether he took me by a straight way or a crooked way what is that to the purpose now? Steady, John Harmon.

"When we stopped at Riderhood's, and he asked that scoundrel a question or two, purporting to refer only to the lodging-houses in which there was accommodation for us had I the least suspicion of him? None. Certainly none until afterward when I held the clew. I think he must have got from Riderhood in a paper the drug, or whatever it was, that afterward stupefied me, but I am far from sure. All I felt safe in charging on him to-night was old companionship in villainy between them. Their undisguised intimacy, and the character I now know Riderhood to bear, made that not at all adventurous. But I am not clear about the drug. Thinking out the circumstances on which I found my suspicion, they are only two. One: I remember his changing a small folded paper from one pocket to another after we came out, which he had not touched before. Two: I now know Riderhood to have been previously taken up for being concerned in the robbery of an unlucky seaman, to whom some such poison had been given.

"It is my conviction that we can not have gone a mile from that shop before we came to the wall, the dark doorway, the flight of stairs, and the room. The night was particularly dark, and it rained hard. As I think the circumstances back I hear the rain splashing on the stone pavement of the passage, which was not under cover. The room overlooked the river, or a dock, or a creek, and the tide was out. Being possessed of the time down to that point, I know by the hour that it must have been about low water; but while the coffee was getting ready I drew back the curtain (a dark-brown curtain), and, looking out, knew by the kind of reflection below, of the few neighboring lights, that they were reflected in tidal mud.

"He had carried under his arm a canvas bag, containing a suit of his clothes. I had no change of under-clothes with me, as I was to buy slops. 'You are very wet, Mr. Harmon'—I can hear him saying—'and I am quite dry under this good water-proof coat. Put on these clothes of mine. You may find on trying them that they will answer your purpose to-morrow, as well as the slops you mean to buy, or better. While you change, I'll hurry the hot coffee.' When he came back I had his clothes on, and there was a black man with him, wearing a linen jacket, like a steward, who put the smoking coffee on the table in a tray and never looked at me. I am so far literal and exact? Literal and exact, I am certain.

"Now I pass to sick and deranged impressions; they are so strong, that I rely upon them; but there are spaces between them that I know nothing about, and they are not pervaded by any idea of time.

"I had drank some coffee, when to my sense of sight he began to swell immensely, and something urged me to rush at him. We had a struggle near the door. He got from me, through my not knowing where to strike, in the whirling round of the room, and the flashing of flames of fire between us. I dropped down. Lying helpless on the ground, I was turned over by a foot. I was dragged by the neck into a corner. I heard men speak together. I was turned over by other feet. I saw a figure like myself lying dressed in my clothes on a bed. What might have been, for any thing I knew, a silence of days, weeks, months, years, was broken by a violent wrestling of men all over the room. The figure like myself was assailed, and my valise was in its hand. I was trodden upon and fallen over. I heard a noise of blows, and thought it was a wood-cutter cutting down a tree. I could not have said that my name was John Harmon—I could not have thought it—I didn't know it—but when I heard the blows, I thought of the wood-cutter and his axe, and had some dead idea that I was lying in a forest.

"This is still correct? Still correct, with the exception that I can not possibly express it to myself without using the word I. But it was not I. There was no such thing as I, within my knowledge.

"It was only after a downward slide through something like a tube, and then a great noise and a sparkling and crackling as of fires, that the consciousness came upon me, 'This is John Harmon drowning! John Harmon, struggle for your life. John Harmon, call on Heaven and save yourself!' I think I cried it out aloud in a great agony, and then a heavy horrid unintelligible something vanished, and it was I who was struggling there alone in the water.

"I was very weak and faint, frightfully oppressed with drowsiness, and driving fast with the tide. Looking over the black water, I saw the lights racing past me on the two banks of the river, as if they were eager to be gone and leave me dying in the dark. The tide was running down, but I knew nothing of up or down then. When, guiding myself safely with Heaven's assistance before the fierce set of the water, I at last caught at a boat moored, one of a tier of boats at a causeway, I was sucked under her, and came up, only just alive, on the other side.

"Was I long in the water? Long enough to be chilled to the heart, but I don't know how long. Yet the cold was merciful, for it was the cold night air and the rain that restored me from a swoon on the stones of the causeway. They naturally supposed me to have toppled in, drunk, when I crept to the public house it belonged to; for I had no notion where I was, and could not articulate—through the poison that had made me insensible having affected my speech—and I supposed the night to be the previous night, as it was still dark and raining. But I had lost twenty-four hours.

"I have checked the calculation often, and it must have been two nights that I lay recovering in that public house. Let me see. Yes. I am sure it was while I lay in that bed there, that the thought entered my head of turning the danger I had passed through to the account of being for some time supposed to have disappeared mysteriously, and of proving Bella. The dread of our being forced on one another, and perpetuating the fate that seemed to have fallen on my father's riches—the fate that they should lead to nothing but evil—was strong upon the moral timidity that dates from my childhood with my poor sister.

"As to this hour I can not understand that side of the river where I recovered the shore, being the opposite side to that on which I was ensnared, I shall never understand it now. Even at this moment, while I leave the river behind me, going home, I can not conceive that it rolls between me and that spot, or that the sea is where it is. But this is not thinking it out; this is making a leap to the present time.

"I could not have done it, but for the fortune in the water-proof belt round my body. Not a great fortune, forty and odd pounds, for the inheritor of a hundred and odd thousand! But it was enough. Without it I must have disclosed myself. Without it I could never have gone to the Exchequer Coffee-house, or taken Mrs. Wilfer's lodgings.

"Some twelve days I lived at that hotel, before the night when I saw the corpse of Radfoot at the Police Station. The inexpressible mental horror that I labored under, as one of the consequences of the poison, makes the interval seem greatly longer, but I know it can not have been longer. That suffering has gradually weakened and weakened since, and has only come upon me by starts, and I hope I am free from it now; but even now, I have sometimes to think, constrain myself, and stop before speaking, or I could not say the words I want to say.

"Again I ramble away from thinking it out to the end. It is not so far to the end that I need be tempted to break off. Now, on straight!

"I examined the newspapers every day for tidings that I was missing, but saw none. Going out that night to walk (for I kept retired while it was light), I found a crowd assembled round a placard posted at Whitehall. It described myself, John Harmon, as found dead and mutilated in the river under circumstances of strong suspicion, described my dress, described the papers in my pockets, and stated where I was lying for recognition. In a wild incautious way I hurried there, and there—with the horror of the death I had escaped, before my eyes in its most appalling shape, added to the inconceivable horror tormenting me at that time when the poisonous stuff was strongest on me—I perceived that Radfoot had been murdered by some unknown hands for the money for which he would have murdered me, and that probably we had both been shot into the river from the same dark place into the same dark tide, when the stream ran deep and strong.

"That night I almost gave up my mystery, though I suspected no one, could offer no information, knew absolutely nothing save that the murdered man was not I, but Radfoot. Next day while I hesitated, and next day while I hesitated, it seemed as if the whole country were determined to have me dead. The Inquest declared me dead, the Government proclaimed me dead; I could not listen at my fireside for five minutes to the outer noises but it was borne into my ears that I was dead.

"So John Harmon died, and Julius Handford disappeared, and John Rokesmith was born. John Rokesmith's intent to-night has been to repair a wrong that he could never have imagined possible, coming to his ears through the Lightwood talk related to him, and which he is bound by every consideration to remedy. In that intent John Rokesmith will persevere, as his duty is.

"Now, is it all thought out? All to this time? Nothing omitted? No, nothing. But beyond this time? To think it out through the future is a harder though a much shorter task than to think it out through the past. John Harmon is dead. Should John Harmon come to life?

"If yes, why? If no, why?"

"Take yes, first. To enlighten human Justice concerning the offense of one far beyond it who may have a living mother. To enlighten it with the lights of a stone passage, a flight of stairs, a brown window-curtain, and a black man. To come into possession of my father's money, and with it sordidly to buy a beautiful creature whom I love—I can not help it; reason has nothing to do with it; I love her against reason—but who would as soon love me for my own sake as she would love the beggar at the corner. What a use for the money, and how worthy of its old misuses!

"Now, take no. The reasons why John Harmon should not come to life. Because he has passively allowed these dear old faithful friends to pass into possession of the property. Because he sees them happy with it, making a good use of it, effacing the old rust and tarnish on the money. Because they have virtually adopted Bella, and will provide for her. Because there is affection enough in her nature, and warmth enough in her heart, to develop into something enduringly good, under favorable conditions. Because her faults have been intensified by her place in my father's will, and she is already growing better. Because her marriage with John Harmon, after what I have heard from her own lips, would be a shocking mockery, of which both she and I must always be conscious, and which would degrade her in her mind, and me in mine, and each of us in the other's. Because if John Harmon comes to life and does not marry her, the property falls into the very hands that hold it now.

"What would I have? Dead, I have found the true friends of my lifetime still as true as tender, and as faithful as when I was alive, and making my memory an incentive to good actions done in my name. Dead, I have found them when they might have slighted my name, and passed greedily over my grave to ease and wealth, lingering by the way, like single-hearted children, to recall their love for me when I was a poor frightened child. Dead, I have heard from the woman who would have been my wife if I had lived the revolting truth that I should have purchased her, caring nothing for me, as a Sultan buys a slave.

"What would I have? If the dead could know, or do know, how the living use them, who among the hosts of dead has found a more disinterested fidelity on earth than I? Is not that enough for me? If I had come back, these noble creatures would have welcomed me, wept over me, given up every thing to me with joy. I did not come back, and they have passed unspoiled into my place. Let them rest in it, and let Bella rest in hers.

"What course for me then? This. To live the same quiet Secretary life, carefully avoiding chances of recognition, until they shall have become more accustomed to their altered state, and until the great swarm of swindlers under many names shall have found newer prey. By that time, the method I am establishing through all the affairs, and with which I will every day take new pains to make them both familiar, will be, I may hope, a machine in such working order as that they can keep it going. I know I need but ask of their generosity to have. When the right time comes, I will ask no more than will replace me in my former path of life, and John Rokesmith shall tread it as contentedly as he may. But John Harmon shall come back no more.

"That I may never, in the days to come afar off, have any weak misgiving that Bella might, in any contingency, have taken me for my own sake if I had plainly asked her, I will plainly ask her; proving beyond all question what I already know too well. And now it is all thought out, from the beginning to the end, and my mind is easier."

So deeply engaged had the living-dead man been, in thus communing with himself, that he had regarded neither the wind nor the way, and had resisted the former as instinctively as he had pursued the latter. But being now come into the City, where there was a coach-stand, he stood irresolute whether to go to his lodgings, or to go first to Mr. Boffin's house. He decided to go round by the house, arguing, as he carried his over-coat upon his arm, that it was less likely to attract notice if left there than if taken to Holloway: both Mrs. Wilfer and Miss Lavinia being ravenously curious touching every article of which the lodger stood possessed.

Arriving at the house, he found that Mr. and Mrs. Boffin were out, but that Miss Wilfer was in the drawing-room. Miss Wilfer had remained at home, in consequence of not feeling very well, and had inquired in the evening if Mr. Rokesmith were in his room.

"Make my compliments to Miss Wilfer, and say I am here now."

Miss Wilfer's compliments came down in return, and, if it were not too much trouble, would Mr. Rokesmith be so kind as to come up before he went?

It was not too much trouble, and Mr. Rokesmith came up.

Oh she looked very pretty, she looked very, very pretty! If the father of the late John Harmon had but left his money unconditionally to his son, and if his son had but lighted on this lovable girl for himself, and had the happiness to make her loving as well as lovable!

"Dear me! Are you not well, Mr. Rokesmith?"

"Yes, quite well. I was sorry to hear, when I came in, that you were not."

"A mere nothing. I had a headache—gone now—and was not quite fit for a hot theatre, so I staid at home. I asked you if you were not well, because you look so white."

"Do I? I have had a busy evening."

She was on a low ottoman before the fire, with a little shining jewel of a table, and her book and her work, beside her. Ah! what a different life the late John Harmon's, if it had been his happy privilege to take his place upon that ottoman, and draw his arm about that waist, and say, "I hope the time has been long without me? What a Home Goddess you look, my darling!"

But the present John Rokesmith, far removed from the late John Harmon, remained standing at a distance. A little distance in respect of space, but a great distance in respect of separation.

"Mr. Rokesmith," said Bella, taking up her work, and inspecting it all round the corners, "I wanted to say something to you when I could have the opportunity, as an explanation why I was rude to you the other day. You have no right to think ill of me, Sir."

The sharp little way in which she darted a look at him, half sensitively injured, and half pettishly, would have been very much admired by the late John Harmon.

"You don't know how well I think of you, Miss Wilfer."

"Truly you must have a very high opinion of me, Mr. Rokesmith, when you believe that in prosperity I neglect and forget my old home."

"Do I believe so?"

"You did, Sir, at any rate," returned Bella.

"I took the liberty of reminding you of a little omission into which you had fallen—insensibly and naturally fallen. It was no more than that."

"And I beg leave to ask you, Mr. Rokesmith," said Bella, "why you took that liberty?—I hope there is no offense in the phrase; it is your own, remember."

"Because I am truly, deeply, profoundly interested in you, Miss Wilfer. Because I wish to see you always at your best. Because I—shall I go on?"

"No, Sir," returned Bella, with a burning face, "you have said more than enough. I beg that you will not go on. If you have any generosity, any honor, you will say no more."

The late John Harmon, looking at the proud face with the downcast eyes, and at the quick breathing as it stirred the fall of bright brown hair over the beautiful neck, would probably have remained silent.

"I wish to speak to you, Sir," said Bella, "once for all, and I don't know how to do it. I have sat here all this evening, wishing to speak to you, and determining to speak to you, and feeling that I must. I beg for a moment's time."

He remained silent, and she remained with her face averted, sometimes making a slight movement as if she would turn and speak. At length she did so.

"You know how I am situated here, Sir, and you know how I am situated at home. I must speak to you for myself, since there is no one about me whom I could ask to do so. It is not generous in you, it is not honorable in you, to conduct yourself toward me as you do."

"Is it ungenerous or dishonorable to be devoted to you; fascinated by you?"

"Preposterous!" said Bella.

The late John Harmon might have thought it rather a contemptuous and lofty word of repudiation.

"I now feel obliged to go on," pursued the Secretary, "though it were only in self-explanation and self-defense. I hope, Miss Wilfer, that it is not unpardonable—even in me—to make an honest declaration of an honest devotion to you."

"An honest declaration!" repeated Bella, with emphasis.

"Is it otherwise?"

"I must request, Sir," said Bella, taking refuge in a touch of timely resentment, "that I may not be questioned. You must excuse me if I decline to be cross-examined."

"Oh, Miss Wilfer, this is hardly charitable. I ask you nothing but what your own emphasis suggests. However, I waive even that question. But what I have declared I take my stand by. I can not recall the avowal of my earnest and deep attachment to you, and I do not recall it."

"I reject it, Sir," said Bella.

"I should be blind and deaf if I were not prepared for the reply. Forgive my offense, for it carries its punishment with it."

"What punishment?" asked Bella.

"Is my present endurance none? But excuse me; I did not mean to cross-examine you again."

"You take advantage of a hasty word of mine," said Bella, with a little sting of self-reproach, "to make me seem—I don't know what. I spoke without consideration when I used it. If that was bad, I am sorry; but you repeat it after consideration, and that seems to me to be at least no better. For the rest, I beg it may be understood, Mr. Rokesmith, that there is an end of this between us, now and forever."

"Now and forever," he repeated.

"Yes. I appeal to you, Sir," proceeded Bella with increasing spirit, "not to pursue me. I appeal to you not to take advantage of your position in this house to make my position in it distressing and disagreeable. I appeal to you to discontinue your habit of making your misplaced attentions as plain to Mrs. Boffin as to me."

"Have I done so?"

"I should think you have," replied Bella. "In any case it is not your fault if you have not, Mr. Rokesmith."

"I hope you are wrong in that impression. I should be very sorry to have justified it. I think I have not. For the future there is no apprehension. It is all over."

"I am much relieved to hear it," said Bella. "I have far other views in life, and why should you waste your own?"

"Mine," said the Secretary. "My life!"

His curious tone caused Bella to glance at the curious smile with which he said it. It was gone as he glanced back. "Pardon me, Miss Wilfer," he proceeded, when their eyes met; "you have used some hard words, for which I do not doubt you have a justification in your mind that I do not understand. Ungenerous and dishonorable! In what?"

"I would rather not be asked," said Bella, haughtily looking down.

"I would rather not ask, but the question is imposed upon me. Kindly explain; or if not kindly, justly."

"Oh, Sir!" said Bella, raising her eyes to his, after a little struggle to forbear, "is it generous and honorable to use the power here which your favor with Mr. and Mrs. Boffin and your ability in your place give you against me?"

"Against you?"

"Is it generous and honorable to form a plan for gradually bringing their influence to bear upon a suit which I have shown you that I do not like, and which I tell you that I utterly reject?"

The late John Harmon could have borne a good deal, but he would have been cut to the heart by such a suspicion as this.

"Would it be generous and honorable to step into your place—if you did so, for I don't know that you did, and I hope you did not—anticipating, or knowing beforehand, that I should come here, and designing to take me at this disadvantage?"

"This mean and cruel disadvantage," said the Secretary.

"Yes," assented Bella.

The Secretary kept silence for a little while; then merely said, "You are wholly mistaken, Miss Wilfer; wonderfully mistaken. I can not say, however, that it is your fault. If I deserve better things of you, you do not know it."

"At least, Sir," retorted Bella, with her old indignation rising, "you know the history of my being here at all. I have heard Mr. Boffin say that you are master of every line and word of that will, as you are master of all his affairs. And was it not enough that I should have been willed away, like a horse, or a dog, or a bird; but must you too begin to dispose of me in your mind, and speculate in me, as soon as I had ceased to be the talk and the laugh of the town? Am I forever to be made the property of strangers?"

"Believe me," returned the Secretary, "you are wonderfully mistaken."

"I should be glad to know it," answered Bella.

"I doubt if you ever will. Good-night. Of course I shall be careful to conceal any traces of this interview from Mr. and Mrs. Boffin, as long as I remain here. Trust me, what you have complained of is at an end forever."

"I am glad I have spoken, then, Mr. Rokesmith. It has been painful and difficult, but it is done. If I have hurt you, I hope you will forgive me. I am inexperienced and impetuous, and I have been a little spoiled; but I really am not so bad as I dare say I appear, or as you think me."

He quitted the room when Bella had said this, relenting in her willful inconsistent way. Left alone, she threw herself back on her ottoman, and said, "I didn't know the lovely woman was such a Dragon!" Then she got up and looked in the glass, and said to her image, "You have been positively swelling your features, you little fool!" Then she took an impatient walk to the other end of the room and back, and said, "I wish Pa was here to have a talk about an avaricious marriage; but he is better away, poor dear, for I know I should pull his hair if he was here." And then she threw her work away, and threw her book after it, and sat down and hummed a tune, and hummed it out of tune, and quarreled with it.

And John Rokesmith, what did he?

He went down to his room, and buried John Harmon many additional fathoms deep. He took his hat and walked out, and, as he went to Holloway or any where else—not at all minding where—heaped mounds upon mounds of earth over John Harmon's grave. His walking did not bring him home until the dawn of day. And so busy had he been all night, piling and piling weights upon weights of earth above John Harmon's grave, that by that time John Harmon lay buried under a whole Alpine range; and still the Sexton Rokesmith accumulated mountains over him, lightening his labor with the dirge, "Cover him, crush him, keep him down!"

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN ENGLISH SNOB.

SOME years ago there came to this country the Honorable Grantley F. Berkeley. He was accompanied by a considerable pack of hunting dogs and a number of rifles. He quarreled with every body, had several bouts at fist-icuffs, was once put out of a railroad car for incivility and refusal to obey the rules of the road; went out West and tried, with but indifferent success, to kill buffaloes; returned to England full of hatred for the Yankees, and wrote a book in which he detailed his griefs, and expressed the opinion that America was not a country for a gentleman to live in. In short, the Honorable Grantley F. Berkeley proved himself a snob of the first water, and, according to the general opinion of our Western hunters, but a poor shot.

This person has just favored the world with his autobiography. The world ought to be grateful; and as the book is too dull to incur the danger of reprint on this side of the water we propose to give, in a few pages, to the reading world of America, some notion of the boon which Mr. Berkeley has conferred upon his race. Such a flower as he ought not to blush unseen.

In the first place, of course, Mr. Berkeley informs his readers that he comes of a very ancient and powerful family. It requires the successive efforts of a great many "progenitors" to produce such a marvel as this Honorable. In the very first chapter we read of "the Berkeley influence," "the witch of Berkeley," "the customs of the Berkeleys—their duties and privileges," "value of the Berkeley estates," "strength and antiquity of the Castle," and, finally, of the practice of "Lynch law" by the Berkeleys. It might be expected that they would leave this practice to the "dirty Yankees;" but great men have their weaknesses—as a French writer once remarked, "most men are mortal." Not only this, but in this very first chapter we are introduced to a Prince of Wales and to several dukes. This is only a foretaste of what is to follow, however. The book is full of the best company; titles gleam on every page; and if what Mr. Berkeley has to tell of his friends the princes, royal dukes, earls, counts, barons, and other high and mighty "nobility and gentry" is of the dullest, and often not of the most decent, that is perhaps because these personages were in truth neither brilliant nor decorous.

The book opens with "Mary Oldacre, my nurse," and the remarkable incident that she handed him, one day, "the keys of the Shrubbery Gate of the Castle." "It is impossible," he tells us, "to express the affection with which, at this age and long subsequently, I regarded this most faithful and attached servant." Turning over the page, we are informed farther that she and her husband now "share the sleep of eternal peace," whatever that may mean; and our author adds, "I do not remember what is their epitaph." Much as he loved them, he evidently did not trouble himself about a gravestone for them.

The Honorable Mr. Berkeley tells us that his mother was the daughter of a petty tradesman, and for many years his father's mistress. Her sister Susan was also, at one time, "living under the protection of a man able to maintain her." He adds: "There is reason to believe that she, in addition, received a considerable sum of money from Lord Berkeley (the writer's father), for placing her sister in his hands." One of Mr. Berkeley's earliest recollections, he tells us, is of an attempt at something very like forgery, practiced under his father's roof, by "the heads of the family." An "extraordinary instrument, made to hold two pens, connected, but at some distance from each other, by a brass rod," was used in these attempts; "one was dry, the other the operators charged with ink; and then, holding the dry one in their hands, passed it carefully over some signatures or writing, on an old paper or parchment, anxiously observing if the marks made by the inked pen corresponded with those they traced with the dry one."

The father practiced summary Lynch law upon his estates. Riding along a public path one day he met "a fellow" carrying what the lord suspected, for some reason, to be a well-filled game-bag. Whereupon he coolly perpetrated this brutality: "He slipped his right foot back out of the stirrup, and kept it in readiness on the flank of his horse; then, manœuvring to make the man pass on that side, he launched the toe of his heavy boot against the pit of the man's stomach with such force that the latter [the man, not his stomach, Mr. Berkeley means] went down like a shot." Then he searched his victim's bag, and "was extremely disappointed to find in it nothing but rabbits."

"The Prince of Wales and his royal brothers" were frequent visitors to the Castle, where they amused themselves by making sport of the other visitors. One "Jeremiah Hawkins, Esq., of the Haws," a Gloucestershire Squire, was among these, and the Duke of Clarence thus "drew him out:"

"Well, my good friend," the Duke said, after dinner, "do you ever wear breeches and top-boots?"

"Please your Greece," replied Jerry, "I seldom wears only thing else."

"I hear you are not afraid of water," continued the sportive "Royal Highness;" "do you ever wash your feet?"

"Sometimes in summer, please your Greece, when it's hot!" was Squire Hawkins's honest reply.

When Mr. Berkeley's father died there was a quarrel about the succession between two of the brothers, which was carried to the House of Peers, and in the course of it the history of "Miss Tudor"—the name by which the mother of these hopefuls was known during a part of her life at the Castle—was pretty thoroughly published. It was decided that she was not legally married to Lord Berkeley till after her fourth son was born. Of one of his brothers, Colonel Berkeley, he says that he has no virtues and all the vices. He preferred the most disreputable society, and traveled the country as an amateur actor. Some of the other brothers appear to have been no better than this one. Mr. Berkeley relates that after his mother's death, when his sister, Lady Mary Berkeley, desired to live in "the old house in Spring Gardens," she was driven out of it, because her brother, Colonel Berkeley, insisted on bringing his mistress to the house.

Young Berkeley was early taught boxing by his elder brothers, who thought it fine sport to make him fight the stable-boys or to pick a quarrel with street boys or men. His brother Moreton, when at college, instead of studying, kept a pack of hounds, and in spring kept a gun in his room, and with small charges "dropped the old rooks on the heads of contemplative Dons, as they walked unsuspectingly beneath the trees of Corpus." Boxing, horse-racing, and hunting were held in greater honor among the young Berkeleys than books or study; and of schooling the writer of this book appears to have received but a moderate quantity. He became an officer in "the Guards" when he was scarcely more than a boy; and appears, from his own accounts, to have passed the remainder of his life either in Parliament—where, as he mentions with great pride, he on all occasions voted as his brother desired him to—and in the hunting field, where he became a doughty hunter of foxes, and a ready promoter of quarrels among his fellow-hunters. The two volumes of his autobiography contain here and there a few traits of English life which possess a little interest.

Mr. Berkeley relates that the Duke of St. Alban's, on going out for a day's shooting, tied his left eye up with a black silk handkerchief, saying, "I hear you have a lot of game, so I am blinding my eye to avoid the trouble of having to shut it so often when I fire." The late Lord Rokeby "went to Greenwich behind a pair of posters," and on returning was upset by the post-boy, who was drunk. The next time he went the same road he noticed that the same post-boy had the horses in charge. "Now mind, my good fellow," said the noble lord, "you had your jollification last time; it's my turn now, so I shall get drunk, and you must keep sober."

Here is a really good story of John and Charles Kemble, who sat one night in the pit of Covent Garden Theatre, listening to a play. Charles Kemble remarked to his brother, in the course of the evening,

"I really think this the very best play for representation Shakspeare ever wrote."

No sooner had he made this remark than a huge, red-headed, broad-shouldered Irishman, who sat immediately behind him, leant forward and tapped him on the shoulder to secure his attention.

"I think, Sir," he observed, with a strong brogue, "ye said it was one Shakspeare what wraught that play. It was not Shakspeare, Sir, but me friend, Linnard M'Nally, what wraught that play."

"Oh, Sir," replied Charles Kemble, coolly, "very well."

A short time after this the Irishman tapped him on the shoulder again.

"Do ye belave, Sir," he demanded, "that it was me friend Linnard M'Nally what wraught that play?"

"Oh yes, certainly, Sir—if you say so," was the peaceable answer.

For a while he remained unmolested, but at last he felt the heavy finger once more upon him.

"Your friend what sits on your left hand," exclaimed the Irishman, "don't look as if he belaved it was me friend Linnard M'Nally what wraught that play!"

This was too much for the brothers; they rose together and left the house, not deeming it either pleasant or safe to stay in such belligerent society. Who the man was they never knew, says Mr. Berkeley; but the friend whom he was so determined to pass off as the greatest dramatic genius of every age and country was an obscure song-writer and playwright. In the former line he deserves remembrance only as the author of "The Lass of Richmond Hill."

The Gunters—celebrated pastry-cooks of London—were fond of fox-hunting.

"That is a fine horse you're on, Mr. Gunter," said Lord Alvanley to one of them one day.

"Yes he is, my lord," replied the pastry-cook; "but he is so hot I can't hold him."

"Why the deuce don't you ice him then?" politely rejoined his lordship.

The same nobleman described a day's sport with Mr. Berkeley's hounds in the neighborhood of town: "The melon and asparagus beds were very heavy—up to our hocks in glass all day; and all Berkeley wanted was a landing-net to get his deer out of the water."

The present Bishop of Oxford, Wilberforce, is called by the wicked "Soapy Sam," and Mr. Berkeley tells the following story of him, which shows that the nickname is not amiss. The Bishop was sitting in a first-class car, where all the seats were full but one in front of him, upon which he had stretched his legs. A gentleman in search of a place asked the bishop if the seat in front of him was occupied, who replied that it was. The gentleman was obliged to accept an uncomfortable seat in a second-class car; but, straying into the first-class during the journey, was disgusted to find the bishop's legs still in possession.

"My lord," he exclaimed, indignantly, "at least I expected the truth from you! You told me the seat was taken."

"I did not, Sir," replied the bishop. "You asked me if the seat was occupied, and with much sincerity I replied in the affirmative."

This was pretty sharp practice for a bishop. The story reminds our author of a retort by Thesiger, the present Lord Chelmsford. Going down St. James's Street, one day, he passed a stranger, who turned, and said, with a look of pleased recognition, "Mr. Birch, I believe?" "If you believe that," replied Thesiger, "you'll believe any thing."

A bosom friend of the Berkeley's, we are told, was Lord William Lennox, a nobleman of somewhat odd habits. When an opera box was lent him, he let it out for money to a stranger; when he was intrusted by Lord Segrave with money to pay for a dinner, he pocketed the sum designed to reward the waiters; when he was presented with a purse of money to bring a certain lady to Berkeley Castle in good style, he sent her down in the coach and kept the money. All this was done simply and only for amusement, we are repeatedly assured; and "in spite of this reckless determination to have his fun, there was no one whom Lord Segrave desired to have about him more than he did William Lennox." Truly there is no accounting for tastes.

Mr. Berkeley tells us that he had a quarrel with Dr. Maginn, the cause being a young lady to whom Maginn was said to have made infamous proposals. In the course of this quarrel, our author relates that he thrashed Mr. Fraser, the publisher of Fraser's Magazine, and fought a duel with Maginn. Mr. Dalrymple, afterward Earl of Stair, is another of the charming people to whom this autobiography introduces us. This nobleman was a glutton, and besides "very fond of low female society." At Crockford's this person once met Mr. Berkeley, and invited him to dine "at eight." "I've ordered such a dinner here to-day, of old Ude!" he said. "There's enough for two; and I'll order something more. Let's dine together." At eight Mr. Berkeley came, but found no dinner. The Earl of Stair had "dined long ago—and deuced good it was," as he explained, picking his teeth by the window. He had eaten a dinner for two.

Our author informs the world that in fox-hunting his brother, Colonel Berkeley, "had a peculiar knack of his own of applying very wild names and rough epithets personally to such people" as did not ride to suit him. "His language," he adds, "though extremely violent and abusive, was not a bit more severe than that of Assheton Smith, Lord Southampton, mine, or Lord Ducie's;" and he relates that Colonel Berkeley once said to the last-named, "Well, I hear you're a greater blackguard, out with your hounds, than I am."

"No, I'm not," replied Ducie; "you beat me; for I never d—d a man's soul by the color of his horse."

Colonel Berkeley, it seems, had "fancifully" addressed himself to an offender's "chestnut soul."

As it is an autobiography from which we have been culling these few stories, it is but right that we should finish with a personal trait of character. Mr. Berkeley relates of himself: "In Hyde Park I very nearly bought at my own price rather a nice horse. It had just bolted with its owner, who could not ride. He was evidently a muff in hand and seat, and the animal went clean over the rails that separated the grass from the gravel, while he fell heavily off without the horse coming down. The latter did not run away, and the rider was unhurt, but as he again took hold of the reins I saw that he regarded his steed with a look of distrust.

"'That, Sir, is a vicious beast,' I exclaimed, 'and not fit to ride in London; if you'll sell him I'll give you twenty pounds, and run all risks from his temper.'

"'Thank you, Sir,' replied the discomfited equestrian, rather confused by his fall; 'I do not think him safe, and I will take—' Here he hesitated, and having reflected for a moment, added, 'No, Sir, I will not take your offer.' So saying, and regarding me at the same time with rather an offended look, as if he fancied I intended to do him, he led his horse away."

This would be counted pretty sharp practice in some countries and in more unsophisticated society than that of London.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 31st of December.—Congress met on the 5th of December. In the Senate Mr. Farwell appeared from Maine in place of Mr. Fessenden, who had resigned to accept the post of Secretary of the Treasury. In the House Mr. Ingersoll took the place of Mr. Lovejoy, from Illinois, deceased; Mr. Knox that of Mr. Frank Blair, from Missouri, resigned; Mr. Townsend that of Mr. Stebbins from New York, resigned. Mr. Poston appeared as delegate from the Territory of Arizona; Mr. Worthington was qualified as member from the new State of Nevada. The only important changes in the standing committees are that in the Senate Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, is chairman of the Committee on Finance, in place of Mr. Fessenden, appointed Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Grimes, of Iowa, was appointed chairman of the Naval Committee in place of Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire. The credentials of five Representatives and two Senators, claiming seats from Louisiana, were presented and referred. The question will come up for consideration whether the election at which they were chosen was a valid one.

Hon. Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio, was nominated by the President, and unanimously confirmed by the Senate, as Chief Justice of the United States, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the late Chief Justice Taney. Mr. Chase was born in New Hampshire, January 13, 1808. He commenced the practice of the law at Cincinnati in 1831. In 1841 he first began to take a prominent part in politics, acting with that portion of the Democratic party opposed to the extension of slavery, and was elected United States Senator in 1849. On the disruption of the parties in 1852, Mr. Chase went over to the newly organized Republican party. In 1855 he was elected Governor of Ohio, and was re-elected in 1857, his second term closing in 1860. In that year he was one of the leading candidates for the Presidency, and had also been again chosen Senator. He resigned this post to accept the office of Secretary of the Treasury in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet; he held this post until June 30, 1864, when he resigned, and was succeeded by Mr. Fessenden. In 1864 he was suggested for the Presidency, but declined to become a candidate, and gave his support to Mr. Lincoln.

The President's Message opens with a brief resumé of our relations with foreign Powers, which are pronounced to be "reasonably satisfactory." No mention, however, is made of our relations with France; the complications with Brazil, growing out of the capture of the Florida, are only briefly alluded to; and in consequence of the outrages on our Canadian frontier, the President recommends that notice shall be given that, after six months, the United States will be at liberty to increase its naval force on the northern lakes. He recommends further legislation to protect immigrants, and encourage emigration to this country. He estimates the production of gold and silver in the mineral region of the Pacific slope at $100,000,000 for the last year.—The movement for the total abolition of slavery is, he says, though short of success, still in the right direction. In Arkansas and Louisiana loyal State Governments, with free Constitutions, have been organized; movements to the same end, though less definite, have been made in Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee; Maryland is secure for freedom. The President recommends the passage by the present Congress of the Act, passed by the Senate at the last session, but which failed to receive the requisite two-thirds vote in the House, submitting to the States an amendment to the Constitution, prohibiting Slavery in the United States. The recent election shows, he says, that this Act will pass the next Congress, and it is merely a question of time when the matter shall be referred to the States. The vote at the late Presidential election is referred to as showing that, in spite of the waste of war, the loyal States have increased in population. A table was furnished showing that in 1860 the States which are now loyal cast 3,870,222 votes. The same States, with the addition of the two new States of Kansas and Nevada, cast, in 1864, 4,015,773 votes; showing, notwithstanding a decrease of nearly 150,000 votes in Kentucky, Missouri, and Maryland, a net increase of 145,751 votes; to which should be added at least 90,000 for the votes of soldiers in States which failed to pass laws enabling soldiers to vote. The table, as made up in the Message, was formed partly from estimates, and contained many inaccuracies; but the general result is nearly correct. To this increased strength of the Union should be also added the augmented population of the Territories, and the numbers of whites and blacks in the insurgent States who join us as our arms press back the enemy.—The President emphatically opposes all attempts at negotiation with the insurgent leader, who has repeatedly declared that he will accept no terms which do not involve the severance of the Union. This does not necessarily apply to his followers. Although he can not accept the Union they can. A year ago pardon and a general amnesty were offered to all except certain specified classes, and it was announced that these classes were within the contemplation of special clemency. The door for return is still open; but, adds the President, "The time may come, and probably will come, when public duty will demand that it be closed, and that in lieu more rigorous measures than heretofore shall be adopted." The Message closes with an emphatic declaration that the President will retract nothing which he has heretofore said in respect to slavery. "While I remain in my present position," he says, "I shall not attempt to retract or modify the Emancipation Proclamation; nor shall I return to slavery any person who is free by the terms of that proclamation, or by any of the Acts of Congress. If the people should, by whatever acts or means, make it an Executive duty to re-enslave such persons, another, and not I, must be their instrument to perform it. In stating a single condition of peace, I mean simply to say that the war will cease on the part of the Government whenever it shall have ceased on the part of those who began it."

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury furnishes an elaborate exposé of the fiscal affairs of the country, and contains many practical suggestions. We can here present only a few of the essential points. The fiscal year closed on the 1st of July, 1864; at which time the entire public debt amounted to $1,740,699,000, the interest upon which is $91,810,000, of which $56,000,000 is payable in coin. If the war continues probably this debt will be increased by $500,000,000 during the present year. The actual receipts and expenditures for the past fiscal year, closing June 30, 1864, were as follows:

RECEIPTS.
From Customs .....	$102,316,152 99
From Lands .....	588,333 29
From Direct Taxes .....	475,648 96
From Internal Revenue .....	109,741,134 10
From Miscellaneous Sources .....	47,511,448 10
From Loans .....	623,443,919 13
Total receipts .....	$884,076,646 77
EXPENDITURES.
War Department .....	$600,791,842 97
Navy Department .....	85,793,292 79
Interest of Public Debt .....	53,685,421 69
Civil Service .....	27,505,599 46
Pensions and Indians .....	7,517,930 97
Total expenditures .....	$865,234,087 86
Balance on hand .....	$18,842,558 91

The two most important items of Miscellaneous sources are premiums on gold and silver, about $18,644,000, and Commutation Money, $12,451,000. The Secretary estimates the actual expenditures of the current fiscal year, ending June 30, 1865, at $895,729,000, and the receipts under existing laws at $382,355,000, leaving to be provided for, $512,374,000. He hopes that Congress will so modify the Internal Revenue law as to produce $50,000,000 additional, which will leave $482,374,000 to be added to the public debt; which will then be, on the 1st of July, 1865, about $2,223,000,000. For the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1866, for which provision must be made this year, he estimates a gross deficiency of about $422,000,000, making the public debt on the 1st of July, 1866, about $2,645,000,000. These estimates are, of course, based upon the supposition that the war continues. The Secretary recommends, among other things, that the Internal Revenue Tax be augmented; that the Income Tax be applied to all incomes, graduated, however, according to their amount; that the mineral domains of the United States be made available either by absolute sale or by renting them; and that there should be no banks of issue except such as are authorized by the national Government.

The Report of the Secretary of the Navy presents a comprehensive survey of the operations of that Department. The following are some of the leading points: We have now in service and under construction 671 vessels carrying 4610 guns, with a tonnage of 510,000, a net increase of 83 vessels, 167 guns, 42,000 tons. There are in the naval service about 51,000 men. During the year 324 vessels have been captured; the whole number during the war being 1379, of which 267 are steamers. The gross proceeds of the sale of prize property is nearly $14,500,000, and a large amount is still under adjudication. The entire expense of the Naval Department from March 4, 1861, to November 1, 1864, has been $288,647,000.

According to the Report of the Postmaster-General the expenditures of the Department, during the year ending June 1, 1864, were $12,644,786 20, the receipts $12,468,253 78, leaving a deficit of $206,652 42; so that, were the franked matter which passes through the mails paid for, the Department would now for the first time be more than self-sustaining.

The Report of the Secretary of War has not been published.

The action of Congress thus far has been mainly confined to the consideration of measures proposed for action. In the Senate, the following are the principal bills introduced, and subjects of inquiry referred to the appropriate committees: That the President inform what proposition of aid for rebels had been received: answered that a request to distribute among rebel prisoners £17,000 collected at a bazar in Liverpool, had been made and refused.—For establishing a home for disabled soldiers and sailors.—For constructing revenue cutters on the lakes.—Thanking Captain Winslow and Lieutenant Cushing.—Petition of General Weitzel and others for increase of pay.—To inquire into the expediency of an Act to increase the revenue by a tax on sales and fares; and to retrench the currency by prohibiting the establishment of additional banks.—Resolutions by Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, for consolidating Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire into one State; Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island into another; Maryland, Delaware, and a part of Virginia into another: and that the President and Vice-President of the United States shall be chosen alternately from the Free and Slave States.—To compel all vessels engaged in foreign trade to take one American boy for each 500 tons.—Authorizing the President to transfer a gun-boat to the Republic of Liberia.—Declaring wives and children of colored soldiers to be free.—Whether an army corps is necessary to defend our Northern frontier.—Whether it is expedient to enroll all male citizens, irrespective of color, in the militia.—Bill passed removing disqualification for carrying the mails by reason of color.—The following bills have passed the House; those which have also passed the Senate being specially noted: Establishing a uniform system of Bankruptcy, to take effect June 1, 1865.—Requesting the President to give notice of the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty with Great Britain.—Providing that any alien of twenty-one who has been honorably discharged from the army or navy may become a citizen without previous declaration.—The Senate bill providing for the construction of six revenue cutters on the lakes.—Dropping from the army roll all generals who have been for three months out of service, except their absence is occasioned by wounds or disability incurred in service, or by being a prisoner or under parole.—The Senate joint resolution thanking Captain Winslow and Lieutenant Cushing.—Resolution declaring the right of Congress to shape the foreign policy of the United States.—The Senate bill creating the rank of Vice-Admiral, of equal grade with the Lieutenant-General in the army, with a pay of $7000 when at sea, $6000 when on shore duty, and $5000 when waiting orders. This bill was immediately signed by the President, who nominated Admiral Farragut for the post, and the nomination was confirmed by the Senate.—In the House the following are the principal bills introduced, and subjects of inquiry referred to the appropriate committees: To prohibit the exportation or sale at a premium of gold and silver; laid on the table.—To exempt from tax the inheritance of widows in their husbands' estates.—What caused the failure of General Banks's Red River expedition?—To prohibit the sale of goods in rebel territory, and to allow the purchase for cash of the products of such territory.—To amend the Constitution so as to apportion representatives to voters.—What justice is due to soldiers held beyond their terms of enlistment?—Shall bounties be discontinued, and the pay of soldiers increased?—To include sailors in the bill naturalizing soldiers.—Shall there be an ad valorem tax on sales?—For dropping unemployed officers from the navy roll.—Shall persons going abroad to escape the draft be denaturalized?—To inquire into the expediency of modifying the pension law.

Our last Record left General Sherman just setting out on his adventurous march through Georgia. The order for the expedition was issued on the 8th of November from Kingston, Georgia, northwest from Atlanta, around which place the army was again concentrated. On the 15th Atlanta was evacuated, the principal buildings having been destroyed, and Sherman's army began its march toward the coast, nearly 200 miles distant in a straight line, and about 300 by the most direct traveled routes. The army marched in two main columns, which, with its detachments, swept a belt of territory about 60 miles wide, comprising a fertile country abounding in supplies. For nearly a month our only intelligence was gained through hostile sources. Milledgeville, the capital of Georgia, was occupied on the 20th by a small detachment, which soon left to rejoin their column, while other detachments threatened Macon and Augusta. The march of the main columns was leisurely, the only opposition encountered being to detached corps. Millen, where the great body of Union prisoners had been for a time confined, was taken on the 2d of December; but the prisoners had been removed. On the 9th Captain Duncan, one of Sherman's scouts, left the army, descended the Ogechee River, and brought to General Foster, at Hilton Head, the first direct tidings from Sherman. On the 12th the whole army was within ten miles of Savannah. On the 13th Fort M'Allister, which commands the approach to Savannah by sea, was taken by storm. On that day Sherman forwarded his first dispatch to the War Department from the deck of a vessel. He wrote: "The army is in most splendid order, and equal to any thing. Our march was most agreeable, and we were not at all molested by guerrillas. We have not lost a wagon on the trip, but have gathered in a large supply of negroes, horses, and mules, and our teams are in far better condition than when we started. I regard Savannah as already gained." General Hardee had been placed in command of Savannah, with about 15,000 men. It had been hoped that these might be captured with the city; but it was found to be impossible to invest the place so closely to prevent their escape, and on the 20th Hardee got off with his army. Savannah was occupied by Sherman on the 21st. On the 22d he wrote to the President: "I beg to present to you as a Christmas gift the city of Savannah, with 150 heavy guns, and plenty of ammunition, and also about 25,000 bales of cotton." General Foster, in his dispatch of the same day, says: "The captures include 800 prisoners, 150 guns, 13 locomotives in good order, 190 cars, a large supply of ammunition and materials of war, 3 steamers, and 33,000 bales of cotton safely stowed in warehouses."

While Sherman was accomplishing his march through Georgia, Hood was operating against Thomas, who fell back in the direction of Nashville. The Confederate cavalry, under Forrest, on the 29th of November, came up with our forces, under Wilson, at Spring Hill, Tennessee, where a brisk though partial action ensued, in which Forrest was repulsed; but our forces kept falling back to Franklin, 18 miles south of Nashville. Here they were attacked, on the 30th, by the entire force of the enemy. A severe battle ensued, the Confederates repeatedly making most desperate charges upon our intrenchments. At one time the day seemed lost; but a vigorous charge restored the fortunes of the day, and the assailants were repulsed with great loss. The loss of the enemy is put down at about 5000 killed and wounded, and 1000 prisoners. Our loss was about 2500. Our forces, however, fell back upon Nashville, and in consequence the Confederates claim a victory at Franklin. Hood followed, and set himself down to besiege Nashville, throwing up lines of investment. On the 15th of December Thomas assumed the offensive against Hood, who held a strong position on the southern approaches to Nashville. Thomas's line was formed with Wilson's cavalry on the right, then A. J. Smith, Wood, and Steedman, Schofield's Corps being in reserve. After an opening fire from the batteries Steedman made a strong demonstration on the enemy's right, the real attack being designed for their centre and left. Wood carried the strong works at the centre. Our batteries then advanced, and Smith assailed the hostile left; Schofield came up on Smith's right, outflanking the enemy, who began to give way. Our right was thus thrown between the river and the Confederate left, which was rolled back on the centre. Wilson's cavalry now pushed forward, and our whole line was advanced in the face of a hot fire. The enemy's works were carried, and he fell back in confusion, leaving his cannon and many prisoners. It was now night, and the action was suspended. It was renewed the next morning, with still more decided success, the enemy being successively driven from his lines of intrenchments, falling back in the direction of Franklin, the scene of the battle of the 30th of November. On the 17th Hood was pressed back beyond Franklin, where he left 2500 wounded. The pursuit was kept up on the 18th, but was partially interrupted by heavy rains on the 19th, Hood continually falling back, losing guns and prisoners. The latest accounts, which come down to December 27, represent that Hood had reached the Tennessee River, which he was endeavoring to cross.—In twenty days Hood's losses, as nearly as can be estimated, were 9000 killed and wounded, and 10,000 prisoners, of whom 2500 were wounded, making a net loss of 16,500 men, and 51 cannon, being about one-third of his entire force, and more than half of his guns. His loss is especially heavy in officers, six generals having been killed, six wounded, and six captured.

Besides these leading operations in the South and West, several minor operations of considerable importance have been undertaken. Toward the close of November General Canby sent expeditions from Baton Rouge and Vicksburg to co-operate with Sherman. That from Vicksburg moved toward Jackson, destroying bridges on the Mississippi Central Railroad, cutting off Hood from a large quantity of supplies which had been accumulated for him at Jackson. The column from Baton Rouge advanced in the direction of Mobile. He had reached Pascagoula on the 14th of December. Three days before, Governor Watts, of Alabama, issued a proclamation calling upon the people of the State to defend Mobile, which was threatened both by land and water.—At Ashbyville, Kentucky, December 17, General M'Cook defeated the Confederate General Lyon, who had invaded the State.—There has been some skirmishing in the Valley of the Shenandoah, but with no very important results.

A very important expedition has just been made in Southwestern Virginia. In this region, near the Tennessee border, are situated the valuable salt-works and lead mines of Saltville and Leadville. One or two expeditions had been sent to destroy these, but without success. Breckinridge, who commanded in this region, defeated Gillem on the 12th of November. Gillem was reinforced, and the command of the whole body, now numbering 6000, was taken by General Stoneman, who organized another expedition, against the salt and lead works, under the immediate command of General Burbridge. This expedition started on the 12th. On the march they successively met and dispersed scattered bodies of the enemy, and succeeded in reaching Saltville on the 20th, which they occupied long enough to effect the thorough destruction of the works. Besides the destruction of the salt and lead works, among the most important in the Confederacy, General Burbridge enumerates among the results of his enterprise the destruction of the bridges on the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad, the seizure of 13 trains of cars with their engines, the capture of 2000 horses, 1000 mules, 24 officers, and 845 men.

The only important operation of the Army of the Potomac during the month is a raid made under the lead of General Warren upon the Weldon Railroad. The expedition comprised Warren's Fifth Corps, Mott's Division of the Second, and Gregg's cavalry. This force set out on the 7th of December, having been previously withdrawn from the lines around Petersburg. In the midst of a driving rain, which continued all day and the next night, Warren moved rapidly to the Nottaway River, which he crossed by means of a pontoon. The next day, leaving a cavalry guard at the crossing, and protected on his flanks by cavalry, he continued his march by Sussex Court House toward Nottaway Bridge. This point was covered by the enemy's cavalry, which was steadily driven back. The bridge was reached at noon and destroyed. It was 200 feet long, and spanned the Nottaway River. The column, now secure against any attack from Petersburg, destroyed the railroad south of the bridge for a distance of eight miles. The track was lifted up, ties and rails together, heaped in piles, and burned. Jarret's dépôt was burned early in the morning of the 9th, and the work of destruction continued thence southward. During the day two bridges—each 60 feet long—were burned, and at night Warren had reached Bellfield Station, near the Meherrin River. Twenty miles of the railroad had been completely destroyed, and no opposition had been encountered. A reconnaissance toward Hicksford on the river having developed the fact that the enemy was strongly posted at that point, with considerable artillery, Warren turned northward on the 10th. On the return the town of Sussex Court House was burned in retaliation for the murder of several of our soldiers by the enemy at that point. A large number of contrabands accompanied the returning column. In estimating the value of this raid it must be remembered that Lee had previously contrived to convey a large amount of supplies to his army by means of the Boydton plank-road, which connected the Southside Railroad with the point where the Weldon had been interrupted. He had also nearly completed a branch railroad from Stony Creek Station to the Southside Road. The portion of the railroad destroyed by Warren is south of Stony Creek Station, and until the road is repaired Lee is entirely cut off from eastern North Carolina, and from the portion of Virginia east of the Weldon Road. The work was done in three days, and it was effected with the loss of less than one hundred men.

On the 13th of December a great naval and military expedition started from Fortress Monroe. The naval portion, under Admiral W. D. Porter, comprised 65 vessels of war, including the Ironsides, and five "Monitors." Besides these there were more than a hundred transports. The military force, under General Butler, with whom was General Weitzel, numbered about 7000. The expedition set out under sealed orders; but it soon transpired that its object was to assail Fort Fisher, at the mouth of Cape Fear River, commanding the approaches to Wilmington, the only considerable port now held by the Confederates, through which for more than a year they have gained the greater part of their supplies from abroad. Large hopes had been entertained from a new experiment in warfare, which was to explode a vessel loaded with powder as nearly as possible under the walls of the fort. The steamer Louisiana was selected for this purpose. The vessels experienced rough weather, but rode it out without any serious accident, the "Monitors" especially "behaving beautifully," though one of them, the Mahopac, sprung a leak. On the 20th the fleet met at the appointed rendezvous, some twenty-five miles at sea from the fort. For two days bad weather prevented any effective operations; but on the 23d the Louisiana, Commander Rhind, was directed to undertake its mission. With more than 200 barrels of powder on board, she was towed within sight of the fort. She had been fitted up so as to resemble a Confederate blockade-runner, and was mistaken for such, and was not fired upon from the fort. She was successfully run near the beach, within 500 yards of the fort. The small crew having set her on fire, escaped by boats. At a quarter before two on the morning of the 24th the explosion took place. Those on the fleet, which lay some miles away, had no means of knowing the amount of damage sustained, only that the shock was far less than had been anticipated. Subsequent information indicates that no serious damage was done to the fort; at all events the explosion of the magazines, which had been hoped for, was not attained. At daylight on the 24th the fleet got under way, formed in line of battle, and proceeded to bombard the fort. The bombardment began about noon. In an hour and a quarter, according to the report of Admiral Porter, the fire of the fort was completely silenced, and two of its magazines had been blown up. A moderate fire was kept up until night, in the hope of attracting the attention of the transports containing the co-operating land-force to the spot. Our casualties this day were occasioned almost entirely by the bursting of six 100-pounder Parrott guns on as many vessels; by these 13 men were killed and 35 wounded. A shell from the fort passed through the boiler of the Mackinaw, badly scalding ten or twelve persons. The Osceola was also struck by a shell near the magazine, and for a short time was in a sinking condition; but the leak was finally stopped. The bombardment was suspended by the approach of night. The next morning, the transports having arrived, a plan of attack was arranged by Porter and Weitzel. The navy was again to assail the fort, while troops were landed to storm it. About 3000 troops were landed. Some of the outside works were carried, and nearly 300 prisoners taken. Weitzel's skirmishing lines were advanced close to Fort Fisher. A few of the pickets, under fire from the boats, actually scaled the parapet; but, according to the account of General Butler, the work was found by Weitzel too strong to be taken without a regular siege. As soon as darkness caused the naval force to cease, the works were again fully manned. The weather being threatening, and the southwest wind, which had arisen, preventing any further landing through the surf, Butler ordered the troops to re-embark. Seeing, he says, "that nothing further can be done by the land-forces, I shall sail for Hampton Roads as soon as the transport fleet can be got in order." The expedition certainly wholly failed of its object. There is evidently a wide difference of opinion between the naval and military commanders as to the necessity of abandoning the attack. Butler and Weitzel think that the fort was substantially uninjured, as a defensive work, by the naval assault, and that it was too strong, and too strongly manned, to be taken by the force at their command. Porter thinks that the fort was effectually reduced by his attack, and that while yielding to the opinion of Weitzel, it would have proved no very difficult task for the land-force to have taken it. "At all events," he adds, "I can not help thinking that it was worth while to make the attempt, after arriving so far."

The case of the St. Albans raiders finally came up before Justice Coursal, of Montreal, on the 13th of December. The Justice decided that by the law the warrant under which the prisoners were arrested should be signed by the Governor-General; this not being the case, he had no jurisdiction in the matter, and should discharge the prisoners. They were accordingly set at liberty, and the money which they had seized from the St. Albans banks was given to them. The liberated prisoners at once made off in different directions. This decision caused intense feeling in the United States. General Dix, who commands the Northern Department, issued an order directing military commanders on the frontier to shoot down marauders, and, if necessary, to pursue them into Canada. The latter clause of the order was countermanded by the President, probably on information that the action of Judge Coursal was disapproved by the Canadian authorities. The Governor-General of Canada ordered the re-arrest of the raiders, and several of them, including Young, the leader, have been apprehended, and are again in custody. Meanwhile an official order was given by our Government, directing that, except in case of immigrants directly entering an American port by sea, no traveler should be allowed to enter the United States from a foreign country without a passport, properly signed. This direction was designed to apply especially to persons coming from the British provinces.

On the night of the 25th of November an attempt was made to burn the city of New York. Fires were kindled in several of the large hotels, which adjoin the principal theatres. These attempts were made by persons who took lodgings in the hotels, the fires being kindled by means of a mixture of phosphorus and oil. The actual damage done was very slight. It is believed that the attempt was made by emissaries of the Confederate Government, and in consequence an order was issued that all persons from the insurgent States, residing in New York, should report themselves for registry, upon pain, in case of neglect, of being treated as spies. The result of this order was to show that the wives and families of several distinguished Confederate leaders were residing in New York.

The Confederate cruiser Florida, captured by the Wachusett, was, while lying at anchor in Hampton Roads, run into on the 19th of November, by the army transport Alliance, and sunk in nine fathoms' water. The Brazilian Government has officially represented that the capture of the Florida in Brazilian waters was a gross outrage upon neutral rights, and demanded apology and reparation. The Secretary of State replied that jealousy of foreign intervention was a cardinal principle in the policy of the United States. The President, therefore, disavowed and regretted the proceedings in the harbor of Bahia; would suspend Captain Collins, and direct him to appear before a court-martial. The Consul at Bahia, having admitted that he had advised and incited the captain, would also be dismissed; the flag of Brazil would receive from the United States navy the honor customary in the intercourse of friendly maritime powers. The crew of the Florida would also be set at liberty, to seek a refuge wherever they could find it, with the hazard of recapture when beyond the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States. The Secretary adds, that the Government does not give credit to the charges of falsehood, treachery, and deception brought against the captain and consul; and also protests against the recognition by the Brazilian Government of the Confederates as belligerents, as being an act of intervention derogatory of the law of nations, unfriendly and injurious to the United States; but he says it does not belong to the naval or military officers of the United States, nor to consuls, to choose the time and manner of asserting the rights and of redressing the wrongs of the United States.

The steamship North America left New Orleans Dec. 16, with a crew of 44, and 215 passengers, most of whom were sick soldiers. On the night of the 22d the vessel sunk at sea. Of those on board 197 were lost, and only 67 saved.

On the 20th of December the President issued a proclamation calling for 300,000 volunteers for one, two, or three years. If this call is not previously filled, a draft will be ordered on the 15th of February to meet the deficiency.

Hon. William L. Dayton, the American Minister to France, died suddenly of apoplexy on the 1st of December, at Paris, at the age of 57 years. In 1856 he was the Republican nominee for Vice-President, Mr. Frémont being the candidate for the Presidency. They were defeated by Buchanan and Breckinridge, who received 174 electoral votes, Frémont and Dayton having 114, and 8 being cast for Fillmore and Donelson.—Hon. George M. Dallas, Vice-President of the United States from 1844 to 1848, and Minister to England from 1856 to 1860, died suddenly at Philadelphia on the 31st of December, aged 74 years.

Editor's Easy Chair.

THE Easy Chair again reminds its readers that it is not the editor of this Magazine, and therefore shafts like the following, delicately tipped with sarcasm, do not quiver in its sides:

"The author of MS. No. — presents her thanks to the editor of Harper's Magazine for his courteous rejection of it. She has no wish to reclaim it; but hopes, since he can find no place for it, he will oblige her by lighting with its leaves an occasional cigar for the solace of the Easy Chair."

The gentle author of manuscript Number blank is hereby informed that the Easy Chair could not be solaced by the spectacle of such consuming leaves, however courteously rejected—"declined" the wise it call. Every expiring spark, as it died upon the hearth, would bitterly reproach him. "Why did you not save me?" would be the piteous refrain of the departing tale, essay, poem, treatise, description, sketch, jeu d'esprit, or whatever may be the character of manuscript Number blank. No, the Easy Chair is not an ogre. It does not delight in the torture of thumbing; no, Madame, nor of Briareus, to which your own Number blank may more fitly be compared. It will not willingly see them simmer, broil, roast, stew, or boil. It is the door over the way to which you must address your quips and darts. It is to the fearful being who sits behind it, and delights to fatten upon callow manuscripts, that your silver smile of wrath, or sorrow, or plaintive disappointment—or whatever the exact emotion may be—must be directed. An editor, as is well known, is the foe of mankind, and pursues with peculiar animosity the whole tribe of authors. As his life depends upon literature, he naturally hates and despises every writer and aspirant. As he would have no function if manuscripts were not prepared, he shows the most savage hostility to those who prepare them. As he would be a superfluity, and starve to death but for the fecund brains and nimble hands of the great fraternity of letters, it is evident that his sheerest interest, to say nothing of his sympathy and taste and genius, must lead him inevitably to outrage his brethren in every possible way. Merchants, lawyers, carpenters, doctors, masons, it is notorious, if they wish to succeed, always do what they can to alienate the friends upon whose favor and good-will they depend; and editors, of course, do the same. You may ask any gentleman whose little sprightly essay did not, in his pleasant and unexasperated phrase, "please his High Mightiness the Grand Lama who edits that puerile and contemptible," etc., etc., if an editor is not the most despicable of men. You may ask any lady whose touching elegy on a Thanksgiving Turkey was rudely returned, "with many thanks, and without the least expression of opinion upon the intrinsic merits, as hardly suitable just at this moment," whether an editor is not the most unfeeling and brutal of his sex.

No;—please apply at the door opposite. The Easy Chair is not an editor, a headsman, a Jack Ketch, a villain in a mask. He doesn't delight in wringing the necks of poor little pullets of manuscripts, or in dragging great oxen (Juno ox-eyed) down to the fatal ring, or in any other editorial diversions. What goes on in that fatal room he forbears to inquire. Probably it is paved with the white remains of manuscripts—as other good intentions are reported to furnish pavement for another mysterious retreat. Doubtless over the door the demon who inhabits it has written, "Rubbish shot here." It is horrible! Can you not fancy him gnashing his teeth, grinning ghastly grins, beating his head, tearing his hair, exploding in contemptuous laughter, and flinging himself about his den, as he surveys the manuscripts, his victims, and reads them! I can. Sometimes there are awful roarings in his chimney. The Easy Chair shudders, and can only imagine that the editor—the chimera—is feeding his huge black-throated fire-place with the torn and quivering remains of the most comely manuscripts. Ah me! what noxious gas has doubtless escaped at the top of that chimney!

No—by no means. Please not to make the mistake again. The Easy Chair is not the editor. Are you in the habit of confounding a cackling bantam, a timorous barn-door fowl, with the eagle of dreadful talons? It is the modest ambition of the bantam to balance itself for a few moments upon a doubtful perch and feebly essay a transitory crow, and then hop safely down again—not to sweep the heavens and gaze at the sun (namely, read manuscripts Numbers — and — and —), or tear the prey with strenuous claw (namely, commit to combustion manuscripts Numbers — and — and —). These latter be the editorial functions.

The Easy Chair hereby announces that the contributions for the Magazine, which are sent to him, will be delivered unread to the tender mercies which abide behind the opposite door; and he begs his friends to remember that when manuscript No. — is declined, it is the Editor and not the Easy Chair who is to be invited to put it in his pipe and smoke it.

THE Easy Chair lately tried a dangerous experiment. He went to hear the lecturer who first charmed him, and whom he had not heard for many years. Time plays such pranks that we can not be prepared for him. Our impressions are so much in ourselves and our condition that it is hard to determine how much belongs to the seal itself. Upon the young, ardent, flowing, sensitive wax the airiest curve of the bird's wing cut in diamond will perfectly reproduce itself. But the most exquisite device will not impress itself when the mass has grown cold and hard. When Fanny Kemble reappeared after many years of retirement from the stage, with what curious emotion the frequenter of the theatre in her youthful prime must have awaited the rising of the curtain! How painfully acute his observation and memory must have been! In what a limbo of doubt and wonder he must have remained through the performance! And when the curtain fell, and he who had been a youth when he saw her before rose to go home—then what? As he paced the hard London streets, in which he could see no change for many and many a year—as he looked up at the changeless sky, with the same old familiar moon, the same familiar stars, he must needs have pondered the question, "Is it the seal or the wax?"

For Mrs. Kemble did not succeed. She played a few evenings, and again retired. It was easy for the Londoner to say, "What a pity! How she is changed! How her power has failed! Can this be that audacious girl of my youth!" It was easy—but how if he substituted he for she? How if he asked can this—this elderly, grayish-haired gentleman, plodding meditatively home from the theatre, be the gay, graceful, agile youth who knelt and offered flowers to that wondrous young divinity of other years, and sang the merry chorus at the club amidst the ringing of jovial glasses, while as yet wife, children, gray hairs, were not? Ah me! the Londoner might have sighed, as he paused beneath the lamp-post to read again upon the play-bill the name of the remembered enchantress, has the seal become worn and dull—or is the wax hardening?

If he were familiar with the country—if he had lived at Mackery End, for instance, or had summered at Blakesmoor—he would have gone forward revolving the still-vexed doubt, are the cherries smaller or has my mouth grown, for surely the fruit do not seem as vast as in the other days.

He might have added another question to these—and have asked, How could I hope that she should seem more to me now than then, and yet how could she please me as much now without being really more? For when Fanny Kemble reappeared, she was obliged to be not only all that she had been but all that the magnifying imagination of ardent men believed her to have been. She must play up to the demand of unlimited imagination, or she must necessarily seem to be less than she was.

Whether in her case it was the wax or the seal was probably never settled. Whether the cherries really were larger was never yet known. But suppose Grayhead had gone home, bumping the stars, and happy, asking no question, but full of undoubting delight? Suppose each single cherry of to-day were as a yoke of the ox-hearts of yore? Suppose that the slender tops which used to seem close against the sky had caught the sky and slipped it a little nearer to the ground?

Many years ago the Easy Chair—a mere foot-stool in those days—used to hear Ralph Waldo Emerson lecture. Perhaps it was in the small Sunday-school room under a country meeting-house, on sparkling winter nights, when all the neighborhood came stamping and chattering to the door in hood and muffler, or else ringing in from a few miles away, buried under buffalo skins. The little low room was dimly lighted with oil lamps, and the boys clumped about the stoves in their cowhide boots, and laughed and buzzed and ate apples and peanuts and giggled, and grew suddenly solemn when the grave men and women looked at them. In the desk stood the lecturer and read his manuscript, and all but the boys sat silent and enthralled by the musical spell. Some of the hearers remembered the speaker as a boy, as a young man. Some wondered what he was talking about. Some thought him very queer. All laughed at the delightful humor or the illustrative anecdote that beaded for a moment upon the surface of his talk; and some sat inspired with unknown resolves and soaring upon lofty hopes as they heard. A nobler life, a better manhood, a purer purpose, wooed every listening soul. It was not argument, nor description, nor appeal. It was wit and wisdom, and hard sense and poetry, and scholarship and music. And when the words were spoken and the lecturer sat down, the poor little foot-stool sat still and heard the rich cadences lingering in the air, as the young Priest's heart throbs with the long vibrations when the organist has risen.

The same speaker had been heard a few years previously in the Masonic Temple in Boston. It was the fashion among the gay to call him transcendental. When some one said that, he had the air of having said something he understood. It was uttered in the same tone with which certain lovely beings declare that they are not "strong-minded." And, dear lovely beings! was it ever suspected that you were? Grave parents were quoted as saying, "I don't go to hear Mr. Emerson; I don't understand him. But my daughters do." Extinction of the lecturer was supposed by many to have been achieved by that remark. Then came a volume containing the discourses. They were called "Essays." Has our literature produced any wiser or more influential book?

As the lyceum or lecture system extended the philosopher whom "my daughters understood" was called to speak. A simplicity of manner that could be called rustic if it were not of a shy, scholarly elegance; perfect composure, clear, clean, crisp sentences; maxims as full of glittering truth as a winter night sky of stars; an incessant spray of fine fancies like the November shower of meteors; and the same intellectual and moral lift, expansion, and aspiration, were the peculiarity of all his lectures.

He was never exactly popular, but always gave a tone and flavor to the whole course, as the lump of ambergris serves the Sultan for his year's cups of coffee. "We can have him once in three or four seasons," said the Committees. But really they had him all the time without knowing it. It was the philosopher Proteus who spoke through the more popular mouths. The speakers were acceptable because they were liberal, and he was the great liberalizer. They were, and they are, the middle-men between him and the public. They watered the nectar, and made it easy to drink.

The little foot-stool, gradually becoming an Easy Chair, heard from time to time of Proteus on the platform—how he was more and more eccentric—how he could not be understood—how abrupt his manner was; but the Chair did not believe that the flame which had once been so pure could ever be dimmer, especially as he recognized its soft lustre on every aspect of life around him.

And so, after many years, the opportunity to hear him came again; and although the experiment was dangerous the Chair did not hesitate to try it. The hall was pretty and not too large, and the audience was the best that the country could furnish. Every one came solely to hear the speaker, for it was one lecture in a course of his only. It was pleasant to look around and mark the famous men and the accomplished women gathering quietly in the same city where they used to gather to hear him a quarter of a century before. How much the man who was presently to speak had done for their lives, and their children's, and the country! The power of one man is not easily traced in its channels and details, but it is marked upon the whole. The word "Transcendentalism" had long passed by. It has not perhaps gone out of fashion to smile at wisdom as visionary, but this particular wise man had been acquitted of being "understood by my daughters," and there were rows of "hardheads," "practical people," curious and interesting to contemplate in the audience.

The tall figure entered at a side-door, and sat down upon a sofa behind the desk. Age seemed not to have touched him since the evenings in the country Sunday-school room. As he stood at the desk the posture, the figure, the movement, were all unchanged. There was the same rapt introverted glance as he began in a low voice, and for an hour the older tree shook off a ceaseless shower of riper, fairer fruit. The topic was Table-Talk, or Conversation; and the lecture was its own most perfect illustration. It was not a sermon, nor an oration, nor an argument; it was the perfection of talk; the talk of a poet, of a philosopher, of a scholar. Its wit was a rapier, smooth, sharp, incisive, delicate, exquisite. The blade was pure as an icicle. You would have sworn the hilt was diamond. The criticism was humane, lofty, wise, sparkling. The anecdote so choice and apt, and trickling from so many sources, that we seemed to be hearing the best things of the wittiest people. It was altogether delightful, and the audience sat suffused with a warm glow of satisfaction. There was no rhetoric, no oratory, no grimace, no dramatic familiarity and action; but the manner was self-respectful and courteous to the audience, and the tone supremely just and sincere. "He is easily King of us all," whispered one orator to another; and if the Easy Chair had been of the brotherhood how heartily it would have cried Amen!

Yet it was not oratory either in its substance or purpose. It was a statement of what this wise man, and all other wise men and women, believed conversation ought to be. Its inevitable influence—the moral of the lecture, dear Lady Flora—was a purification of daily talk, and the general good influence of incisive truth-telling. If preaching itself has any higher influence than purging the world and our lives of falsehood, what is it?

In their extreme simplicity and impatience of pretense Emerson's lectures are like Thackeray's, and the quiet manner is not unlike. We shall not soon have such again. Yet who that ever heard Thackeray will not always hear that rich, racy voice, that earnest pathetic tone, and see the bluff, honest, defiant face?

But this other, too, is not less memorable. The glory of the terrestrial is one, and the glory of the celestial is another.

A BRONZE statue of Hercules has been lately discovered in Rome, and is valued at fifty thousand dollars. It was buried under a mass of Roman rubbish, and inevitably suggests the question how many more precious remains of old art are waiting to be unearthed.

But there has been a still more interesting exhumation nearer home. A faithful disciple of Elia has brought to light, from the old magazines in which they have long lain buried, "the hitherto uncollected writings of Charles Lamb." The editor—is it unfair to name Mr. Babson of Chelsea, Massachusetts?—evidently a faithful lover and loving reader of good books, says, in his genial preface: "With me, as with Michel de Montaigne and Hans Andersen, there is no pleasure without communication; and therefore, partly to please myself, and partly to please the admirers of Elia, I have collected and published all of Charles Lamb's writings that I found 'sleeping' in out-of-fashion books and out-of-date periodicals."

Elia is a passion with all his lovers, and this book brings a delightful surprise. Most readers suppose that Moxon's edition of the works, which Talfourd edited, comprises all, or all that Lamb wished to have published. But "Elia," the title of this new work, is its own ample justification. Raphael is not more Raphael-like than these fragments are truly Elia. The very first half page of "Table-Talk" is in the richest raciest vein of the delightful book-keeper of the India House and book-maker for all the world.

Here is the Biographical Memoir of Mr. Liston, and the Autobiography of Mr. Munden, with Elia's Autobiography, and the Adventures of Ulysses, paraphrased from old Chapman's translation of the Odyssey, in such stately, quaint, and idiomatic English that a man might fear lest his charmed children, reading this, would scarcely care to explore the original. Indeed every reader, and that is to say every lover of Charles Lamb, ought to know that this volume is essential to his complete knowledge of Elia.

Among these recovered essays there are some fragments and some studies of the works which were afterward more fully finished. But there are no lees here, no dregs; nothing which has not the inimitable tone and touch of the master. Master we call him as truly as Benvenuto Cellini, and master in a larger style of his own art than Cellini in his. The essays of Elia have the grand element of permanence. The texts are simple, obvious, occasional, but the essential treatment is of no limited time and place; it appeals to the general and immortal humanity. There is the same genial and universal wisdom in them which is the deepest charm of the best essays of Montaigne and Bacon and Emerson and Thackeray, and in the delightful little volume of Lowell's "Fireside Travels."

It is impossible, after the "Final Memorials" of Lamb by Talfourd, ever to read what he wrote without thinking of what he was. What a hero! What a gentleman! Tommy Moore met him one day at a dinner, and records that he was a maker of poor puns. Yes, and Horace Walpole passed Goldsmith in the Park, and was of the opinion that he was an inspired idiot! The Bohemians like to claim Lamb, because he smoked and drank punch and wrote in the magazines. When Bohemia devotes itself to the noiseless and unknown sacrifice of a life which was so sad and so sublime in Charles Lamb, Bohemia will need no apologist.

We thank Mr. Babson most heartily for his tender love and faithful, patient service, and Mr. William Veazie, his publisher, for the comely form he has given to this characteristic and last memorial of Charles Lamb.

LORD LYONS and Goldwin Smith went home to England in the same ship. It would be a curious and interesting inquiry, which has most truly fulfilled the duty of an ambassador between two friendly and related powers, the official lord or the unofficial commoner?

The duties of ambassadors are laid down in many grave and portentous tomes. But there are many of their duties not recorded in books, and seldom written upon the ambassadorial heart. He best keeps the peace between two homogeneous and friendly nations who helps them to understand each other better; and here is a bold fellow, this Easy Chair, who ventures to affirm in black and white upon this page that he believes all the dinners, and balls, and private theatres of his truly worthy and respectable Excellency, Lord Lyons, have not helped England and America to so fair or mutual intelligence as the one discourse delivered by Goldwin Smith before the Fraternity in the Boston Music Hall.

The old jest has become untrue, that an ambassador is a gentleman who lies abroad for his country's benefit. There can be no doubt that Lord Lyons told exactly what he believed to be the truth of this country. But how little he knew about it! How little sympathy he had with it! He was here

ex officio. He was sent to the United States by Earl Russell and the regular order of diplomatic promotion; not by his own heart or studies. The letter in which he informed his chief that he had been waited upon by Northern friends of the rebels in New York showed the tendency of his sympathies, which went with his order and with the rebel allies at the North, against the people. Lord Lyons took no part. Even in that letter he did not declare himself a partisan of those who waited upon him. It was not necessary. They waited upon him; and they, and he, and every body else, knew why.

Lord Lyons was here to carry out a policy. His duty was not to secure a truer understanding, and therefore a firmer friendship, between the two countries; but to observe and report upon the condition of what was believed and hoped to be, as Russia said of Turkey, "a sick man" and a dying. If, in a friendly spirit, Lord Russell and Lord Lyons had devoted themselves to cementing the friendship of England and the United States, would England have been the loser? would not civilization have been the gainer?

This country had a traditional friendship with France. The French alliance as such, and as opposed to the English, was necessarily an illusion. France helped the colonies, not because she loved them, but because she hated England. France was the ally of the revolutionary colonies, not because she favored their cause—how could a Bourbon favor revolution?—but because she thought them in themselves unimportant, but offering her a masterly point d'appui for annoying Great Britain and regaining her losses in the French-American war. How little she cared for the United States was seen in her conduct toward us under the Directory. But we were always sentimental about France.

Now the man who did the two countries the most service was not Monsieur Genet, at the close of the last century, nor Monsieur Mercier, at the beginning of this war; it was no official personage whatsoever, it was De Tocqueville. He came from a sincere interest in civilization and free government. He explored our country and our society, and he embodied the results in the most sagacious and valuable book ever written about us. We have all liked France better ever since because of De Tocqueville. The dreary host of British travelers, Fiedler, Mrs. Trollope, Captain Hamilton, Basil Hall and Company, dilated upon the interesting facts that some Americans chewed tobacco, and expectorated indiscriminately, and wore black satin waistcoats, and talked through the nose, and slept in feather-beds, and asked a great many questions, and, in fact, were different from some Englishmen. London cockneys came over the sea—cockneys, whether they were in the army or not—sighed for the sound of Bow Bells and the delights of the Strand, and pitied us because we were not cockneys.

Certainly England in America cut rather a contemptible figure. But when De Tocqueville came, saw, and wrote, we felt that the better France had seen the better America. Mutual intelligence seemed to be established. We confessed the expectoration, the questioning, the waistcoats, and the beds charged upon us by the British tourist; but our indignation that he saw nothing else ought to have exploded in laughter, instead of swelling into wrath as it did. For such gentlemen give their own measure. The American girl who went to Rome and then went to Naples, and said that Naples was funny, but not so funny as the Coliseum, has no occasion to call in Professor Fowler to describe her; she describes herself. Did not the lively Mrs. Trollope do likewise? Yet how we stormed about Mrs. Trollope!

When De Tocqueville came he saw not only the impromptu puddles—alas! there were puddles—upon many a floor; not only the corduroy roads, not only the feather-beds, but a great nation upon a fresh continent, striving, under entirely new conditions, to solve the problem of peaceful and progressive human society. He saw both the actual condition and the tendency of our country much more truly than most Americans; and the spirit of his observation seemed so just and generous that, for his sake, we loved his nation. His true friendship revived the tradition of the French alliance. "France was always our friend," we said, a little truculently, as we added, muttering, "You — John Bull!" De Tocqueville was the most useful French ambassador that ever came to this country; and Goldwin Smith the most useful and noble English minister.

The important point in our relations with Great Britain is that the English people shall understand what this nation is doing, and that we shall comprehend the state of English feeling. This great result can not be accomplished by each nation standing on the shore of its country, clenching its fists and howling insults over the sea:

"You lantern-jawed, gawky, drawling, spitting, underbred, boasting booby!"

"You mutton-headed beer-vat, you mean bully, you whining, sniveling lackey of Louis Napoleon; you selfish, insolent brute!"

It is not in that way that we are to find or to keep peace with any nation. Nor can it be done by saying that John Bull is too intolerably insolent, and ought to be soundly thrashed out of his boots. A friend came and leaned upon the Chair the other day, and said, "I want war with England. She must be taken down." The Chair asked him, in reply, "What is war with England? Has England, as a nation, done any thing to this country for which you are willing to be killed, or to send your children to fight? The governing class in England hate us; the people of England, the substantial, working-class, do not. It is the last who would fight, not the aristocracy which insults us. It is the people, and not the aristocracy, which would suffer. How many noble American youth are you ready to slay that England may have 'a good drubbing?' Will you take Canada? England will thank you, and cry good riddance, while you will have drawn an elephant. Will you liberate Ireland? No, you will not. And don't you think we are exactly in the condition to undertake a foreign war which will involve all the European powers? Ought an honorable American to suffer the name of England to exasperate him as a red rag does a bull! The bull rushes into the arena. Some foolish fellow flourishes a little scarlet flag. The bull lowers his head and dashes blindly toward it, bellowing dreadfully. The people shout, and become painfully excited. They cheer the bull. They cry bravo! They shriek with emotion. But there is no thoughtful spectator who does not pity the bull. I, for one, do not wish to be pitied, and I protest against running at red flags."

They sailed in the same ship, Goldwin Smith and Lord Lyons. But surely the unaccredited ambassador has fulfilled a most creditable mission. If you would lay a ghost, touch it; if you would diminish hostility, make men or nations acquainted. With the utmost admiration of the principle of our Government, with the deepest interest in the development of American society, as possibly prefiguring a higher civilization than that of England, and with the most intelligent and noble sympathy in our present struggle, Goldwin Smith saw this country racked with cruel civil war, and did not doubt for a moment that the war was itself a sign of the great although painfully late fidelity of the country to its own principles. His faith in the result was confirmed, and his hearty admiration of the tendency of American life increased. But he felt a just pride in the fact that the civilization of this country was an offshoot of that of his native land, and that in real purpose, however obscured it might be by jealousy and ignorance upon both sides, the two nations are essentially brethren. He came from the England of John Milton and John Hampden to the America of Washington and Franklin; and while we are friends of that we may smile at the Brummagem England of the Deerhound and the London Times.

THERE is to be a bust of Thackeray erected near the monument of Addison in Westminster Abbey. The news comes just a year after his death, while his memory is perfectly fresh, and the genial holiday season recalls his noble heart and tender sympathy. In one of the Roundabout Papers there is a picture of him drawn by himself. He is standing with his back toward the spectator, looking with some children at a Christmas pantomime. The form is his; the likeness is characteristic; but he will never turn about; we shall never see his face again. Yet how pleasant and natural the glimpse of him among children whom he dearly loved! Indeed, he was a boy always. His heart had a boy's readiness, and thoughtlessness, and impulsiveness. How angry he was with the Mr. Yates who gossiped about him in print! It was an elephant tossing his trunk at a midge. But because he was a boy he had that wonderful knowledge of youth which fascinates them in his books. Ah! if he could finish for us "Denis Duval!"

There is also to be a tablet to Thackeray at the Charter House School in London. For Charles Lamb's sake many a musing traveler turns his steps to Enfield, merely because Elia lived somewhere there. And how often hereafter will the grateful wanderer seek out the Charter House and listen with almost painful emotion to its evening bell, not only because Thackeray went to school there, but because Colonel Newcome died there!

A new and beautiful uniform edition of Thackeray's works—a model of typographical excellence, and illustrated with a portrait expressly engraved for the edition, with the delightful original illustrations carefully reproduced—is in preparation by the Harpers. Some time we hope, and before long, there may be an adequate biography of this manly, simple, noble English humorist.

REPOSING quietly upon four legs the Easy Chair was lately surprised by the entrance of an imposing procession which sounded, as it approached, like the coming of the marble-footed Commendatore in the opera of Don Giovanni. The company proved to be nothing less than the eight completed volumes of Harper's Weekly, neatly dressed, or bound, in muslin—which it is cool for the season, as Mrs. Lirriper would say, but good for permanent wear. Accost-ing the last volume, the Eighth, the Easy Chair required it to give an account of itself. Upon which the sturdy volume replied that he hoped a glance would show how much thought and labor and money he had cost; that he alone carried under his muslin jacket no less than eight hundred illustrations, of which more than five hundred related to the war, and that of these more than a hundred were portraits of our famous soldiers and sailors who are multiplying themselves every day. The sturdy Eighth averred further that his pockets were full of sketches from his regular artist correspondents who marched with every great division of the army, as well as plenty of tales, essays, and poems by all the best writers.

"That is pretty well," answered the Easy Chair; "and how much do you consider yourself worth, my fine fellow?"

"I alone am worth six dollars," he replied; and, stepping to the window, he shouted as if he expected to be heard in California, "and I, or any of my companions, will be sent for that sum without further expense to any body who wants me, to any point in the United States accessible by express, and not more than three thousand miles from New York."

"And which it is an uncommonly tempting offer," the Easy Chair thought he heard Mrs. Lirriper again murmuring; "and if any body wanted the whole eight volumes together couldn't find any where so perfect an illustrated history of the war which deeply regret but as no fault of ours can only hope its speedy termination and all for so slight a sum and most valuable for children, and indeed every body is children when it comes to pictures and portraits."

"We're quite of your opinion, ma'am," exclaimed the Easy Chair and the stout little procession which is still standing in its pretty uniform dressed for review.

Editor's Drawer.

THE QUEENS OF SONG are celebrated in one of the most delicious and delightful volumes published in many a year. The Drawer man has been reading it, and reveling in the sweet intoxication of the ear, as the triumphs of these celebrated singers passed before him, and the memory of many whom he has heard on the stage came back with the freshness of early love. Let all who love music (and who does not?) get this charming book, and thank the Drawer, while they read, for telling them of the joy in store for them.

But we open it again to copy an incident in our line. Mrs. Billington was the great vocalist of the London stage about the beginning of the present century. One night when she was singing at the very height of her splendid voice, and carrying every thing before her in a storm of song, her husband, who was seated in the orchestra, considering that the trumpeter did not accompany her with sufficient force, whispered frequently to him, "Louder! louder!" The leader of the band, agreeing with Billington, repeated the same command so often that at length the indignant German, flinging down his trumpet in a rage, turned to the audience and exclaimed, in a tone of angry remonstrance, "It be vary easy to say 'louder and louderer,' but, by gar, vare is de vind?"

Now if any of the readers of the Drawer want the Drawer to laugh louder, or make them laugh louder, let them supply the "vind."

A WRITER in Providence; Rhode Island, vouches for the truth of the following:

Deacon W—— had felt the silken halter for the second time. On the last marriage tour he visited, by request, the family of Mr. H——, of your city. He presented his bride, on arrival, thus: "This is Miss W——; 'taint t'other Miss W——: I wish it was!"

THE same Deacon W—— was connected with one of the Congregational societies of Providence, an honest man, and devout Christian; was the owner of a large bakery, which business he continued to prosecute in connection with an extensive wholesale grocery trade.

His habits and manners were as primitive as his dress. He often led in the vestry conference and vestry exhortations. He had speculated heavily during the close of the war of 1812. A vestry prayer-meeting was in full conference on the evening on which the news of the treaty of peace was received in February, 1815. In this (then) town the bells rung out the joyful tidings.

The Deacon ceased his exhortations, and in reflective terms remarked, "Lord a marcy! what are these bells ringing for? If for fire, 'tis well enough; if for peace, I'm a ruined man!" He then resumed his petitions.

GENERAL H—— and Colonel R—— were popular members of the Rhode Island bar. General H—— had been the popular Chief Justice of our Supreme Court. Colonel R—— was one of the most brilliant men of his day—the Sheridan of the legal profession. A Rhode Island clam-bake and chowder is a State institution. In the mysteries of the chowder these gentlemen were unequaled as experts; there existed a generous rivalry; each had his partisans. A pleasant party had assembled to test the relative powers of General H—— and Colonel R——; each exceeded his previous effort; the crowd was fed; the verdict of the boys unanimous in favor of General H——. Colonel R—— asked consent to propose a toast to his successful competitor. He said a few words as only he could say and look such things, and proposed the health of General H——, "The Great Chowder Head of Rhode Island!"

AN Irishman "just over from Cork," and as emerald as his native land, was directed by his master to hitch up the oxen and go to drawing in wood. The season was winter, and the vehicle a bran-new sled. After a while Pat came in with a most lugubrious expression of countenance, and reported that it wouldn't do, the sled was broken to pieces. "What! broken?" said the farmer; "how did that happen?" "It kept running against the snags," was the unsatisfactory reply. Upon going to reconnoitre the oxen were found fastened to the back end of the sled, which had been bumping against the stumps till the shoes were torn off. "What did you hitch to the sled in that way for?" exclaimed the indignant farmer. "An' sure," answered Pat, innocently, "shouldn't it carry its tail behind!"

A LADY writes to the Drawer:

As I was traveling through a Western State, some years since, I was obliged by the inclemency of the weather to "put up" at a country tavern in the backwoods. The hotels of these sections are built of logs, and are generally fifteen by twenty feet in size. They have but one room, which answers for hall, drawing-room, sleeping-rooms, dressing-room, and kitchen. It being the first time that I ever had the "extreme felicity" of registering my name in the book of one of these metropolitan accommodations, I was very much surprised at the arrangements. I observed a few men changing their clothes—or, more properly, performing their toilet; and I addressed the landlord with,

"Is this all the apartment that this house has?"

"Yes, Sar; isn't dat enough?"

"But, Sir, have you no other room for ladies?"

"No."

"What a horrible arrangement! But how do the ladies do?" I queried.

"Oh, dey ish pooty well, I tank you!"

I WAS one time invited to a dinner-party, with the great inducement offered me that I should meet some Spanish gentlemen who were very interesting and handsome. It is needless to add that the invitation was from one of the "fair sex." I arrived in time to engage in some pleasant conversation with the numerous young ladies present, and then we were invited to partake of the dinner spread in honor of our Spanish friends.

Francisco R—— was decidedly the "lion" of the assembly, whose fine looks and "cunning ways" made a deep impression upon our fair sisters. He, however, knew little or nothing of the names we gave our barn-yard ornaments—such as turkeys, chickens, etc. Señor Francisco was offered some eggs cooked in a fancy style by a young lady, and, to the astonishment of the persons present, he not only refused to have them on his plate, but showed quite plainly his antipathy for them by sundry nauseating expressions of countenance.

"Why," remarked our silvery-voiced belle, "you are not fond of eggs!"

"No," he replied, with a wink; "but I likes—likes 'em when they grows up!"

IRISHMEN are often accused of "bulls." Will the New Yorkers charge the following "bull" to the Irish because it is made of an Irishman:

"Hughes, Archbishop, lying in state at St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York—taken from life!"

It appears in the Catalogue of a prominent New York photographic publisher.

THE Drawer has contained many good things from Colorado, but I have not seen the following about Soulé, of the Colorado First:

One night Lieutenant Clark, Lieutenant Soulé, and Captain Wilson were very dry. A most stringent order against the introduction of any ardent into camp being just then most rigorously executed, they had been discussing the ways and means of procuring something "hot," when Soulé cried out, "I've got it! You, Clark, are very sick—you must go to bed—you have got cramps—you must be covered up—you must have some brandy immediately!" In a moment Clark was very sick abed, covered with all the blankets at command, and Soulé was off in breathless haste to the hospital steward for brandy. There he met the conscientious objections of the steward by the most earnest representations of the urgency of the case. He could wait for no surgeon's order—Lieutenant Clark might die! In a moment he was again with the "boys," flourishing a bottle of brandy in the air in triumph, and a jolly time they had drinking it. But what was one bottle to them after a fortnight's total abstinence? They were still dry! Before the bottle was quite empty Soulé snatched it out of the hands of Clark, held it up to the light, eying it critically, took one more swig, and then said, "Now, boys, for another bottle!" Raising the window-curtain, it was but the work of a moment to catch a hundred flies and put them in the bottle, to be drowned with the small amount of brandy remaining. Rushing back to the hospital steward in as breathless haste as before—this time holding up the bottle containing a spoonful of brandy and an equal amount of flies—cried out, "See there! Is that the kind of brandy you dispense to a sick man here?" With as many apologies as Soulé would wait to listen to, the poor steward handed him another bottleful of brandy, with which he returned to his comrades. The noise which soon issued from Lieutenant Clark's quarters attracted attention, and a good many other officers took a taste of the second bottle. Even the Colonel himself felt inclined to indulge; but as he never drinks, he punished himself by smoking a cigar.

THE Drawer is sometimes accused of speaking lightly when serious things are up for remark, but it seldom gets off so solemn a joke as the Presbyterian Record does when it calls on the good people in the oil regions to give largely to the Church, and says: "If God's people do not sanctify their rapid accumulations of worldly goods, they may learn at no distant day that their grease-spot will be removed."

The Bible says, "I will come and remove thy candle-stick out of its place;" but the Record substitutes grease-spot, with a taste somewhat worse than questionable.

I OVERHEARD the following the other day between two grave fellows, and send it to the Drawer:

"If you had your choice, what death would you die of?"

"Why, old age, to be sure. What would you?"

"Oh! I would be petted to death by a clever woman."

"Well, that would be capital punishment, to be sure!"

THE three that follow are from the State of Michigan:

Isn't it queer sometimes when we have an idea clearly in our minds which we wish to express, how a little excitement or embarrassment will "mix up" the words in which we wish to clothe it terribly? A good man had the honor once upon a time of having a minister by the name of James to dine with him. Imagine the good pastor's astonishment when, on sitting down to the table, his worthy host addressed him in these words: "Mr. Blessing, will you please ask the James?" He attempted, as soon as he comprehended what was required of him, to "ask the James;" but alas for the credit of the cloth, laughed outright in the midst of it, thus proving that ministers have a realizing sense of the ridiculous as well as ordinary mortals.

HERE is a specimen of murdered Queen's English which out-Partingtons Mrs. Partington, and has moreover the merit of being an actual fact: An illiterate man who hailed from Down East had occasion one day to purchase a new Bible, and as it was quite an event to him, the next neighbor he met was duly informed of the fact that he "had got a Polywog Bible with the Hypocrisy in it." It was some little time before his friend decided that it must be a Polyglot Bible containing the Apocrypha. The same individual one day related to an admiring group of listeners some wonderful event which he said "happened way up North, where the 'Squeemox Indians live.'"

VARIOUS instances have been cited to prove how lazy a man may be and live; but it remains for a Michigander to cap the climax. One hot day during the heated term of last summer one Mr. F——, of Jackson County, was observed to throw himself down on the grass under the spreading branches of a shade-tree, and to exclaim, emphatically, to himself, "There! breathe if you want to—I sha'n't!"

SOME years ago, in the great State of Indiana, lived and flourished a popular young preacher. He was not specially noted for his gravity, and some of his friends expressed an opinion that he was entirely too wild for one of his profession. A little girl of some ten summers replied indignantly that it was not so; at least, if he were wild at times, "he was tame enough in the pulpit!" and there the defense rested.

REV. MR. E——, of St. Paul, Minnesota, was inimitable as a child's orator, and was never as we know of disconcerted in addressing the little folks but once. He was addressing some Sunday-school scholars, and was in his usual popular and effective way enforcing the duty of gratitude to God for His blessings. "What," said he, "would you say to me if I were to give each one of you a fine new suit of clothes?" From every part of his youthful audience bright eyes twinkled with delight, and a chorus of boyish voices answered, "Bully for you!"

WHILE the United States transport ——, with troops on board, was lying at Cairo last spring, Captain C——'s wife visited him, and was of course greatly interested in what she observed going on.

She had noticed the sentinel passing to and fro at the shore-end of the stage-plank, and as a dark, rainy night was setting in, she was observed to be more quiet and thoughtful than usual.

At length, looking up at her husband, she asked, "Are you going to keep that poor soldier out there in the rain all night?" When it was understood who she meant it was explained to her that it was necessary to do so; but that he didn't have to remain there all the time, being relieved by two others in turn. But she didn't seem quite satisfied, and presently asked again, "Couldn't you let him come in on the boat and stand under shelter?" This proposition was promptly negatived, and her innocent solicitude on account of the imagined hardship to that "poor soldier" became so apparent as to cause a smile among the listeners. A short silence followed, during which it was evident she was devising in her tender little heart some scheme for his relief, when suddenly a bright idea seemed to have struck her, and looking up into her husband's face with a countenance full of anxious hope, she said, "Dear, couldn't you lend him your umbrella?"

IN the city of La Crosse, Wisconsin, resides the pastor of a flourishing church, and on the night of November 21, 1864, the members of his congregation were to give him a donation party. Ten years since he was married to his present wife, an accomplished lady. The Sunday preceding the donation visit, after morning service and benediction, Judge Dean arose and asked as a favor that the congregation would remain till the pastor retired. His wish was complied with, when he again arose, and said, with the deep look of wisdom peculiar to the man:

"It is to be hoped that this audience will not forget the donation party to-morrow night. Besides being the night set apart for donation visit, it is the anniversary of our pastor's tenth wedding!"

OLD Billy Taylor, whose good stories and witty sayings will long be remembered by his acquaintances, used to relate the following: When I was young, just admitted to the bar in Kentucky, I was appointed by the Court to defend a man who had been indicted for the murder of his mother. Determined to make out of the matter as much reputation for myself as the case would admit of, I took the accused aside and told him it was necessary for me, as his counsel, to know the whole truth in reference to the charge against him. After assuring him that what he might say to me could not be used against him, I put the plain question, "Did you kill your mother?" "Yes," was the reply. "What made you do it?" "Because," said he, "she wasn't worth wintering!"

NOR long since a Company of negroes was raised in the town of Piqua, who were to join a certain colored regiment being organized in Massachusetts. The night preceding their departure for the camp of rendezvous a meeting was held in the African Church, at the close of which the venerable minister, in a prayer, made the following remarkable request: "That when these men went on the battlefield they might be as bold as lions and harmless as doves!"

In Princeton, Massachusetts, at one time there were only two Democrats in town. A Democratic President had just been elected, and one of the two aspired to the office of postmaster. He found no difficulty, as he was the only competitor, in getting the appointment. He was a very ignorant man, and after having entered upon his official duties several letters came to the office addressed P. M. Here was a quandary! He could not conjecture who P. M. was. A large number had accumulated, when one day he happened to think that there was an old farmer living in town named Paul Myrick, so he bundled up the letters and sent them to him!

ANY one ought to be able to see the point of the following; but if he can't see it, and is anxious to do so, let him enter the army:

Two Scotch miners were quarreling. One of them was very boastful, and was making considerable parade of his valorous deeds. The other quietly listened until boaster had talked himself down, and then said: "Oh yes, yer brave, nae doubt. Tak aff yer shirt an' shake it, and ye can say ye stood where thousands fell." Report says boaster was annihilated.

SOME thirty years ago, in Washington County, New York, before ready-made shoes came in vogue, a venerable shoemaker, Old Phenix, was in the habit of going from house to house, and there making up shoes and boots for the families under his jurisdiction. Among the rest of his customers he visited the family of one Mr. Parish, and shod old and young. One of the boys was endowed with a big pair of slogy boots, and on the succeeding Sabbath went to church much more occupied with the boots than the sermon. At the noon intermission, when good old Dr. Proudfit came around, as was his custom, to catechise the youngsters, the boy's thoughts still ran downward. The old Doctor coming up to the boy, in his turn, inquired of him, "John, who made you?" "Father found the leather, and old Phenix did the work!" was the natural but unexpected reply.

UP in Morris County, New Jersey, lives old Uncle Pete, who always votes the ticket that bids the highest. A few evenings before the last Presidential election some Republicans went to his house to outbid some Democrats who had been there. But Uncle Pete informed them he had sold his vote three days before to the Democrats for ten dollars. He was told that if he would carry his ticket and the ten dollars back to the one who gave them, and vote the Republican ticket, they would give him twenty dollars, which offer Uncle Pete immediately accepted. Just as the party had left the house they heard a couple of men coming up whom they knew to be Democrats. Being convinced they were on their way to Uncle Pete's, they hid themselves till the second party had passed into the house, and went back to listen. The Democrats had hardly become seated when Uncle Pete said: "Gentlemen, you called upon me the other day, and offered ten dollars if I would vote the M'Clellan ticket. I am poor, and took your money and the ticket. Here are both, take them back; I never sell my vote!" They tried to urge him to stick to his first promise to them; but it was no go; for Uncle Pete said, "There is no use to talk, gentlemen. I am a Lincoln man, and have been for over ten years!" And getting a little warmed up at the thought of the twenty dollars, he continued, "No, gentlemen, there is no use trying to change my mind, as I always vote on principle, and money can't buy my vote. I am a Lincoln man, and have been a Lincoln man all my life!" While the Democrats left in disappointment, the Lincoln men felt sure of Uncle Pete's vote—unless a higher bid came before election.

AN Irishman, Pat by name, was employed in one of the Newark manufactories. Pat had a habit of getting on sprees and neglecting his work when it was most needed. Mr. W——, one of the firm, and who had the supervision of the establishment, frequently remonstrated with him, but to little purpose, until one day, as Pat came in rather the worse for the "crathur," and became rather noisy, Mr. W—— called him into the office. After a while Pat came out, when a number went to him to hear what Mr. W—— had said this time. Pat said:

"Misther W—— is a fine man, a very gintleman."

"Well, what did he say to you?"

"Och, an' sure he talked kindly to me—just like a fahther. An' sure he is a kind-hearted Christian, an' wouldn't harrum the feelin's of the manest man in the wuruld."

"Well, what did he tell you?"

"An' sure Misther W—— is a fine man, an' he spaked to me jist like a kind fahther; an' told me if I ever came in dhrunk agin he wud kick me out of the shop!"

A LEGAL friend sends us the following account of a trial which occurred many years ago in W——, Massachusetts:

One of the smartest attorneys in W—— was called on one day for the defense in a suit for the value of sundry bean-poles. His client instructed him: "Fact is, Squire, I had the bean-poles; but we was alone when I bought 'em, and alone when I come next day after 'em; so I don't see how he can prove it." So the attorney appeared at the trial day, when the plaintiff produced an old pocket-book, in which he swore he kept his accounts, and in which he had charged two dollars for the bean-poles. This evidence made the case look squally for the defendant, who hastily called his only witness, and he swore that he heard the defendant say he never had the bean-poles. Even our non-professional readers will see that to admit such a statement is an admission by the party himself without the solemnity of an oath. But the plaintiff's lawyer "didn't see it;" he was struck by the quantity of the evidence rather than its quality. He cross-examined the witness again and again; but the latter stuck to his statement that the defendant did say he never had the bean-poles.

Here the case rested, and it was agreed to leave it to the justice without argument. But his Honor angrily declined to give judgment. "How could he decide a case when there was one witness on each side, and so the testimony was equal?" But being told that it was his duty to decide, he said he should give judgment for the defendant, with costs against the plaintiff. "For though the testimony was equal on both sides, that of the plaintiff's was interested, for he testified in favor of his own bean-poles, while that for the defense was given by a third party who was disinterested." And so the defendant got his bean-poles, but never paid for them.

SOME thirty years ago, when the military organization in Maine commanded more attention from the "assembled wisdom" of that State than of late, a law was passed prescribing the uniform of militia officers, which provided that, at the May trainings, they should wear "black citizens' hats!"

In the rear of General Grant's head-quarters at City Point is the camp of Head-quarters Cavalry Escort. While passing through this camp last week I overheard the following dialogue, coming from a group of soldiers lounging under a shelter of pine boughs.

Says A. "I tell you that a majority don't elect the President."

Says B. "I know better; it does elect, and there ain't nothing else can elect."

A. "Well, it ain't so in our State, any how."

B. "Well, if the majority don't elect I should like to know who does?"

A. "Well, I'll tell you who does elect: it's the Pleurisy."

B. "The what-i-sy? What the —— is that?"

A. "Well, I don't know exactly, but I know it ain't the majority."

A. was right. He only got the pleurisy for plurality, that's all.

A CONNECTICUTER sends to the Drawer the following:

Two lawyers were walking out one summer morning when they were met by an Irishman noted for his ready wit.

"Good-morning, Pat," says one of the lawyers, who happened to be acquainted with the Irishman, and wishing to show his friend some of Pat's wit.

"Good-morning, your Honor," says Pat.

"Pat, my friend and myself have had quite an argument this morning as to whether there ever was an Irishman in heaven or not, and we have concluded to ask your opinion on the matter."

"Faith there was one," says Pat.

"Well, how did he happen to get there?" says the lawyer, at the same time nudging his friend to notice Pat's witty answer.

"Well," continued Pat, "there was once a good old Quaker who had an Irishman living with him, and the Quaker told him that if he kept on and served him as faithfully as he had until he (the Quaker) died that he would take him to heaven with him. In the course of time the Quaker died, and the Irishman went to heaven with him. But when it was known that there was an Irishman in heaven there was a great time, and he was ordered to leave, but he refused to leave, unless he was put out by a regular course of law; and they searched heaven all over, but the divil a lawyer could they find; so there was one Irishman, but never a bit of a lawyer."

A TALL Sucker volunteer, who is in this city "on detached service," having lost his health, and having but little faith in the skill of army surgeons, called upon Doctor S——, a resident practitioner, for treatment. The Doctor gave the case a careful examination, and wrote out a couple of prescriptions, which he handed the soldier, at the same time giving the necessary directions as to diet, etc. Being asked for his bill, the physician blandly answered, "Fifteen dollars, Sir." Our boy in blue opened his eyes pretty wide at the (to him) fabulous price of the slips of paper, but slowly drew the greenbacks and counted out the amount.

Going to the nearest apothecary's he handed in the mystical papers, and the compounds were speedily made up and given to the soldier, with the intimation that "two and a half" was expected as an equivalent.

"Why," said our friend the Sucker, "I just paid an old feller fifteen dollars for that stuff."

"You paid the Doctor for the prescription," replied the vendor of pills; "this is for the medicine."

"I tell you I paid that old chap fifteen dollars, and I won't pay another cent. Now you just leave these bottles right here, and give me the prescription, and if that old secesh sawbones don't make it all right I'll break his head for him."

So taking the prescription and assuming an air of injured indignation he proceeded to the office of Dr. S——. Marching straight up to that gentleman, he addressed him:

"Look here, old feller, didn't I pay you fifteen dollars for this 'ere rag?"

"Yes, Sir—yes, Sir," says Medicus.

"Well, this pill-shop man down here wants to make me pay two and a half more."

"That is right, my friend. You see I only charge you for the prescription; the medicine is extra."

"Medicine! You fellers want to skin a feller because he's a soldier! You can't come it over me, though—I'm a veteran! Now you just give me back my fifteen dollars and take your old prescription!"

The Doctor disgorged the money, and our Illinois Yankee threw down the prescription in disgust before him, and, with a twinkle in his eye, left the office.

This little financial transaction over, our friend went straightway to the drug-store, and with a satisfied expression told the druggist that he would pay for that medicine now; he had fixed it all up with the doctor; and forking over the requisite sum he left.

Upon comparing notes with the druggist a few days after, Dr. S— was apprised of the sell that had been practiced on him, and the joke soon became known, but to this day he is decidedly sensitive on the subject of his military practice.

BARTIMEUS WILLARD, one of the early settlers of Egremont, Massachusetts, was a ready wit, a keen satirist, and a natural poet. He was one day at Lenox during session of County Court, and the lawyers there were much diverted with his poetical effusions and sallies of wit. One of the lawyers said to him, "Come, Barty, and take dinner with us; it sha'n't cost you any thing." He consented and accompanied the lawyers. One said to him, "Barty, we want you to ask a blessing." Barty, who made no pretension to religion, said, "Well, if I do I hope you will behave as men should do on such an occasion, and not make a mock of it; and I want some one to return thanks." One was accordingly appointed. All stood up around the table and Barty began thus:

"Lord of the climes,
Haste on the times
When death makes lawyers civil;
Lord stop their clack
And send them back
Unto their father devil.
Don't let this band
Infest our land,
Nor let these liars conquer;
Oh, let this club
Of Beelzebub
Insult our land no longer!
They are bad indeed
As the thistle weed,
Which chokes our fertile mowing;
Compare them nigh
To the Hessian fly,
Which kills our wheat when growing.
Come sudden death,
And cramp their breath,
Refine them well with brimstone;
And let them there
To hell repair,
And turn the devil's grin'stone."

The landlord said they ate but very little dinner; and the one appointed to return thanks rose, turned on his heel, and did not make the attempt.

PRETTY good for Sandy this is:

During the battle of Antietam the Eighth Connecticut Regiment, one company of which was commanded by Captain Tubbs, of Norwich, Connecticut, was ordered to a new field a little distant from the lines, to be on hand to check any advance there might be in that quarter from the enemy. It was not expected there would be any work for them to perform, and the Captain's servant, a stalwart darkey called Sandy, accompanied them to their new position; but hardly had they got there when the balls commenced to fly around like hail, wounding the Captain and cutting up the men. After the Captain had got to hospital and his servant had been found, the Captain began questioning him as to where he was during the fight. "Well," says Sandy, "I thought it was getting rather too hot for me, and seein' a big tree on the ground I laid down behind it, so they wouldn't hit me." "How did you feel while you was lying there?" asked the Captain. Said Sandy, "I just felt as if every hair of my head was a brass band, and every band playing 'Home, sweet Home!'"

AN officer at Atlanta, Georgia, writes to the Drawer:

In a late number of Harper I had the pleasure of reading some good anecdotes of that brave old German, Brigadier-General Matthies, formerly commanding a brigade in the Fifteenth Corps, but now resigned. When the number containing the anecdotes came out General M. was commanding at Decatur, Alabama. The "good ones" were read to him, in company with other officers, causing much hearty laughter, in which the General joined, and said they were true enough.

Those anecdotes were good, but not better nor more characteristic than the following:
